I do not believe in this appropriation. We had some demonstration of the matter some years ago, when college boys and college girls fresh from their books could stand a better examination than people who had practical experience. I had great sympathy with that woman in the Treasury Department who was called upon to pass one of these examinations and compete with a college-bred girl just from her books. When asked the question as to the distance of the sun from the earth, she replied that she did not know the distance in miles, but she did know it was near enough to afford light sufficient to enable her to count more national Treasury notes, and with greater accuracy, than any other woman in that Department, whereupon she took service. I believe in the substantial section of the statute and not in this dress parade.

Mr. NEAL. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. CANNON. Certainly.

Mr. NEAL. What chance have the soldiers, who went into the Army and bared their breasts to the leaden storm in order to preserve their country, alongside of these fresh college-bred girls and boys in these examinations?

Mr. CANNON. None at all.

Mr. BAYNE. The next section of the Revised Statutes provides abundantly for that.

Mr. BOWMAN. I move a pro forma amendment for the purpose of asking leave to print some remarks in regard to the civil service.

There being no objection, leave was granted. [See Appendix.]

The question being taken on the amendment of Mr. BAYNE, there were—ayes 35, noes 41.

Mr. BAYNE. I call for tellers.

Tellers were not ordered.

So the amendment was not agreed to.

Mr. WILLIS. I do not think the question has been understood by the committee.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Kentucky is aware that the question was taken on the amendment, first by a viva voce vote, then by a division, and then the demand being made for tellers, tellers were refused.

Mr. WILLIS. I understand that; but I say, in the confusion, when the question was taken upon the demand for tellers there were not three men on this side of the House who understood the question.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair stated it distinctly.

Mr. WILLIS. I renew the amendment in a modified form, striking out $25,000 and inserting $24,000.

The question being taken on the amendment of Mr. WILLIS, there were—ayes 31, noes 45.

Mr. WILLIS. No quorum.

Tellers were ordered; and Mr. HISCOCK and Mr. WILLIS were appointed.

Mr. WHITE. I rise to a question of order. I want to know whether it would be in order to save the time of the House by deciding this question by the flipping of a nickel.

Mr. WILLIS. I will answer that question after a while.

The CHAIRMAN. The question of the gentleman from Kentucky is not in order.

The committee again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 40, noes 54.

So the amendment was not agreed to.

Mr. HILL. I move the amendment which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

After line 723 amend by adding the following:

"That from and after the 1st day of January, 1883, the rate of postage on all domestic letters transmitted through the mails of the United States, and not exceeding one-half ounce in weight, shall be uniform at two cents, and for each half ounce or fraction thereof of additional weight there shall be charged an additional rate of two cents, to be in all cases prepaid by postage stamps plainly affixed to such letters."

Mr. HISCOCK. I make a point of order upon this amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York makes the point of order that this amendment is new legislation and does not retrench expenditures.

Mr. HISCOCK. I am willing to reserve the point of order, that the gentleman from New Jersey may be heard.

Mr. HILL. Mr. Chairman, on the 16th of December last I introduced a bill to reduce postage, of which this amendment is a copy. No action has been taken in regard to it, and the session is so near the close I fear it will not be reached; therefore, in view of the importance of the measure, I am induced to offer this amendment, with the hope that it may be adopted and ingrafted in this bill, and thereby become a law. In my opinion it is one of the most important measures that has been before this Congress. It is in the interest of all the people of the country, and ought to have passed before this. The amendment simply reduces letter postage from three cents to two cents. We have heard much of late in regard to the reduction of taxes, but little has been said about reducing postage, which is really a tax on the people. The reduction called for in this bill is one that every person who does business through the mails will be benefited by. The workingmen, the mill hands, clerks, and farmers, as well as the business men, all will receive a benefit, a saving of 33⅓ per cent. be realized, and, as we believe, the revenues of the Post-Office Department be increased as the result of lower postage by increasing correspondence. I believe it has been proven in all countries, the cheaper the postage and the greater the facility for creating correspondence the greater the number will be who take advantage of it. Whenever postage has been reduced, it has increased rather than diminished the revenue to the Post-Office Department. There is something in this reduction that is feasible—that all will enjoy the good results to come from it. It comes home to the masses of the people; it is demanded by them; their voice is heard from all parts of the country asking for it. Public meetings are being held; boards of trade, chambers of commerce have passed resolutions and petitioned Congress to reduce postage. The Post-Office Department is now self-supporting, as the following statement will show:

For quarter ending September 30, 1881, first quarter of present fiscal year, deficiency was	$196,104 02
For quarter ending December 31, 1881, second quarter of present fiscal year, surplus was	678,424 20
Surplus for six months ending December 31, 1881	482,320 18

OFFICE OF THE AUDITOR OF THE TREASURY
FOR THE POST-OFFICE DEPARTMENT,
Washington, D. C., February 28, 1882.

SIR: In compliance with your request, I have the honor to furnish you with the following statement of the receipts and expenditures of the Post-Office Department for the quarters named:

Quarter.	Receipts.	Expenditures.	Deficiency.
First, 1881	$9,451,761 95	$9,711,342 32	$259,580 37
Second, 1881	9,811,273 41	9,974,050 02	162,776 61

The receipts for the second quarter, 1881, are increased by the item of $295,581.39 "revenue from money-order business," for the fiscal year 1881, this account being made up annually.

Very respectfully,
J. H. ELA, Auditor.
Hon. JOHN HILL, House of Representatives.

OFFICE OF THE AUDITOR OF THE TREASURY
FOR THE POST-OFFICE DEPARTMENT,
Washington, D. C., April 7, 1882.

SIR: In compliance with your request, I have the honor to furnish you with the following statement of the postal receipts and expenditures for the quarter ended December 31, 1881:

Revenue		$10,620,400 90
Expenditures		9,941,976 70
Surplus		678,424 20

Very respectfully,
J. H. ELA, Auditor.
Hon. JOHN HILL, House of Representatives.

And I am informed that for the quarter ending March 31, 1882, the surplus is still larger. I have seen it stated that it is estimated there will be a surplus the fiscal year ending June 30, 1882, of over $2,000,000. In the last report of the Postmaster-General for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1881, I find the following:

The total expenditures made on account of service for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1881, were		$39,251,736 46
The revenues were as follows:
Ordinary receipts	$36,489,816 58
Receipts from money-order business	295,581 39
		36,785,397 97
Excess of expenditures on account of the fiscal year over receipts for the same		2,466,338 49
To which should be added the net amount charged on the books of the Auditor—as appears by his report—for "bad debts" and "compromise" accounts		14,790 86
Making a total excess of		2,481,129 35

I find in said report that there were sold and used during the fiscal year ending June 30, 1881, postage-stamps, stamped envelopes, and postal cards as follows:

Stamps, &c.	Number.	Value.
The number of ordinary postage-stamps issued during the fiscal year was	954,128,450	$24,040,627 00
Newspaper and periodical stamps	1,995,788	1,398,674 00
Special stamps for the collection of postage due	8,045,710	254,393 00
Postal cards	308,536,500	3,086,605 00
Stamped envelopes, plain	106,291,300	2,647,567 74
Stamped envelopes, special request	85,024,000	2,624,481 75
Newspaper-wrappers	35,751,750	431,154 60
Official postage-stamps	2,012,544	107,777 32
Official stamped envelopes and wrappers	2,525,500	34,155 50
Aggregating	1,504,311,542	34,625,435 91

POSTAGE ON SECOND-CLASS MATTER.

The total amount of postage collected during the year on newspapers and periodicals mailed to regular subscribers from known offices of publication and from news agencies, at two cents per pound, was $1,399,048.64, an increase over the year before of $172,596.06.

The following report is also found, relating to registry fees and the money-order system, showing effect of growth of country and increase of business:

STATISTICS OF REGISTRATION.

The total number of letters and parcels registered during the fiscal year was 8,338,919, consisting of 6,159,297 domestic letters, 645,213 domestic parcels, 312,553 letters, and 11,759 parcels to foreign countries, and 1,210,096 letters and parcels of official matter for the Government by law exempt from the payment of registry fees. The amount of registry fees collected was $712,882.20, an increase over the previous year of $117,107.90, or 19.19 per cent. The increase in the total number of letters and parcels registered was 1,342,405, or 19.66 per cent.

The registration of third and fourth-class matter, begun on the 1st October, 1878, continues to grow in popular favor. The amount of fees collected from this source during the last fiscal year was $65,697.20, an increase over the previous year of $20,006.90. The revenue derived from the registration of this class of matter is some compensation for the loss the Department sustains in handling and transporting it, but the expense is still largely in excess of the total receipts.

The registry system is now in most excellent condition, having been almost completely remodeled during the past four years, with financial results that well attest the wisdom of the changes made. The amount of fees collected during the year ended June 30, 1877, was $367,438.80, and for the year ended June 30, 1881, was $712,882.20, an increase of the latter over the former year of $345,443.40, or a little more than 94 per cent. This rate of growth is unprecedented, and is gratifying not only as an evidence of the public appreciation but because of the fact that the registry system is a profitable contributor to the postal revenues, the fees realized being much in excess of the cost of the work. The report of the Third Assistant Postmaster-General is worthy of special attention in connection with the subject of registration.

THE POSTAL MONEY-ORDER SYSTEM.

The operations of the money-order system are multiplying yearly under the impulse of prosperous trade and the influence of immigration, with the rapid development of the newer States and Territories, and the demand for additional means of intercommunication and exchange.

NUMBER OF DOMESTIC MONEY-ORDER OFFICES.

At the commencement of the last fiscal year the total number of post-offices authorized to issue and to pay domestic money-orders was 4,829. During the year 341 additional money-order offices were established, and 7 were discontinued, leaving 5,163 in operation on the 30th day of June, 1881. Since then 338 new offices have been established, making the whole number of money-order offices in operation at date of this report 5,499.

ISSUES AND PAYMENTS OF DOMESTIC MONEY-ORDERS.

The number of domestic money-orders issued during the year was 7,663,232, of the aggregate value of		$105,075,769 35
The number of such orders paid during the same time was 7,627,710, amounting in value to	$104,219,871 65
To which must be added the amount of orders repaid to remitters	704,981 96
Making the total amount of payments and repayments		104,924,853 61
The excess of issues over payments was		150,915 74
The total amount of fees paid by the public to postmasters for the issues of domestic orders was		966,732 75

The foregoing figures show an increase of $4,722,950.52, or 4.71 per cent. in the amount of orders issued; an increase of $4,758,870.83, or 4.75 per cent. in the amount of orders paid and repaid, and a gain of $50,279.95, or 5.49 per cent. in the amount of fees received over the like transactions of the previous year. The domestic money-orders issued during the year averaged $13.71 each, the average being about 15 cents smaller than that of the previous year, and the average fee upon each was 12.62 cents, being four-hundredths of a cent less than the average fee for the year preceding.

REVENUES AND EXPENSES OF THE MONEY-ORDER SYSTEM.

The receipts and expenditures of the domestic money-order system for the fiscal year ended June 30, 1881, are reported by the Auditor as follows:

RECEIPTS.

Fees on orders issued		$966,732 75
Premiums, &c		1,040 18
		967,772 93

EXPENDITURES.

Commissions and clerk hire	$607,160 19
Lost remittances	167 00
Bad debts	3,692 28
Incidental expenses	104,438 82
		715,458 29
Excess of receipts over expenditures, being gross revenue		252,314 64

The following table will show

INCREASE IN ISSUES OF POSTAGE-STAMPS, ETC.

The increase in the number and amount of the foregoing issues over those of the previous year is shown as follows:

Aggregate increase	32,087,342 46	34,625,435 91	2,538,093 45	7.9

*Decrease.

It will be seen by the above extracts from the Postmaster-General's report that postal stamps and stamped envelopes contribute to the revenue of the Department $29,312,481.76.

Newspapers and periodical stamps	$1,398,674 00
Postal cards	3,086,608 00
Money-orders, excess of receipts over expenditures	352,314 64
Registry fees	712,882 20
Postage on second-class matter, newspapers, and periodicals, from offices of publication, mails to regular subscribers, at 2 cents per pound	1,399,048 64
Registration of third and fourth class matter	65,697 20

It will be noticed that all these various items of the service are growing and increasing rapidly every year, and to corroborate this I find the Third Assistant Postmaster-General Hazen has recently completed a statement of the issues to postmasters by his office of postage-stamps, stamped envelopes, and postal cards for the fiscal year ended June 30, 1882. The total number issued was 1,740,571,038 pieces of an aggregate value of $40,977,953.42. This is an increase over the issue for the preceding fiscal year of 236,259,496 pieces, or 15.7 per cent., equal in value to $6,352,517.51. The total cost of furnishing these articles was $875,836.75, or an increase over the preceding fiscal year of only $19,288.96, or 2¼ per cent., although the increase in the number of articles furnished was 15.7 per cent. The appropriations for supplying these articles amounted to $1,036,000, of which $875,836.75 was expended, leaving an unexpended balance of $160,163.25, or 15.4 per cent. of the appropriations. Over 1,000,000,000 three-cent stamps and 350,000,000 postal cards were sold during the past year. As a result of these figures the departmental officials feel warranted in asserting that when the final statement of receipts and expenditures for the year has been completed it will be found that the postal service was self-sustaining. Of a deficiency appropriation of $2,152,258 made by Congress last year to meet the expected deficiency in the postal revenues not one cent has been drawn from the Treasury. This is the first year since 1851 in which the receipts of the Post-Office Department have balanced its expenditures, with the exception of one year during the war of the rebellion. This is very gratifying and sustains all I have said, that the postal service is self-supporting and that the business every year is increasing, and that while expenditures are decreasing revenues are increasing.

As I have mentioned above, we have seen it stated that it is estimated that the surplus for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1882, will be about $2,000,000. The deficiency June 30, 1881, was $2,481,129, which by increase of business of the service and good management of the same has been made up; and if a surplus of two millions for 1882 is realized four millions and a half will be the gain for the past year; and at this rate it will not take long to meet any deficiency that a reduction of postage to two cents would create.

It is argued that to reduce to a two-cent rate one-third decrease on stamps and stamped envelopes would deplete the revenues too much, but when the facts above are carefully examined, it will be seen that it will not be long before the great increase of wealth, population, business of the country, and correspondence will make up any deficiency that may accrue, and that lower rate of postage will tend to increase postage and revenue. The same argument was used when the postal-card bill passed in 1873; it was said then the revenue of the Post-Office Department would suffer, and that we could not afford to take the risk; yet we find that the introduction and use of the one-cent postal card has been a source of large revenue to the Post-Office Department, and it has played an important part in the revenues of the service, as will be seen from the figures below. When the postal-card bill passed in 1873 it was thought that possibly the sale of these cards might reach 100,000,000 a year. The last report shows sales for each year ending June 30, as follows:

1873, (May and June)	31,094,000
1874	91,079,000
1875	107,616,000
1876	150,815,000
1877	170,015,500
1878	200,630,000
1879	221,797,000

The estimated number of postal cards required from July 1, 1881, to July 1, 1885, is 2,000,000,000—an average of 500,000,000 a year. The cost of the postal cards for the eight years they have been in use is $1,428,715; the number sold during that period has been 1,523,039,500, giving a revenue to the Post-Office Department of $13,802,280. In view of this experience, two-cent letter postage does not seem so impracticable a scheme as it once did to certain doctrinaires, and the sale of 2,000,000,000 of the cards during the next five years will help on the good cause.

We find the contract price for printing postal cards for the first four years was $1.39⅞ per 1,000; for the second four years, 69.56 cents per 1,000; and the contract for the four years to 1885 is at 54.43 cents per 1,000. We note one more fact connected with the postal card. Our cards are printed so well and so cheaply, and the material is so good, that the Government of Canada has asked permission of our Government to allow the contractors for our cards to print 10,000,000 postal cards for our British neighbor.

The sale of letter postage-stamps and of one and two cent stamps keeps pace with the postal card, and, as far as can be ascertained, the postal-card business is believed to be nearly a net gain to the revenues.

As an appendix to the above information concerning the postal card in this country, we cite the following facts of general interest. They are collated from a treatise on the history of the postal card, recently published in Berlin:

The originator of the idea is said to have been a German state official, Dr. Stephan, who wrote an essay upon it in 1865. Austria was the first to adopt it, beginning in October, 1869. The first three months witnessed the passage of 2,930,000 cards through the mails. Germany followed suit in 1870, and on the first day after the introduction of the postal card 45,468 were sent off in Berlin alone, and within two months over 2,000,000 were used. Other countries soon initiated the same step. During the Franco-Prussian war the postal-card system was a great boon to both armies. Over 10,000,000 cards passed during the campaign between the German soldiers and their friends and homes. The greatest proportional consumption of postal cards occurs unquestionably in the United States. The whole of Europe is estimated to use annually 350,000,000. Germany consumed in 1879, 122,747,000. There are now said to be seventy-three countries in which it is introduced. Austria, which has the honor of first putting the idea into practical execution, is now said to have cards of the poorest material and most inconvenient form.

It will be observed that the reduction of postage in issuing one cent postal cards in this country has greatly increased the correspondence as well as the revenue of the Post-Office Department, and helped to place the Department on a self-sustaining basis; and so it will be, in my opinion, if we reduce letter postage to 2 cents. It will no doubt have the same effect in this country that it had in England when they adopted penny postage, which was inaugurated in 1840. Below I present a table giving an estimate of letters passing through the mails in Great Britain, beginning with 1838, the last complete year before the general reduction of postage on 5th December, 1839, the maximum inland postage for a single letter was reduced to fourpence. On 20th January, 1840, the postage on all inland letters was reduced to 1 penny per each half ounce.

The estimated number of letters delivered in Great Britain in the year immediately preceding the establishment of penny postage (or 2 cents American money) on 5th December, 1839, and in the years subsequent thereto, as reported by the British post-office, were:

Estimated number of letters from 1838 to December 5, 1839	76,000,000
Estimated number of letters franked from 1838 to December 5, 1839	6,563,000
	82,563,000
Estimated number of letters in 1840	169,000,000
Average of five years, 1841–1845, for each year	227,000,000
Average of five years, 1846–1850, for each year	327,000,000
Average of five years, 1851–1855, for each year	410,000,000
Average of five years, 1856–1860, for each year	523,000,000
Average of five years, 1861–1865, for each year	648,000,000
Average of five years, 1866–1870, for each year	800,000,000
Number of letters in 1871	867,000,000
Number of letters in 1872	885,000,000
Number of letters in 1873	907,000,000
Number of letters in 1874	967,000,000
In 1875	1,008,392,100
In 1876	1,018,955,250
In 1877-'78	1,057,732,300
In 1878-'79	1,097,372,800
In 1879-'80	1,127,997,500

In 1871 the inland letter postage was reduced to such an exent as would enable the public to send through the mails in closed covers not only patterns and samples but also any light article for a moderate charge; thus abolishing altogether the distinction between letters and samples, providing a cheap and convenient postage charge for small parcels, and increasing the standard weight for a single letter to one ounce.

The above table, taken from the reports of the post-office department of Great Britain, shows the very interesting fact that when penny postage was adopted there was a wonderful increase of correspondence, increasing from 82,000,000 of letters passing through the mails in 1838, the last year of higher rates of postage, to 169,000,000 in 1840, the first year of penny postage, and 1,176,000,000 in 1880, which increased the revenues largely, as shown in the "statement of gross and net revenues" published below:

Statement of gross and net revenues and cost of management of the postal service of Great Britain for the year ending January 5, 1838, and for each subsequent year, showing constant increase of receipts and revenues after inaugurating penny postage.

*United States money, $12,988,840.

In October, 1871, the distinctive rate of postage on patterns and samples was abolished; the latter rate on all letters and packets being at the same time reduced to 1 penny per first ounce and under; 1½*d.* if above 1 ounce and not over 2 ounces; 2*d.* from 2 to 4 ounces; 2½*d.* from 4 to 6 ounces; 3*d.* from 6 to 8 ounces; 3½*d.* from 8 to 10 ounces; 4*d.* from 10 to 12 ounces; and 1 penny for each ounce above 12 ounces.

This statement shows that during the last year of high rates of postage in Great Britain (1838) the net revenue amounted to £1,633,764, or $8,168,820 United States money; and it will be seen also that during the first year of penny postage the net revenue amounted to £500,789, or $2,503,745 United States currency; showing that, notwithstanding the great reduction in postage, the revenues decreased only $5,665,065; and that each year thereafter the net revenues increased, until the last report, of 1880, exhibits a balance of surplus of $12,988,840 with penny postage. I also find in the post-office reports of four of the large European countries, estimated number of letters, population, letters per capita, surplus and deficiencies, in Germany, Great Britain, France, and United States, which are of interest. These, as per reports of countries in 1880, were as follows:

Germany—postage, 2½ cents.

Population	45,198,401
Total number of letters	522,689,800
Letters per capita	11½
Surplus, per report for 1880	$4,403,537

Great Britain and Ireland—postage, 2 cents.

Population	34,505,043
Total number of letters	1,176,423,600
Letters per capita	31½
Surplus, per report for 1880	$12,988,840

France—postage, 3 cents.

Population	36,905,788
Total number of letters	488,462,763
Letters per capita	13 1/3
Surplus, per report for 1880	$6,460,729

United States—postage, 3 cents.

Population	50,152,866
Total number of letters	847,830,029
Letters per capita	16 9/10
Deficiency, per report for 1880	$3,227,324 34

Thus it will be seen that Great Britain, with her total population of 34,505,043, and with penny postage, has a correspondence, of letters, numbering 1,176,423,600, and letters per capita 31½, and a surplus of $12,988,840, as against the United States, with a population of 50,152,866, postage 3 cents, correspondence, or letters, numbering 847,830,029, letters per capita 16 9/10, and deficiency $3,227,324.34, showing very clearly that cheap postage creates correspondence and increases revenue; and, at the same time, the standard of weight for the single letter in Great Britain is one ounce, or double that in the United States; so we think we may argue that lower rates of postage create letter-writing, thereby increasing revenue. Let us try it here. We feel quite sure it will work the same in the United States. It is argued that our country is very much larger—mail routes longer than in England, and hence more expensive. Admit it, but our correspondence is nearly one-third less, and standard of weight one-half less. The service has been placed upon the great trunk routes and all principal routes, and the expense in the future will not increase so much in that direction. We find in examining the postage operations of the different countries that there are nineteen principal countries, of which we give below a statement of excess of receipts or of expenditures, and of this number fifteen are in excess, and in nearly all that are in excess the postage is 2 cents, American money:

The above table is one that will bear studying, and careful examination shows so clearly that the cheaper the postage the greater the correspondence and use of the mails, thereby increasing the revenue and placing the Post-Office Department on self-sustaining basis, and a large balance in the Treasury. We submit also a table of domestic rates of postage for letters in different countries, and standard of weights, which is not without interest and only helps to strengthen my argument for two-cent postage:

Domestic rates of postage for letters, January, 1882.

UNITED STATES.

We have published the above several tables in order to show that the experience of the different countries that have enjoyed the system of low rates of postage has been followed with good results, increasing correspondence, and invariably increasing revenue, and placing a surplus in the Treasury.

The United States boasts of her greatness in wealth, in resources, and rapid increase of population, yet we are behind in cheapness of postage rates, and among the few important countries who have not adopted the two-cent rate. This should not be so; we ought to lead rather than follow. Let this Congress signalize itself by adopting this amendment and inaugurating two-cent postage. Our country is growing rapidly. Business extending and increasing with the population, and our Postal Department must grow and increase and keep pace with the growth of the country. Every new facility which helps to give circulation of correspondence, tends greatly to transmit knowledge and intelligence throughout the country; for the cheaper we can make postage to the masses, the greater, more extended, and more frequent will be communication and the multiplication of exchanges one with the other. The Post-Office Department is a public service, and comes nearer to the people than any other branch of the Government, and I hold it our duty to render every convenience, accommodation, and advantage possible to the people of our great country. I have seen it stated that last year 700,000 immigrants came to this country and brought with them $11,000,000 of hard cash; it is estimated one million will come to our shores the present year, and bring with them fifteen millions or more of hard cash. These are they who will with low rates of postage help largely to swell the correspondence and increase the revenues of the Post-Office Department.

I have before me a statement that there are forty-five post-offices which will be advanced to the grade of third-class or Presidential (salaries of $1,000 and upward) on the 1st of July. The probabilities are that a larger number will become Presidential for the quarter ending June 30 than at any previous quarter in the Department's history. This increase is an indication of the prosperity of the country and rapid growth of the population, and must continue. I hope the chairman of the Appropriations Committee will withdraw his point of order, and the committee adopt my amendment and allow it to be incorporated in the bill now under consideration. Surely there is no good reason why Congress should not reduce postage, making it 2 cents for each domestic letter not exceeding one-half ounce in weight.

[During the delivery of the foregoing remarks, when Mr. HILL's time had expired,

Mr. ALDRICH said: I take the floor and yield my time to the gentleman from New Jersey, [Mr. HILL.]

Mr. HISCOCK. Mr. Chairman, I dislike to press my point of order——

Mr. HILL. I will not occupy more than five minutes longer.

Mr. HISCOCK. I desire to be entirely courteous to the gentleman——

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. If the gentleman from New York intends to make his point of order, I hope he will do so now. If this subject is to come up for discussion, I have some views which I would like to submit.

Mr. HISCOCK. If I am driven to it, I must insist on the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. If the point of order is insisted upon, the Chair must sustain it.

Mr. HILL. I shall occupy but a moment or two longer. I have not taken much of the time of the House in discussion.

Mr. HISCOCK. All right.

Mr. HILL resumed and concluded his remarks as already given.]

The CHAIRMAN. A point of order having been made upon the amendment, the Chair sustains the point.

The Clerk read as follows:

Armories and arsenals:
For the Rock Island arsenal, Rock Island, Illinois, as follows:
For completing shop I, a wood-working and leather-working shop for the arsenal, $58,500.
For shop H, an iron-finishing shop for the armory, $80,000.

Mr. WILLIS. Mr. Chairman, I desire to call the attention of the Committee of the Whole to an important and suggestive omission in this bill. In the very beginning of the present Congress a bill was introduced continuing, in accordance with existing law, the civil-service commission and asking an appropriation for that purpose.

AN OMISSION AND A COMMISSION.

That commission was established by act of March 3, 1871, which is now section 1753 of the Revised Statutes of the United States. It inaugurated valuable reforms in our public affairs. While the law has never been repealed, the funds to carry on the work of reform were, after two years of experience, refused by Congress. The commission, however, is yet in existence, and since 1877 Hon. Dorman B. Eaton, its distinguished chairman, upon the formal request of President Hayes, visited England, where he devoted several months to a thorough and exhaustive inquiry into the abuses and reforms of the civil service in Great Britain and their bearing upon American politics. The report which he made as the result of his investigations was transmitted to Congress by President Hayes in December, 1879, in a message in which he justly refers to it as an "elaborate and comprehensive history of the whole subject." This and other invaluable service of Mr. Eaton in his official capacity as chairman of the commission were rendered without compensation. Not even the personal expenses of his trip to England were met by the Government.

The continuance of the operations of the civil-service commission is demanded by the highest interests of the country, but it would be humiliating and unjustifiable if not disgraceful to ask further work at its hands without an appropriation for the purpose. Such an appropriation would have been proper and germane to this bill. It was confidently believed that it would be here. Nowhere in its voluminous pages and multitudinous subjects do I find such an appropriation; nowhere is there a single clause or sentence in regard to the civil service of our country. Nor in the remarkable speech which we have just heard from the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations, ranging as it did from heaven to earth as he gave in detail the grand achievements of the Republican party during this Congress, did he see fit to refer to that subject, the omission of which is more important than any act of commission that he has enumerated.

A SUNDRY CIVIL BILL IN WHICH THE APPROPRIATIONS ARE "SUNDRY" BUT NOT "CIVIL," (SERVICE.)

Here, sir, is a bill of nearly one hundred pages, containing appropriations in behalf of nearly every object on earth, in the air, or in the sea—the blind, the lame, the halt, the insane, the living, and the dead are all provided for in this bill. I desire to call attention to some of its provisions.

Mr. CANNON. Will the gentleman yield to me for a question?

Mr. WILLIS. Yes, sir.

Mr. CANNON. I know the gentleman does not want to mislead the House. He says the blind, the insane, &c., are all provided for in this bill. I want to call his attention to the fact that the blind are not all provided for in this bill. On the contrary, there is a permanent appropriation, not carried into any annual bill, that goes to his blind institution year after year at Louisville.

Mr. WILLIS. If I wished to reply to my friend from Illinois, who, by the way, is a member of the committee reporting this bill, in the same happy and facetious vein in which he has spoken, I would say that I referred in my remark to the political blindness of which he and his Republican colleagues are such faithful representatives, and in this sense I am sure he would not have the temerity to deny that the blind are "all provided for," and most blindly at that. [Applause and laughter.]

As my friend, however, in referring to the permanent appropriation for the American Printing-House for the Blind, doubtless intended to make a personal "point" upon me, as the introducer and advocate of the bill for that purpose, I say to him that I am ready to assume the responsibility for that appropriation, as it was one of the most deserving and justifiable in the whole history of the American Congress. It was an appropriation giving the interest on $250,000 for the printing of raised letters for the blind, to be distributed to his own State and among all the States of the Union. The institution receiving this benefaction happens to be in my district, where the State of Kentucky owns a magnificent building whose use it donated to the blind of the whole country. I am glad to recall and thank the gentleman for the vote and aid he gave in securing that appropriation, whose benefits are not local but national, and have called down upon the Forty-fifth Congress the praise and gratitude of this afflicted class throughout the whole civilized world. [Applause.]

But, Mr. Chairman, to "return to our sheep." I was analyzing the items of this "sundry civil bill." Here are $25,000 to furnish "a supply of pure water to the insane" in the city of Washington. It was hardly necessary for the committee to report that the people here who made such a demand were "insane." [Laughter.] Here we have $15,000 for the "Ute commission." How many commissions, sir, does this Congress want? After the "electoral commission" I thought we would never create another, and yet we have the "Utah commission," the "tariff commission," which will never commit anything, and now here is the "Ute commission." This body will be known in history as the "Congress in commission."

A MEMBER. And yet you want another, the "civil-service commission."

Mr. WILLIS. That commission is already in existence, and before I get through I hope to convince my friend that it is now more needed than ever in order to keep these others and their numerous officers in the discharge of their duties.

Going further in this bill, Mr. Chairman, I find here an appropriation of $75,000 to enable "Venus" to have a "transit," [laughter;] and $55,000 "for the suppression of bigamy," a subject which the eloquent chairman of the Committee on Appropriations [Mr. HISCOCK] has just referred to as one of the claims of our Republican friends to the confidence of the people, and that too in the face of the fact that this same "suppression" is one of their unfulfilled promises of twenty-five years' standing.

Here too is an item of $180,000 for the "magnetic map of Western North America," and $115,000 for the "introduction of gourami and other useful food-fishes." Here is $1,000 for a "lycopodium," and there is not a man on this floor, from the chairman of the committee up or down, who can to-day define what a lycopodium is. [Laughter.] Here is $50,000 "to establish quarantine stations for neat cattle imported." Think of that; a quarantine for cows! [Laughter.]

This, sir, is but a brief epitome of this wonderful bill. In vain, however, do we scrutinize its innumerable items, aggregating a grand total of $23,680,865, to discover a single one in reference to administrative reform. [Applause.]

WHY HAS THE COMMITTEE FAILED TO ACT?

For one, Mr. Chairman, I am surprised and grieved at this failure of the Committee on Appropriations to make the allowance authorized by law for this subject. I shall be glad, and I am sure this committee and the country will be glad, to have from them some satisfactory explanation of their action. Certainly it could not have been lack of funds. The very largest amount that the friends of civil-service reform have asked at the hands of this Congress has been $25,000. With a surplus in our Treasury during the last fiscal year of over $100,000,000, and with the official recommendation of the Ways and Means Committee of this Congress, inspired and indorsed by the message of the President and the reports of the Secretary of the Treasury and the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, that from fifty to seventy millions should be returned to the people—which has not been done—and with the further surplus during the current year just ended of over one hundred and thirty millions—with these facts before us we will hardly be told that the paltry sum of $25,000 for the civil-service commission was refused for economic or pecuniary reasons.

But if not that, what was the cause? Will it be claimed that it was and is an accidental omission, that the subject was not formally before the committee. On the contrary it was before them authoritatively and in two or three different forms. President Arthur in his first message urged upon Congress this appropriation for the purposes of civil-service reform. Subsequently, as far back as the 1st of last March, in responding to a resolution which I had the honor to introduce, calling for information in regard to the sum of $15,000 appropriated by the Forty-sixth Congress for this same purpose, the President sent to this House another message in which he again recommended an "annual appropriation of $25,000 for the promotion of efficiency in the different branches of the civil service." Both of these recommendations, together with a bill which I introduced to the same effect, were referred to the Committee on Appropriations. Ample notice was therefore given to the committee and ample time and opportunity to appropriate for this purpose.

With an overflowing Treasury, with the urgent and repeated recommendations of the President of the United States, with half a year to inquire into it, with an aroused public sentiment in every direction demanding action upon this subject, why, I ask again, has the committee in this omnium gatherum bill of over twenty millions ignored or refused it?

Was it because the work of the civil-service commission was unsatisfactory or is now thought to be unnecessary? At the proper time I shall offer an amendment to this bill, when I shall present some facts touching the origin, history, and operations of that commission. Its services are of record and are of admitted value to the country; its suspension, even temporarily, was a public misfortune; its establishment was an important step in the direction of securing an efficient, economical, and honorable administration of public affairs. The propriety and necessity of its existence cannot be successfully denied by any one familiar with the facts.

COMMITTEE ON APPROPRIATIONS NOT THE ONLY COMMITTEE IN DEFAULT.

But, sir, whatever reasons may be urged in defense of the Committee on Appropriations in this matter there is another committee of this House whose conduct has been even more extraordinary, unjustifiable, and disappointing to the friends of civil-service reform. I allude of course to that committee which is specially charged with the duty of investigating and reporting upon the reform of the civil service of our Government, the committee whose members were presumably selected because of the deep and abiding interest, the profound thought, and the enthusiastic zeal and devotion which they felt and had manifested in the important work of correcting the abuses and defects of our administrative system.

Availing myself of the freedom of debate allowed in Committee of the Whole, I desire to state two or three facts, and then, with all due respect and the most affectionate consideration, to submit one or two questions to the members of that committee, collectively and individually, which I trust will be received in the same spirit of candor and kindliness which prompts them. But first to the facts.

MEASURES FOR REFORM NOW BEFORE CONGRESS.

During the last Congress I introduced into this House a bill "to reform the civil service of the United States." Subsequently, and in the same Congress, at the instance of a number of gentlemen who had given much study to the subject, I presented two other bills, one "to prevent extortion from persons in the public service and bribery and coercion by such persons," a bill leveled at political assessments, that "sum of all villainies," [applause;] the other "to regulate and improve the civil service of the United States," the latter being the same bill so ably and eloquently championed by the distinguished Senator from Ohio [Mr. PENDLETON] that it now deservedly wears his name. Both of these bills are now pending before the Select Committee on Reform in the Civil Service. Both are aimed at our false, inefficient, and unrepublican system of civil service, that fountain head from which flows nearly every stream of political corruption in our land. The complete overthrow of that system is, sir, in my judgment, the great demand of the hour.

CIVIL-SERVICE REFORM THE DEMAND OF THE HOUR.

It should be destroyed, root and branch. To such an issue presented in the bills I have referred to I would invite this committee and the country. It is an issue of public virtue, an issue of peace and fraternity, an issue which rises far above party politics, as it involves the welfare and concerns the honor of our whole people. Upon that issue the public judgment is already made up. In every forum of opinion our civil service has been denounced as a national disgrace and a national danger. The press has spoken out boldly, patriotically, and sympathetically upon the subject. Associations have been formed in all the leading cities of the Union, composed of the most intelligent and public-spirited representatives of all parties, whose avowed object is the overthrow of the present system of civil service. The Legislatures of many States, Vermont and South Carolina in the van, have instructed their Senators and requested their Representatives to promote the necessary reforms. Numerous State conventions, Republican, Greenback, and Democratic, have put themselves upon record to the same effect. The platform of the last Massachusetts convention is an admirable epitome of the whole subject, and presents the most emphatic and definite demand for reform adopted by either party in any State. I read it for the edification of the Committee on Appropriations and the Select Committee on Reform in the Civil Service.

THE VOICE OF MASSACHUSETTS AND PENNSYLVANIA.

That convention assembled at Worcester last fall, and after denouncing the present system of "appointment by favor in reward of personal or partisan claims" as "a system aristocratic because open to the few while closed to the many, a system affording the fewest restraints against abuses, tending to extravagance and inefficiency in the public business, to selfishness, corruption, and violence in politics, and to aggravation of all 'the baneful effects of the spirit of party' against which Washington in his farewell address solemnly warned his countrymen," they declare—I ask the attention of this Republican House to the declarations of the Republican convention of the Old Bay State of Massachusetts—that convention declares that—

> The needed reforms are the relief and exclusion of the members of the legislative branch from the business of selecting office-holders in the departments of administration; prohibition of assessments upon the salaries of office-holders for party purposes; appointments to clerkships to depend in the first instance upon successfully passing a proper examination, open to all applicants without distinction of party; and, secondly, upon satisfactory service during a period of probation; tenure of office during good behavior or for a reasonable fixed term, with promotion for meritorious performance of duty, and no removals except for cause.

What more than this could the most enthusiastic civil-service reformer ask? But such demands for administrative reform are not confined to Massachusetts. They are not the only Republicans who have declared in favor of this great issue. Even Pennsylvania, yielding to the inexorable logic of events, has made confession of her innumerable sins and stands now at the altar of civil-service reform, clothed in sackcloth and ashes, asking of the injured innocence of her citizens indemnity for the past and security for the future. Listen for a moment to the words of penitence and the promises of reform which pour from her lips.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. Which wing of the Republican party of Pennsylvania does that come from?

Mr. WILLIS. It comes from the Simon-Cameron pure, iron-clad wing of the party. [Laughter.]

The use of patronage to promote personal political ends is unequivocally condemned, and all offices bestowed within the party shall be upon the sole basis of fitness. Competent and faithful officers should not be removed except for cause. Non-elective minor offices should be filled in accordance with rules established by law. We condemn compulsory assessments for political purposes and proscription for failure to respond either to such assessments or to requests for voluntary contributions, and any policy of political proscription as unjust. Finally, public office constitutes a high trust to be administered solely for the people whose interest must be paramount to those of persons or parties, and it should be invariably conducted with the same efficiency, economy, and integrity as are expected in the execution of private trusts.

Mr. Chairman and brethren, is not that a noble confession of faith? Such faith have I seen nowhere save in Massachusetts. Ought we not to "rejoice with exceeding great joy" at this most remarkable conversion? Ought we not to congratulate this venerable mother in Republican Israel upon the noble stand she has made for political purity, honor, and honesty? I call upon my Democratic colleagues to forget all partisan feeling and extend to her the right hand of friendship and of fellowship. She will need all the encouragement and saving grace we can spare. The path which she has marked out for herself in these resolutions is a narrow and a thorny one.

But let us indulge the hope that, sustained by our sympathy, she may be enabled to resist the temptations of the devil and of DON CAMERON, [laughter,] and that, resting upon the strong arms and faithful hearts of her loving children, the grand old Keystone Commonwealth will move down the solemn pathway of the ages, her hand wielding the scepter of a wise, honest, and beneficent legislation, her feet shod with the light of political righteousness, and her brow wreathed with the imperishable chaplet of truth, virtue, and happiness! [Applause.]

But, sir, Massachusetts and Pennsylvania are not alone in their position upon this subject. I might stand here by the hour and read the resolutions of Republican State conventions, from Maine and New York to California, denouncing political assessments, condemning the present system of appointments to office, and emphasizing in strong and eloquent words the necessity of reform.

NATIONAL CONVENTIONS DECLARE FOR REFORM.

Nor has public sentiment in opposition to these evils and abuses been confined to State conventions. Our national conventions in three successive Presidential contests have been equally clear, explicit, and emphatic in their demand for reform. As far back as the campaign of 1872, the liberal Republicans in their national convention at Cincinnati proclaimed that "thorough reform of the civil service is one of the most pressing necessities of the hour; that honesty, capacity, and fidelity constitute the only valid claims to public employment; that the offices of the Government cease to be a matter of arbitrary favoritism and patronage; and that public station shall become again a post of honor."

The regular Republicans met the same year at Philadelphia. I call the attention of my friends over the way to the resolution then adopted:

Any system of the civil service under which the subordinate positions of the Government are considered rewards for mere party zeal is fatally deteriorating; and we therefore favor a reform of the system by laws which shall abolish the evils of patronage, and make honesty, efficiency, and fidelity the essential qualifications for public positions, without practically creating a life tenure of office.

It will be seen, Mr. Chairman, by the most casual observer that the year 1872 was a good year for civil-service reform. The resolutions upon the subject that were fulminated over the country in number, in length, and in intensity of eloquence rivaled the resolutions of '98. Denunciations and protestations were the order of the day. The good seeds of reform were scattered far and wide, and with a lavish hand. The harvest has not yet made its appearance. [Laughter.]

In 1876 there was another Presidential election, and by a curious coincidence there was also another outburst of sentiment in favor of a reformed civil service. This time our Republican friends were moved to "rejoice in the quickened conscience of the people concerning political affairs." If they could have foreseen the following ides of November, I doubt whether they would have encouraged this renaissance of political virtue and morality. "The invariable rule in appointments," they declare, "should have reference to the honesty, fidelity, and capacity of the appointees, giving to the party in power those places where harmony and vigor of administration require its policy to be represented, but permitting all others to be filled by persons selected with sole reference to the efficiency of the public service and the right of all citizens to share in the honor of rendering faithful service to the country." Is not this a clear, explicit, and forcible statement of the needed legislation? The results accomplished during the succeeding administration I will not now discuss, as my only object at present is to call attention to the public and emphatic demand for reform which was made in that Presidential contest.

In 1880 the "quickened conscience of the people concerning political affairs" again made itself manifest, and our Republican friends again "assumed the pressure" and poured forth their burdened souls in the following:

The Republican party adopts the declaration of President Hayes, that reform in the civil service shall be thorough, radical, and complete. To that end it demands—the co-operation of the legislative with the executive department of the Government, and that Congress shall so legislate that fitness, ascertained by proper, practical tests, shall admit to the public service.

Listen to the demand, ye representatives of the Republican party—

What language, Mr. Chairman, could be clearer and stronger than the resolutions of these State and national conventions? Where will you find a more just and vigorous denunciation of partisan tyranny, of corrupt patronage, of official irresponsibility, and the other administrative evils and abuses which have brought disaster, disgrace, and demoralization upon us? What fuller committal could be made to the necessity of reform and to the methods of competitive examination, periods of probation and removals for cause by which that reform is to be in part at least accomplished?

PRINCIPLES AGAINST PRACTICE.

Is there, can there be any doubt as to the meaning and merits of these solemn and repeated declarations? Were they mere empty expressions extorted by the pressure of public feeling and the force of circumstances—the reluctant recognition by the politicians of the "quickened conscience" of the people? Were they an unmeaning commonplace thrown out as a compliment of the season to the civil-service reform sentiment of the country, to be disregarded and thrown aside when they had served the purpose of the hour, to be hid away with the exhausted torches, the faded banners, transparencies, and other trumpery of the campaign until the exigencies of another election called them forth. Is the political virtue, the reform of the Republican party, akin to that of the old couplet:

When the devil was sick, the devil a monk would be;
When the devil was well, the devil a monk was he.

[Laughter.]

Who will dare make an admission so humiliating and disgraceful not only to his party but to his country? Who upon this floor will consent to hold or to justify such a position? Who will not indorse and reiterate the noble sentiments of the lamented Garfield in his letter accepting the Presidency:

The doctrines announced by the convention just held are not the temporary devices of a party to attract votes and carry an election. They are deliberate convictions resulting from a careful study of the spirit of our institutions, the events of our history, and the best impulses of our people. In my judgment, these principles should control the legislation and administration of the Government.

Mr. Arthur, the candidate for Vice-President, is no less explicit. In his letter of acceptance he says:

These views—

As to the reform of the civil service—which I have long held, repeatedly declared, and uniformly applied when called upon to act, I find embodied in the resolution, which of course I approve.

Who can assert that victory would have perched upon the Republican banner in the last contest except for the solemn pledges and assurances of the party and its nominees that these crying evils, so long the source of solicitude and humiliation, should be ended? After these pledges and promises pronounced by three successive national conventions, indorsed by the candidates, and confirmed by the almost unanimous voice of the country, it would be miserable hypocrisy, it would be trifling in the last degree with the sovereign people of these United States, to refuse to enforce by deeds what has been so repeatedly and emphatically urged by words. Would it not be the climax of arrogance, if not of crime, to disregard, to insult, and defy a popular demand so well defined, so just and reasonable, so universal as this?

WHAT HAS CONGRESS DONE?

And yet, Mr. Chairman, what steps have been taken to reform the great abuses thus confessed to exist? How have these solemn pledges before the country been redeemed? An indignant people in the most public, authentic, and authoritative manner have asked that the present system of official service shall be set aside and another established which shall secure to the country its noblest virtue, its greatest intelligence, and its purest patriotism. What response has been made to this high, just, and most honorable demand? What has this Congress done for the reform of our civil service? Has its action been in harmony with the well-known sentiment of the country? Let the facts, let the Journals of this House, answer the question.

On the first Monday of last December this august body convened. Within a month we were organized and ready for work. A resolution was reported from the Committee on Rules and unanimously passed creating the "Select Committee on Reform in the Civil Service." Out of the two hundred and ninety-three members of this House eleven gentlemen were elected and placed upon that committee. Was it not expected that they would promptly give their time and their talents to the work especially assigned to them? How have they met this expectation? Immediately after the assembling of Congress, upon the first call of the States, I introduced the two bills which I hold in my hand. Other gentlemen upon this floor introduced similar bills. These bills call for and provide the very legislation demanded by the State and national resolutions I have cited. They are, as I shall show if time is allowed me, free from all objection and are indorsed by leading Republicans in the country.

For over six months the committee has had these bills. They have met; they have meditated; they have labored upon this great problem of civil-service reform; and here, Mr. Chairman, is the result. Here is the terrible blow they have struck at the spoils system. Here is the legislative enactment at whose trumpet-note the walls of this modern Jericho are to tumble. Hear it: H. R. 4429,—"A bill to enlarge the powers and duties of the Department of Agriculture." [Great laughter.] That, sir, is the result, the glorious outcome, of six months' labors and lucubrations.

Think of it, ponder it, my countrymen! Here is a question of the gravest and greatest importance, a question which comes home to the bosoms and business, which touches the interests of all our people, a question which has challenged the ripest scholarship and the profoundest statesmanship of England and of the world, a question now of the most vital and pressing concern in our own country, and which for successive years has been urged upon the American Congress—purification of the civil service, reform—reform inside and outside, reform from the highest to the lowest, reform at home and abroad, reform in the Chief Executive, reform in all the offices, reform in all the branches and departments and dependencies of the Government, judicial, legislative, executive, and ministerial; reform, not partial, not temporary, not incomplete and spasmodic, but full, ample, sincere, thorough, and immediate reform throughout all the length and breadth of our land. [Applause.] This is the great, the inexorable demand of the hour. This problem, affecting the destinies for good or evil of the American Republic, with its fifty million people, this issue so grand, so solemn, so tremendous, so full of inspiration, was submitted in this Congress to the Select Committee on Reform in the Civil Service; and after wrestling with it half a year they bring in this thing, this bill to distribute turnip and cabbage seed more freely and liberally over the country and requiring Dr. Loring, the eloquent and learned and accomplished head of the Department of Agriculture, to report immediately to Congress—I quote its exact words—"the number, value, and condition of all domestic animals in the United States," [laughter]—a bill to reform your pumpkin pies and to improve the breed of your mules and mustang ponies!

Waft, waft ye winds, the story;
And ye, ye waters, roll.

This is the grand, the invaluable contribution to civil-service reform; this is the magnificent record which this committee has made for itself in this Forty-seventh Congress—blowing a penny-whistle when it should have been sounding a bugle blast. [Laughter.]

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. Who is on that committee?

Mr. WILLIS. I will come to that.

"UNDER WHICH KING?"—A BRIEF ANALYSIS OF THE COMMITTEE.

Mr. Chairman, I confess when I first read the names of the able and distinguished gentlemen composing this committee my heart beat high with hope. I felt that the long-promised and much-needed legislation was at hand. But, when month after month passed by, and no result or word of promise came, that hope grew fainter and fainter, and I concluded to analyze the composition and character of the committee; to inquire its whereabouts upon this question; to examine it individually, collectively, geographically, historically, æsthetically, and politically. [Laughter.] Now, the first glance at the list disclosed the geographical fact that four of its seven majority members hail from two States—Ohio and Michigan.

Knowing that the genius of the Lake State had been consecrated for years to another great problem of legislation—the proper and full distribution of our surplus revenues in the creation and development of the rivers and harbors of the country—quorum pars fuit, or "whereof they were mostly which;" knowing that the regenerated statesmanship of the modern Buckeye could be aroused by nothing less than the Presidency of the United States, I was afraid that this draft in favor of a reformed civil service which the Speaker had drawn upon these two shrinking States was a little more than they could stand and might be dishonored. I was afraid that reform was not fully assured. This fear, based as I have said upon geographical considerations, was increased when I examined the committee individually and historically. I hold in my hand a list of its members. "Select Committee on Reform in the Civil Service."

HON. GODLOVE S. ORTH—THE HEAD AND FRONT OF CIVIL-SERVICE OFFENDING.

And first, as to its chairman, Hon. GODLOVE S. ORTH, of Indiana. Who is Mr. ORTH? He is, sir, known to this House and to the country. He is an able, generous-hearted, distinguished statesman. But why is he made the chairman of this particular committee.

What claims has he as a civil-service reformer? What inclination, nay, what time has he had to devote to this important subject? Do we not all know, and is it not known to the whole world, that since the beginning of this Congress, jointly with the distinguished gentleman from New York, [Mr. ROBINSON,] every day and every hour of Brother ORTH'S time has been occupied in the noble and æsthetic duty of twisting the tail of the British lion? [Laughter and applause.] That he felt called upon to do, and I congratulate him that he did do it, in defense of American honor. I voted with him and with my friend from New York upon all these questions in behalf of Irish liberty. I accept and applaud the lofty spirit which once prompted the eloquent Grattan to declare on the floor of the Irish Parliament, "I will never be contented as long as an Irishman shall wear the link of a British chain clanking to his limbs; he may be poor, but he shall not be in irons." That noble work, however, Mr. ORTH did as a member of another committee—the Committee on Foreign Affairs. And, sir, as the tastes and previous experience of the distinguished gentleman point to foreign affairs as his proper theater of action I hope he will permit me to suggest that those tastes can be amply gratified by devoting himself exclusively to the duties of this select committee whose chairman he is—as I imagine that there is no "affair" so "foreign" to his purpose and desire as the reform of our civil service. [Laughter.] I am confirmed in this opinion not only by his failure to act upon the bills pending before his committee but also by the discovery of his name attached to a little billet doux sent out a few years ago, levying a "contribution" upon the office-holders of the country—a subject which I shall consider presently somewhat at length.

TO THE RESCUE!—HON. MAJOR BENJAMIN FRANKLIN BUTTERWORTH.

But, sir, Brother ORTH need not, and does not, I apprehend, feel lonely in his views and intentions upon this subject of civil service, for I find here associated with him that valiant soldier of reform, Hon. Major BENJAMIN FRANKLIN BUTTERWORTH. [Laughter.]

I hold in my hand, Mr. Chairman, "Miscellaneous Document No. 23, Forty-sixth Congress, second session." It is entitled here "Testimony relative to the Congressional election in the first and second Congressional districts of Ohio." It ought to be entitled "The whole art and mystery of the modern Congressional canvass; or, how to do it in six easy lessons." [Laughter and applause.]

Under such a title it would meet with a ready sale among prospective candidates. It is, as you see, a large book of over seven hundred pages. It is a voluminous as well as a valuable contribution to the civil-service literature of the century. It is a living epistle of political purity, to be read of all men. It is a perpetual memorial of the efforts and valuable services which my friend BUTTERWORTH rendered in the early days of his political life in behalf of purity of elections, free ballots, and a reformed civil service. There is some "mighty interesting reading" in these papers.

I desire, with the permission of the committee, very briefly to call attention to some of that reading. Here are facts and incidents, little episodes and experiences, that it might be well to cite, because I doubt not they would awaken a responsive and sympathetic echo in the minds and hearts, and perhaps in the pockets, of many of the gentlemen surrounding me to-day. [Laughter.] I will not read them, Mr. Chairman. The reminiscences, however vivid and instructive, might be "mournful to the soul." I must content myself for the present with giving in Brother BUTTERWORTH'S own graphic words an epitome of his trials and a brief reference to the means by which he triumphantly overcame them, either of which would entitle him to stand side by side with his worthy chairman in this great cause of reform now intrusted to their hands. I read to you, brethren, from page 294.

Mr. MILLER. Are you a Baptist preacher?

Mr. WILLIS. No, I am only an exhorter, and I want some day to tackle you as the biggest sinner on that side.

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. What page are you reading from?

Mr. WILLIS. From page 295. I give chapter and verse and will reproduce it exactly without dotting an i or crossing a t:

Question. Tell us what legitimate expenses there are connected with an election that would consume $2,500?

Answer. You contribute to clubs, for meetings, for bands, for buggy and hack hire; you are called upon for benevolent institutions in the city, for every meeting designed to aid any charity, for every enterprise to alleviate the sufferings of the yellow-fever victims, and all other victims; in short, I do not think there was an enterprise on foot in this city to which I was not asked to contribute. * * * I distributed documents, I distributed newspapers. Usually, when I was out with a gentleman, or a party, I attended to the paying of the bills. I was not inhospitable or unamiable during the campaign.

Q. Then you regarded yourself in the light of a trustee?

A. Trustee if you please; a trustee without being obliged to render an account.

[Laughter.]

If I started out—

Continues he in these affecting reminiscences—and met Mr. John Smith or John Jones on the corner, and he said: "BUTTERWORTH, here is a poor widow woman who has lost her husband, and has five children down with the measles, and we are getting up a little festival for her, and you have got to take twenty tickets at half a dollar apiece," I would perhaps say, "I cannot do that, but I will take ten tickets," and I would take them and pay for them, and I kept no account of it.

And then he reflectively, pathetically, and truthfully adds:

People think that when a man becomes a candidate he becomes public property, and each one calls on him for some sort of contribution, forgetting that everybody else is making similar demands, and if the candidate refuses any of them they will go away and say he is a mean, selfish fellow.

[Laughter.]

Ah! bitter, bitter indeed, are the trials of a candidate, and who of us, Mr. Chairman, has not sadly realized it?

Then, on page 305, in still further pursuance of these efforts at civil-service reform, he tells us:

I paid for bands, too; wherever there was a band wanted I paid for it. Men would come and say: "We are going to have a parade, and we want to have a band;" and I had the comfort of being serenaded several times, and such things cost, you know.

[Laughter.]

He literally, as well as figuratively, paid for the "music."

THE STORY OF EPHRAIM'S CONVERSION.

But, Mr. Chairman, you ask, if these were the trials and difficulties that beset Brother BUTTERWORTH, how in the name of civil-service reform did he overcome them? Here again is the key to the mystery. There was a man, and his name was Ephraim, [laughter,] Ephraim Holland, of national reputation. Like his ancient namesake this Ephraim was unsanctified and wedded to his idols. The idols of this Ephraim I find here were "repeating" and "ballot-box stuffing." Now, my friend BUTTERWORTH gives in his testimony a touching reminiscence of Eph. He tells you he was put in the penitentiary for "ballot-stuffing," but he got out, and when he got out the time of the "singing of birds" and of elections was at hand.

Brother BUTTERWORTH just then met him. The time, place, and circumstance of the meeting are all given here in his own words:

I was nibbling cheese out of a box while we were talking.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. Who did the nibbling?

Mr. WILLIS. Brother BUTTERWORTH first and then Ephraim. I read from page 297:

Said I, "Mr. Holland, do you think it possible to have a fair election in the fourth ward?" Said he, "Oh, yes; I think we can." Said I, "What do you ask?" He named three or four or five hundred. I said, "No; I won't do that." Finally I said, "I will give you one hundred and fifty if you will secure an honest election." Holland said finally, "Well, I will do it."

And thus, Mr. Chairman, by one hundred and fifty reasons was Ephraim persuaded to leave his idols and to become a meek and lowly follower of reform, and Brother BUTTERWORTH enabled to overcome the trials which had beset him. Brother BUTTERWORTH therefore owes his appointment to the Select Committee on the Reform of the Civil Service, first, to the fact that having passed through the fiery ordeal, whose details we have here, he was purified and fitted to minister at so holy an altar, and secondly, to the belief that his reformatory powers so gloriously manifested upon Ephraim Holland might be needed in the conversion of some of his co-committeemen and the country. Who, with these facts before him, will deny that our brother has peculiar fitness and special qualifications for the delicate and responsible duties of reform?

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. Now, may I ask my friend a question?

Mr. WILLIS. Certainly.

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. Does the gentleman know that same Ephraim Holland was the chosen champion of Democracy in my district for a long time; that he was in all their councils; that he was the agent of Samuel J. Tilden in Cincinnati——

Mr. WILLIS. If you will allow me sufficient time I will answer all your questions.

Mr. ATHERTON. What was Mr. BUTTERWORTH doing with that kind of a fellow? [Laughter.]

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. And do you know that by definite arrangement he had charge of the Democratic campaigns in that district for ten years, regularly?

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. And you were trying to seduce him.

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. Yes; and we did seduce him from his bad practices. And do you know the only complaint made against me was that I prevented him from doing for the Democracy what he had theretofore regularly done, and confessedly done, the stuffing of the ballot-boxes? Do you know this record discloses that after this not a ballot-box was stuffed or attempted to be stuffed; that there was no attempt at repeating; that I simply prevented what your party had confessedly done every year there for ten years, and without which you never could have carried the district once?

Mr. WILLIS. In reply to the gentleman I desire to say, in the first place, that I do know that Ephraim Holland was connected for a time, or claimed to be, with the Democratic party. But I have Brother BUTTERWORTH'S sworn authority for saying that the Democratic party kicked him out, and here it is in this very volume.

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. Yes; they kicked him out after they were no longer able to use him for their iniquitous purposes. When he quit his nefarious practices you would have nothing more to do with him, and you denounced him when he ceased to do your corrupt bidding, as the record shows.

Mr. WILLIS. My dear BUTTERWORTH, you have entirely misapprehended my position. You do me a great, but I am sure not an intended, wrong. I stand here to-day vindicating your reputation as the civil-service reformer of the period. [Laughter.] I am pointing out how you reformed Ephraim Holland; how you recalled him from the path of sin and iniquity; how, while nibbling that cheese, your glance fell upon him and immediately, as though touched by the spear of Ithuriel, he was transformed, and stood forth an angel of light and purity. [Great laughter.] You do me great wrong, and I am sure that after I get through you will come up and apologize for it.

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. I do apologize to my friend.

Mr. WILLIS. I accept it; all is forgiven. [Laughter.]

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. But I could not imagine how it was that the gentleman could stand up here and attempt to rebuke anybody for employing any means that would tend to defeat the frauds and corruptions which he knows were practiced in Cincinnati for ten years.

Mr. WILLIS. I do not want to make a point on the gentleman, and have no reason to be understood as commenting upon the contents of this volume for the purpose he seems to think. If I had wanted to do so there are other matters which I could call up.

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. I want to say one thing more.

Mr. WILLIS. If the gentleman——

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. One word more and then I will quit. I wish to call attention to the tender way in which you provided for Ephraim Holland while he was in jail for his corrupt practices in 1876. You carpeted his cell, and furnished him with money so that he could live on the fat of the land, for fear he would tell what else he had been engaged in.

Mr. WILLIS. We have admitted our sins, but you have not admitted yours. Now, take your seat, please. Your repeated interruptions show that this is not a happy reminiscence, as I intended it should be; you are wincing. When you get into a good humor I will come back to you again. [Laughter.]

HON. ROSWELL G. HORR.

In glancing over this list I find here the name of the able and distinguished gentleman from Michigan, Hon. R. G. HORR. Who, on this floor, would deny that he had the reputation before the country as the "Jumbo" of this whole movement—the "boss" civil-service reformer of the period? Who will challenge his right to stand on the very inmost sanctuary of the temple of reform?

A "VOLUNTARY CONTRIBUTION" TO CHAIRMAN HUBBELL.

But leaving him for a moment, I find on this committee another name not unknown to fame just now. Can it be? Yes, it is "my dear HUBBELL." [Laughter.] JAY A. HUBBELL, here among the guardians and defenders of a purified civil service.

"Dear HUBBELL;" dear at all times, dear under all circumstances, but especially and superlatively dear just now—"under the peculiar circumstances, in which the country finds itself placed." Especially dear to "all who look with dread upon the possibility of the restoration of the Democratic party to the control of the Government." For particulars "see small bills," [laughter,] alias "circulars."

For an appropriate introduction to the country of this great reformer I turn to the muse of history. From the last edition of the Congressional Directory, that great depository of patriotic achievements and of noble reminiscences, I find, on turning to the thirty-seventh page, that—

JAY A. HUBBELL was born at Avon, Michigan.

Can it be that he is the "Bard of Avon," the "sweet singer of Michigan?" [Laughter.] But the sentence to which I desire to call especial attention is this:

Was chairman of the Republican congressional committee in the Presidential campaign of 1880, and passed the summer at Washington, where his services were of great value in securing the result.

These are the triple claims upon which his reputation as a civil-service reformer rests. "Chairman of campaign committee"—"passed the summer at Washington," and rendered "great service." Now, it is known to you, Mr. Chairman, and to all of us that these Congressional sketches are all "voluntary contributions."

Mr. RANDALL. Not "voluntary assessments." [Laughter.]

Mr. WILLIS. And that Major Poore, the compiler, like some others in the world, fixes the exact amount of the "contribution." Many a liberal-minded Congressman, like our Government employés, would be liable to "contribute" more except for this prudent prohibition. It therefore happens that Brother HUBBELL, either out of deference to Major Poore's wishes or because of that reluctance which "modest merit ever wears," refrained from giving in detail the perils and labors and temptations which girt him while "passing the summer at Washington;" he has failed to particularize his special "services" as chairman, or to state the exact "value" thereof. Fortunately for his fame, fortunately for our country and for the cause of civil-service reform, I have it in my power to give the desired and necessary information at least upon the last two points of his record—to supply the "missing links" in the grand chain which binds him to immortality.

I have before me, Mr. Chairman, Senate report No. 427, Forty-sixth Congress, second session. It is entitled, "Assessments for political purposes." It was made by Mr. Wallace, from the "Select Committee to Inquire into Alleged Frauds in the Late Elections." Accompanying the report is the testimony, comprising ninety pages. From the testimony of Mr. George C. Gorham, who in 1878 held the double office of Secretary of the Senate of the United States and secretary of the Republican Congressional committee, of which Mr. HUBBELL was the chairman, I quote:

Question. I understand that altogether the subscriptions to your fund amounted to about $106,000?

Answer. Yes, sir.

This, then, was the exact pecuniary "value," as far as we can get it, of Chairman HUBBELL'S "services" in that eventful campaign. But, sir, it would be gross injustice to Chairman HUBBELL, it would give no adequate idea of his "great services in securing the result in 1878" to stop with a simple statement of the amount he succeeded in gathering into the treasury of his committee. Facilis est descensus Averni—that is, the descent into the pockets of Federal employés is, ordinarily at least, easy; but the distribution of the funds thus collected, the placing of it where it "would do the most good"—hic labor, hoc opus est—"there is the rub." It will be seen from the testimony of Brother Gorham that no part of this committee's path was strewn with roses.

OBSTACLES WHICH DID NOT OBSTRUCT.

At the very threshold of their purpose they were met by several plain laws of the land which forbade either the demand or payment of "any money or property or other thing of value for political purposes." I cite these words from section 6 of an act of Congress approved August 15, 1876. Another statute (section 1546 of the Revised Statutes) declared: "No officer or employé of the Government shall require or request any workingman in any navy-yard to contribute or pay any money for political purposes." The penalty for violation of this law is "dismissal from the service of the United States."

These obstacles, placed there by a Democratic Congress, these statutes, were easily gotten over; they were simply kicked out of the way as so much old rubbish. But here another and, to them, more serious difficulty stood before them. Under date of June 22, 1877, President Hayes had issued his famous "civil-service order" that "no assessments for political purposes on officers or subordinates should be allowed," and "requiring every officer of the General Government to conform his conduct to its requirements;" in other words, "to govern himself accordingly." Here indeed was a "lion in their path." What did they do?

PRESIDENT HAYES IN THE HANDS OF THE PHILISTINES.

Recall for a moment the facts. A Democratic Congress was then in session. The Potter committee to investigate certain little affairs connected with the Presidential count was at work. These gentlemen therefore had an easy task to persuade Mr. Hayes that these wicked Democrats intended to combine with the "stalwart" Republicans—that they intended to oust him from his seat.

Here is what they wrote. Here is the circular formulated and sent from the "headquarters of the Republican Congressional committee, 1878, 1319 F street, Northwest, Washington, District of Columbia, May 27, 1878:"

The importance of the pending struggle cannot easily be exaggerated.

All of these struggles are "important" about the time assessments are to begin. [Laughter.]

That the Senate is to be Democratic after the 4th of March, 1879, is very nearly a certainty. In view of this—the election of a Democratic House of Representatives would precipitate upon the country dangerous agitations, which would inevitably add to present distresses. Foremost among their schemes the opposition already announce their intention to attempt the revolutionary expulsion of the President from his office.

Having thus boldly charged this purpose on the Democracy, what did chairman HUBBELL and his committee do? Hear what their secretary, Mr. Gorham, testifies:

Question. What authorities outside were consulted?

Answer. One member of the committee was selected to present this circular to the appointing power, and he [Mr. Hayes] made a slight modification of the language which referred to the matter.

The result was, therefore, that Brother Hayes—alarmed at this "cunningly devised fable" as to the "revolutionary expulsion of the President from office"—ingloriously deserted his avowed policy, and, in the words of Mr. Gorham, "approved and wrote with his own hand that clause in the circular which states 'that there will be no objection in any official quarter to such "voluntary contribution."'"

HOW IT WAS DONE IN 1878.

After this triumphant overthrow of the Executive, "Chairman HUBBELL" and his machine had a clear track. The cause of civil-service reform had in his hands only to "run and be glorified." The successive stages of its grand career are given here in detail. The most hurried review will show the increased magnitude of "Chairman HUBBELL'S" "services," and build higher the monument to that shrinking modesty which could dismiss such "services" with a single sentence in the Congressional Directory.

I give some of these details in the exact words of Mr. Gorham—"Chairman HUBBELL'S" secretary and "right-bower." To whom was this circular sent? I answer from this testimony:

Question. Mr. Gorham, was this circular sent to the navy-yards and post-offices of the country generally.

Mark his answer:

Answer. If it was not sent to every civil officer who received over $1,000 a year, some of the clerks neglected their duties, because that was my instruction. Further, I would state that I thought the postmasters would feel slighted, because many times in a small town a postmaster of small pay is selected by his neighbors and friends and recommended because of his prominence, and I thought they would feel slighted; and so postmasters were asked without reference to their salary, and they were very kind in responding.

Oh, tender solicitude and consideration! Who can wonder that it was promptly and liberally responded to by the grateful and patriotic postmasters of the rural districts?

My object—

He continues—

was to have it reach every man who was in office.

Question. In the country or out of the country?

Answer. Everywhere in the world. I took the list from the Blue Book.

As to the limit of salary of persons called on, the witness subsequently corrected his first statement as follows:

I stated the other day that we sent to all who received a thousand dollars and upward, and postmasters without regard to salary. I now find upon examining my books that we sent to persons receiving less than a thousand dollars. I find where we sent circulars to persons receiving as small a salary as $720, and it is possible I could have found where circulars were sent to those receiving less, but I do not think so.

The solicitude and tenderness manifested by Chairman HUBBELL and his fidus Achates for the noble army of rural postmasters was only equaled by their gallantry toward the ladies who were Government employés. Again I must refer to the testimony.

"LADIES CHANGE"—GIVE UP YOUR CHANGE OR CHANGE YOUR PARTNERS.

Henry M. Barker was "employed by the Union Republican Congressional committee to secure subscriptions from persons in the Treasury Department," and in answer to the question, "Did you receive subscriptions from the ladies in the stamp division of the Internal Revenue Bureau?" says: "I did from some divisions of that bureau." Mr. Gorham, to the question, "Were these subscriptions received from ladies?" answers:

There were two or three ladies quite indignant at the exemption, who came down to the committee-room and said they had as good a right as anybody and would not be prevented from contributing their mite; and I said: "Very well." I was too polite, I hope, to try to oppose a lady's will in such a matter.

Question. Do you remember the names of the indignant ladies?

Answer. I do not now. They would be very proud to have their names published. I can get them, I presume.

It is to be sincerely regretted, Mr. Chairman, that in a matter so delicate as this that "Secretary" Gorham did not afterward get the names of these "two or three ladies," that their names might be embalmed in the hearts of a grateful Republic; and it is even more to be regretted that he did not in the interest of truth, if not of civil-service reform, give the names, not of the "two or three," but possibly of the thousands of ladies in public office, many of them the widows and daughters of our dead soldiers, with scant salaries, to whom these circulars were sent or presented, who were also "quite indignant," but for another and more plausible cause than this witness assigns.

"GREAT STREAMS" AND "LITTLE FOUNTAINS"—WHERE DID THEY FLOW?

Thus, sir, did Chairman HUBBELL collect the means for purifying the civil service. How and where it was done ought also to be known, because these things are a part and the most difficult part of the "service," which in an humble way I am endeavoring to recall for the benefit of history, and which he correctly states were "of great value in securing the result." And here, again, I go for light and information to "Secretary" Gorham. On page 25 of this testimony I find him indulging in the following historical résumé of the committee's labors:

A great deal has been said about generalship and leadership. The Congressional committee never assumed any such attitude. They aided where they could the State and Congressional committees. We raised some money—$106,000—and used it to the best advantage. We aided nineteen Southern districts only and fifty-eight Northern districts, and the average to each Northern district was $712. We aided seventy-seven districts in all. We sent not a dollar into New York or Massachusetts, and nothing worth speaking of to Pennsylvania or Illinois, those great States. I suppose there must have been many times the sum we collected used throughout the country from first to last.

These sums, large and small, were, as Mr. Gorham with refreshing frankness admits, "used to the best advantage," or, in more classic language, were "put where they would do the most good." Where that was, is an inquiry not only pertinent to our present investigation, but of especial and thrilling interest just now to you gentlemen of the Republican majority who want to make your next "calling and election sure." I have before me the complete memorandum, submitted by Mr. Gorham himself of "the districts to which sums were sent." I will read some of the items. I find here that the "first district, New Jersey," got "$1,500," the largest sum given to any district in the United States. It will thus be seen that the power of Brother ROBESON, "the old man eloquent," met with its usual success. Like that other "ancient mariner," he fixed his "glittering eye" upon the committee until "his ghastly tale he told," which secured at once the necessary ducats. As he is a member of the present Congressional committee you gentlemen, as you behold his executive ability in securing the funds, will re-echo the melancholy refrain of the "Wedding Guest"—

"I fear thee, Ancient Mariner."

I find here further "New Hampshire, $1,750." As one of the members of this select committee on the civil service [Mr. BRIGGS] was a candidate from that State in that Congressional contest, he will gratify a reasonable "literary curiosity" by stating whether any portion, and if so how much, of that "shower of gold" "fructified and made glad" the desert places in his district.

I find here, also, "sixth district, Indiana." Though led by "Brigadier-General by Brevet" THOMAS M. BROWNE, it seems to have required other "sinews of war," which were furnished by the committee in the shape of "one thousand" "dollars of the daddies."

I see further that Michigan received $5,000. Can it be that any portion of that was utilized by Hon. R. G. HORR, of the "Select Committee," &c.?

I find also a statement as to Ohio. "The sum of $9,300," says Mr. Gorham, "was sent to the State of Ohio. It was deposited to the credit of General ROBINSON, chairman of the State central committee." It was while he was in this city negotiating this little loan that my colleague [Mr. TURNER] was mistaken by "Chairman HUBBELL" for General ROBINSON and requested—of course in the interests of civil-service reform—to make a "voluntary contribution" to the support of the National View, the organ of the Greenback party in this city.

The $9,300—

was sent to the nine districts which were pretty closely contested. I cannot state the names of all of them. I know that Mr. NEAL'S was one, Mr. BUTTERWORTH'S was one, Mr. YOUNG'S was one; but beyond those I believe I cannot go.

I will not, however, Mr. Chairman, go further into the details of this grand "prize-package distribution." Here we have, however, the direct statement that Brother NEAL, Brother BUTTERWORTH, certainly, and with strong probabilities that Brother BRIGGS and Brother HORR also received their share of this money, all of which except $13,000 was collected from the office-holders of the country; and yet all of these gentlemen are members of the committee—on the jury—to which we have submitted the issue of political assessments and other reforms in the civil service. With this money in their pockets, with a part of the "pork" in their possession, can it be hoped that they will render a verdict "for the country?"

I have thus, sir, hurriedly outlined the "services" of Chairman HUBBELL from the first gathering of the funds by his order to their final, if not satisfactory, distribution and lodgment among the Congressional districts of the country. While meditating the other night with awe and admiration upon his Machiavelian skill in planning and his Napoleonic genius in executing, while recalling his bold and triumphant success in overthrowing laws and in overawing a President, I was overcome in a trance and saw a vision.

Upon a great plain I saw congregated an immense multitude with waving banners all of which bore inscriptions. Inquiring who they were and why they were there, I was told that they were all Republican office-seekers, and that the inscriptions on the banners indicated the offices they wanted, and that they were assembled now to witness a solemn and important ceremony; that for his "great services" a distinguished statesman of their party was to be granted the high honor of an apotheosis. I asked my nearest neighbor, whose inscription read "Library of Congress," what an apotheosis was. He opened a book which he bore under his arm, whose title I saw was "Encyclopædia Britannica," and, turning its pages, read: "Apotheosis—Deification, the enrollment of a mortal among the gods. This honor was conferred upon Alexander the Great, the Cæsars, and also upon Drusilla, sister of Caligula, for great services rendered by them to their people. The ceremonies were usually very impressive; and as the souls of the future deities ascended in a chariot an eagle was let loose to accompany their upward flight." Hardly were these words completed when the multitude gave a loud shout. Following their upward glances, I saw in mid-air a great flying car like unto the car of Juggernaut. Under its wheels were an innumerable host of beings, but so crushed and disfigured that I could not distinguish whether they had "manhood" or not. I asked who these miserable unfortunates were, and was told that they were all employés of the Government.

I looked again, and high upon the chief seat of the great car exalted sat the "chairman of the Republican Congressional committee" and "member of the Select Committee on the Reform of the Civil Service," Hon. JAY A. HUBBELL, of Michigan. In his left hand he held an instrument with which I was told he had pierced to the heart that monster of iniquity known as the "spoils system." It was inscribed "H. R. No. 4429," a bill, introduced and advocated by him, "to enlarge the power and duties of the Agricultural Department." In the other hand he bore aloft another writing. It and its words also were so small that I could not distinguish their meaning. I could see, however, that it was not the "Declaration of Independence," nor was it the "emancipation proclamation;" it was too narrow, too infinitely small and insignificant for that. I inquired and was told by a sad, pale-faced woman, who had just approached from a lesser but more excited crowd in the distance, that the document was the circular issued from "headquarters of the Republican Congressional committee," addressed to all the Federal employés of the country and asking their money to be used in the cause of "civil-service reform." As I was still gazing and wondering I heard a great noise, at first I thought it was "Heaven's artillery;" upon inquiry again, however, I found I was mistaken and that the noise was made by guns fired in honor of the occasion, that they were constructed entirely of silver and gold and that there was some doubt whether it would be either prudent or proper to use them, as they had never seen even "civil service." Hardly had the sound of the guns died upon the air when strains of music were heard. Unseen hands were playing various tunes; they were all "voluntaries."

As the car or chariot just then ascended higher and was about to disappear from sight, the noise and uproar increased. I turned to my neighbor who had described the apotheosis and asked where the eagle was who usually accompanied the flight of the hero, and was informed that he had been taken suddenly and dangerously sick and was unable or unwilling to make his appearance or take part in the ceremonies.

When the car with its now glorified occupant had disappeared in the vast regions of space I withdrew my gaze, and as I did so I heard a dismal chant. I looked in the direction whence it came and there, separate and apart from the first, I saw another large assembly. I asked who these were, and was told they were the wives and children of the Federal employés who had been compelled to give up their salaries for political purposes. Clad in rags and nakedness, with gaunt forms and careworn faces, they were slowly marching around an immense cauldron, which I was told was the "political pot," and after the manner of the witches of Macbeth were throwing into its boiling contents their blasted hopes, their bitter disappointments, hot tears, hunger, hate, and indignation—all "voluntary contributions"—while ever and anon came their mournful refrain—

HUBBELL, HUBBELL,
Toil and trouble.

APPEAL TO THE COMMITTEE.

At this point, Mr. Chairman, my feelings were aroused to the highest point of excitement. I started forward and awoke, to find that a part at least of what I had seen and heard was simply a dream. Mr. HUBBELL had not as yet gone to the "upper sky," but was still on earth and still a member of the "Select Committee on the Reform of the Civil Service." And I now appeal to him, and to the whole committee, to all of whom I have now casually alluded save yourself, Mr. Chairman; and in making this last exception let me assure you that I intend no disrespect to you, but great respect for your present position—in the chair—to you and to your colleagues I most earnestly appeal to make such scenes hereafter an impossibility in our Republic. The country looks to you and to that committee for legislation to prevent these political assessments and other abuses now resting like a dark shadow upon American politics.

Will further disappointment be the only result? Do you and your committee want further evidence of public sentiment than what has already been given in the State and national resolutions upon which your party has repeatedly appealed to the people for indorsement and support? Do you want the reputation of political wizards, to have sounded in your ears in solemn retribution for these broken promises the fierce accusation of the ruined Dane:

And be these juggling fiends no more believ'd,
* * * *
That keep the word of promise to our ear,
And break it to our hope.

Will that committee defend themselves by saying that this is an evil which cannot be remedied by legislation? I challenge that proposition, and I now desire briefly to call attention to one of the bills to which I have already referred as now before the committee which, if enacted into a law, will go very far toward reforming some of our present bad practices.

WHAT ARE POLITICAL ASSESSMENTS, AND HOW TO STOP THEM.

The bill to which I refer is H. R. No. 520, and is entitled "A bill to prevent extortion from persons in the public service and bribery and coercion by such persons." As stated before, it proposes to prohibit what are commonly known as "political assessments." Its definition of such assessments is specific, thorough, and comprehensive:

The phrase "political assessment" shall be deemed to include every form of request, payment, loan, advance, or other contribution, or promise of money or any other thing of value, for or in aid of any party or political purpose whatsoever, whether the same be conditional or absolute, whether based on any salary or compensation or otherwise, and whether the application to such purpose is to be direct or through any method of indirection or disguise.

It will be seen that this assumes that the abuse aimed at is not limited to money assessments. That species of assessment of itself is sufficiently unjustifiable and corrupting, but, as is well known, the evil is much more insidious and far-reaching in its nature. Offices may be and are sometimes obtained, contracts may be awarded or withheld, penalties released, the collection of fines stayed or omitted, neglect of duty, carelessness, even open dishonesty may be overlooked or condoned upon the understanding, express or implied, that the beneficiaries of such favors shall become active friends and liberal contributors to the campaign fund of the party. Sinecures may be secured, high salaries and even pensions may be promised or withheld for the same purpose. I will not be understood as charging that all of these things have been done, but I am now commenting upon what are reasonable probabilities and easy possibilities in an excited political contest.

These, then, and every other method devised by partisan avarice to arbitrarily swell its coffers and perpetuate its power are intended to be embraced in the definition of "political assessments" as given in this bill.

ANALYSIS OF THE BILL.

The briefest analysis, sir, of the bill will show its importance, necessity, and practicability. It forbids any officer, agent, or employé in the public service from using his authority to compel or induce political contributions among Federal employés, and authorizes such person to prohibit the entry of collectors for political purposes into public offices, and prohibits such person from making such collections himself. The second section of the bill places the same restrictions upon members of Congress as are mentioned in the foregoing section, and prohibits their using their official influence, either by promises of increased salaries or of help of any kind, or to exercise their influence toward a Government employé by reason of his having refused or omitted to pay a political assessment. It also prohibits any one from paying or promising to pay an assessment in return for appointment to office. The next section prohibits members of Congress from using their authority against employés in public offices for failure to make payments of assessments.

The next makes it the duty of heads of Departments to post a prescribed notice conspicuously in the Departments, setting forth that no employé of the Government is under any obligation to pay any political assessment or to contribute to any political purpose, and "cannot be dismissed, removed, or otherwise prejudiced by reason of refusing to do so." Violations of the provisions of the bill are made punishable by fine or imprisonment, or both, and any person paying an assessment may recover the same by suit within one year. All judges of the courts of the United States, including the supreme court of the District of Columbia, are required to instruct the grand jury to inquire diligently with reference to violations of the act. The system of political assessment is here fully described, and the means of its overthrow are indicated.

NECESSITY FOR SUCH LEGISLATION.

Will it be claimed that this system is just, honest, or republican, or even that it is necessary to the success of the party employing it? Are not the facts brought out in regard to the Congressional canvass of 1878, which I have already partly quoted, strong enough to demand prompt action at our hands? If they do not, then let me call the attention of the committee to the reasons for such legislation as set forth in the preamble of this bill. It recites as its first proposition that "persons in the public service of the United States should be as free as any other citizen to make or refuse to make contributions for political purposes." Is there an intelligent man upon this floor who will controvert that? It is a mere assertion of the right to do or not to do a particular thing, the simplest and lowest form of personal liberty.

Freedom of thought, freedom of speech, and freedom of action constitute the triple crown, worthier and greater than that of the noble house of Hapsburg, which attest the sovereignty of every American citizen, no part of which can he surrender without dishonor, no part of which can be taken from him without grievous wrong both to him and to the country of which he is a constituent element. The statement of such a position is its own and all sufficient demonstration.

The preamble supplements its first proposition as to the freedom of public officials with the statement of the fact that such persons "are now, through fear of removal or other prejudice, subjected to heavy taxation under the name of political assessments."

THE LOYAL WORK GOES BRAVELY ON.

Is this true? Is there any one who doubts or denies it? Have we not just been refreshed upon this point by the testimony of Mr. Gorham and others, showing how a circular calling for contributions was sent to all the Federal employés in the world? And not that time only, but—to use Chairman HUBBELL's words of only a day or two ago in his letter to Hon. George William Curtis—"like circulars have been issued biennially for at least sixteen years by Republican Congressional committees." Here, sir, is one now going its rounds. I ought, perhaps, upon æsthetic principles, to cite it, since we are told "a thing of beauty is a joy forever," but as it is similar to the one of 1878 I will only quote from it. It is dated "headquarters of Congressional Republican committee," and is couched very much in the language of general orders from military headquarters, requesting the payment of a certain defined amount for the advancement of the Republican cause.

One or two curious questions recur in reading this circular sent out by the committee. To whom was it directed, and why to them only? Are the "circumstances under which the country finds itself placed"—to use its words—limited to any particular portion of our fifty million people? Have we an oligarchy, an aristocracy of office-holders in our midst who are relied upon to come to the rescue whenever the country is in peril, as set forth in this circular, from the "restoration of the Democratic party to the control of the Government" or from any other well-founded cause? Are the great masses of our people unreliable? If not, why was this demand not made upon all the members of the political party from which it emanated? Are not they at least deeply interested in the specific and peculiar "circumstances," whatever they may be, referred to in this circular? Is it only one small part of that party who will, to quote again the language of this committee, "esteem it both a privilege and a pleasure to make to its fund a contribution?"

I submit these questions in perfect good faith to this House or to any member of that committee. Can they be assured in any but one way? We all know the meaning and effect of this circular. It is sent to "persons employed in the service of the United States," and to them only.

Every officer, every clerk, every employé in the civil service of this country, numbering over 110,000, from the highest—the President possibly excepted—to the humblest, regardless of "sex, person, or previous condition of servitude," must respond to this demand. The destroying angel which went upon its mission of sorrow and of death through the fated households of Egypt was not more certain of its victims, more merciless in the execution of his dread summons, nor less welcomed in his coming. This proscription, like death, spares neither young nor old. It robs the cradle as well as the grave. I say the grave, for one of these circulars calling for $18 was sent to an armorer in the Springfield arsenal who had been dead over four years. Picture his disgust when interrupted in the joys and felicities of the unseen world by the hoarse voice of Honorable HUBBELL telephoning him that he must "walk up to the chairman's office and settle" or lose his place!

PICKING THE POCKETS OF SMALL BOYS.

The cradle, too, must yield to this inexorable requisition. The pages of this House—these young and "innocent babes of the Republic"—have been ordered to pay a "voluntary contribution," "which, it is hoped, may not be less than $10." Whether the committee was forced to this extremity because, like the great Napoleon, their fighting stock, by fierce and frequent contests, had been exhausted, or whether its object was to teach these young and rising statesmen of the future those severe lessons of virtue and self-sacrifice upon which every great cause must rest for success, is one of the unsolved problems of the universe. I have yet, however, to hear of a single one of these unfledged patriots who considered it either a "privilege or a pleasure" to make the so-called "contribution."

Nor, sir, if current rumor be true, are these little pages the only "infants" who have been called upon, the "infant industries," and especially that very tender babe, the "Bessemer steel infant," now languishing upon food at $28 per ton, has been requested and has murmured its consent to pay its "voluntary contribution" of $1,000 to the cause of reform.

"COME, YE DISCONSOLATE."

Need I review here the great army of office-holders, adults and infants, male and female, who have been ordered to march to the music of this circular, the scrub-women, the water-boy in the new War Department building, who pays his $4; the day-laborers whose wages are $2 per day, who pay their $15; the navy-yard laborers, the health office, the Life-Saving Service, every branch and department of the Government has been put under requisition. Even the teachers and employés of the Indian training school at Carlisle, Pennsylvania, have not been omitted. I see that they are assessed $388, of which the female laundress is to pay $15, the mistress of the dining-room $9, and the female hospital nurse $12.50. The motto of the committee seems to have been, "Let no miserable Federal employé escape."

Shall I, sir, continue to consider this preamble; shall I remind this committee of the extent of this "heavy taxation." Take a single city as an illustration. The salaries at the post-office and custom-house in New York City amounted in 1880 to $2,500,000. Two per cent. on that amounts to $50,000. But, as we all know, the percentage of State and national assessments amount to 6 or 8 per cent., or upon these two offices alone as high as $200,000 is sometimes obtained in a single year. It will be seen at once what vast sums can be and are collected through this assessment plan. There are indeed "millions in it."

"YOUR MONEY OR YOUR LIFE."

But will it be said in reply that these immense sums are "voluntary contributions?" Does not the very suggestion excite a smile? I have no doubt the committee when they discuss this point indulge in a smile. If these contributions are "voluntary," why are they sent only to employés of the Government? Why in each Department is the chief of the Department first sought, and why does his name always head the list? Is it not because, as this preamble suggests, it is intended that official authority and influence shall "restrain the free political action of the citizen?" Why compose this committee of members of Congress who under our present iniquitous system are the owners and dispensers of patronage except for the same purpose? Why state in the circular that such contributions "will not be objected to in any official quarter?"

Why prepare books, as in the campaign of 1878, with stubs containing name of employé, date, and amount of payment? Why send out a second circular more peremptory than the first, and then finally a third one, which is as direct a demand as any highwayman ever made with cocked pistol upon his victim? Why preserve these books except as a memorial, a book of "rewards and punishments?" Why name in the circular the exact amount to be given? Why say "make prompt and favorable response to this letter by bank check or draft or postal money-order?" Why is this done "by order of the committee?" Why does it "feel authorized to apply?" Why is this letter not sent to our soldiers and seamen and pensioners? Why did the worthy chairman virtually admit the coercive intention of the committee? Hear what occurred only ten days ago:

Mr. SPRINGER. Now, I want to know if I have the authority of the Republicans to say to these little pages here, and to other employés of the House—one-legged and one-armed soldiers—that they are not expected to make any payment in response to this circular unless they really want to do so?

Mr. HUBBELL. I will say to the gentleman that so far as the pages are concerned, he has that right.

Why say only "so far as the pages are concerned" except to declare to all others, what they already knew, that their official heads would promptly roll from the block as was the case in this city with a most worthy clerk, within my personal knowledge, if they failed to recognize the authority of this demand? "He takes my life," says the great English bard, "who takes the prop that doth support it."

How much volition is there in hunger and want. Do we not readily recall the incident given by Macaulay when the infamous James II was making his "assessment," where "one custom-house officer, a battered old cavalier, notified his submission to the royal will in a way which excited both merriment and compassion: 'I have,' he said, 'fourteen reasons for obeying his majesty's command—a wife and thirteen young children.'"

What stronger or higher reasons would the great majority of our own office-holders honestly give for making these "voluntary contributions?" But, sir, I will not attempt to argue this point further. The American public are too shrewd and too sensible to be deceived by such flimsy pretense. They know, as we all know, that men earning $1.75 and $2 per day would not "voluntarily" contribute a week's wages to pay campaign expenses; they know that this whole system of assessments is wrong in principle and baneful in practice; that it is illegal and partisan tyranny—official coercion in its meanest and most hypocritical and unjustifiable form—a Pandora's box.

MR. GARFIELD ON POLITICAL ASSESSMENTS.

Mr. Chairman, just ten years ago our late President spoke upon this floor upon this very subject. Hear what he says:

I ask these gentlemen what they think of the system of political assessments? I ask them what they think of the extortion of the collector of a great port or chief of any great branch of the service issuing a circular calling for 1, 2, or 3 per cent. of the salaries of all the employés under his control to be used for party purposes, with the distinct understanding that unless they paid others will be found to fill their places? I call attention of gentlemen around me to that shameful fact. The practice affords a large so-called electioneering fund, which in many cases never gets beyond the pockets of the shysters, the hangers-on, the mere camp-followers of the party.

Yes, gentlemen, in the words of your greatest leader, this "deep damnation of whose taking off" bears mournful but conclusive testimony against its foul methods, I ask you now what you think of your system of political assessments? Will any candid man say that the condition of public affairs, either in this or in any other regard, is better or even as good now as it was when Mr. Garfield spoke these earnest words? Is the whole subject of reform more hopeful? Has the number of useless and incompetent office-holders diminished? Has the method of their appointment and promotion been improved? Are honesty, capacity, and fidelity the sure and only qualifications for office, or do they still stand aside at the dictate of selfish and personal power? Is proved competency less potent than partisan zeal and subserviency? Is that usurpation of executive power known as the "courtesy of the Senate" less bold and assertive? Are the political assessments yet in existence, and is the robbery thus committed under the forms of law less bold, open, and frequent? Is party spirit milder and more reasonable? Are our elections freer from falsehood, bribery, and general demoralization?

Sir, the answer to these questions leaps unbidden from every honest heart. Our political condition has gone steadily from bad to worse. With each year our campaigns have grown in bitterness and intensity until they resemble the fierceness of civil war. Our parties are divided into hostile camps, to the interruption of all legitimate business and the imminent danger of the public peace. The most brutal passions and narrow prejudices are aroused, to the overthrow for the time being of all generous, kindly, and patriotic feeling among our countrymen. No character is too pure, no sancity of private life too holy, to deter the invading footsteps of party slander. At no period of our history has the system of political assessments been more voracious, more despotic, or more proscriptive and aggressive. More and more spoils have been as essential as more and more victims to a beast of prey. Enormous sums, aggregating possibly millions of dollars, are collected and secretly expended—not for the "necessary and legitimate expenses of the campaign," under which shallow pretense the money is contributed—but in bribing and debauching the voters of the country, thus holding out a premium for crime, treachery, and venality.

The scenes of vice and immorality attendant upon these practices and their effect upon our voting population are sadly familiar to us all. Thousands of our citizens become the slaves of party, the apologists of wrong, and the willing agents of fraud and corruption. Political conscience is benumbed. Party despotism is established. Individual independence—the last and best defense of liberty—is destroyed. Patriotism is subordinated to avarice and ambition. A large proportion of our good citizens, merchants, scholars, and business men are apathetic or disgusted with active politics, and thus party organization is largely left to the domination of "ring" politicians and "machine bosses."

CONCLUSION.

Sir, it was to meet and overcome some of these great and acknowledged evils that the bills I introduced were intended. It was to inaugurate such rules as would enable the President to purify and improve our administrative system that the civil service commission was established. I hope, therefore, that before this bill is concluded the amendment I propose appropriating $25,000 for its re-establishment will be passed. I am not entirely without hope also that the members of this Congress, rising up to the full measure of the public needs and the public demands, will inaugurate the other legislation which the friends of pure government, regardless of political affiliations, are everywhere urging.

Let us make merit the sole test of official appointment and promotion. Let us overthrow at once and forever this wicked, unnecessary, dangerous, and demoralizing system of political assessments. Let the severest penalties be invoked against the bribery, coercion, and corruption, which are its attendants. Let political tyranny and slavery be driven from our land. Let our motto be "free men" as well as "free ballots." Let us, in a word, bring back the country to its ancient and honorable principles of purity, simplicity, economy, and honesty.

Do this, gentlemen, and your political action will be twice blessed—blessing those that give and those that receive. Do this and you inaugurate this second century of the Republic by an administration worthy the fathers who founded, and worthy the fame which has made it the pride and boast of the lovers of liberty in every land. [Prolonged applause.]

The Clerk read as follows:

For the Benicia Arsenal, Benicia, California: For completing the erection of the machine and armorer's shop, and for completing the rebuilding of the blacksmith's and carpenter's shops, the two latter injured by the fire on the night of November 3, 1880, $50,000.

Mr. BERRY. I move to amend by striking out "50" and inserting "60," so as to make the appropriation for this purpose $60,000. This sum will complete these shops. It is only $10,000 more than the bill proposes to allow. It does seem to be poor policy to appropriate money enough within $10,000 to complete these shops, and compel the work to go over till another year.

It will be observed that two shops were burned down before the third shop was completed. For two years that arsenal has been in such a condition that even the lock of a gun could not be mended there. All the workshops and machinery were destroyed. It should be remembered also that the States of California, Oregon, and Nevada, as well as the Territories of Arizona, Idaho, and Washington, besides Alaska, are dependent for their supplies upon this arsenal.

We contend (and I ask the attention of the chairman of the committee to the remark) that it is unjust to withhold this additional $10,000 for another year, instead of appropriating now a sufficient sum to complete this series of shops. I hope the amendment will be agreed to, so that the shops can be completed without waiting for the additional $10,000 until further action by Congress. By reason of the shops having been burned down it has been impossible for two years past at that arsenal to repair the smallest piece of ordnance.

Mr. HISCOCK. After careful examination of this subject, and hearing the officers of the War Department, we fixed the amount named in the bill, which we believe should not be increased.

The amendment of Mr. BERRY was not agreed to.

Mr. WASHBURN. I was out of my seat when the paragraph embraced in lines 790 and 791 in regard to the Rock Island bridge was read. If there be no objection, I would like to offer an amendment to come in after that paragraph.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair hears no objection.

Mr. WASHBURN. I move the amendment which I send to the desk.

At the end of line 791, after dollars, amend by adding:

"To enable the Secretary of War to make examination of and to remove obstructions to the free navigation of the navigable waters of the United States, $25,000; and whenever the Secretary of War shall have good reason to believe that any railroad or other bridge now or hereafter to be constructed over any of the navigable waters of the United States, under authority of the United States or of any State or Territory is an obstruction to the free navigation of such waters, by reason of difficulty in passing the draw-opening of said bridge, by rafts, steamboats, or other water-craft, it shall be the duty of the said Secretary, on satisfactory proof thereof, to require the company or persons owning said bridge to cause such aids to the passage of said draw-opening to be constructed, placed, and maintained at their own cost and expense, in the form of booms, dikes, piers, or other suitable and proper structures for the guiding of said rafts, steamboats, and other water-craft safely through said opening as shall be specified in his order in that behalf; and on failure of the company or persons aforesaid to make and establish such additional structures within a reasonable time, the said Secretary shall proceed to cause the same to be built or made at the expense of the United States, and shall refer the matter without delay to the Attorney-General of the United States, whose duty it shall be to institute, in the name of the United States, proceedings in any district court of the United States in which such bridge, or any part thereof, is located, for the recovery of the cost thereof; and all moneys accruing from such proceedings shall be covered into the Treasury of the United States: Provided, That no greater sum than $15,000 shall be expended upon any one bridge in a single year, and the Secretary of War shall make report annually to Congress as to such obstructions and the cost, if any, of removing the same by the United States.

Mr. HISCOCK. I make a point of order upon this amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state his point of order.

Mr. HISCOCK. That it is new legislation, and increases expenses.

Mr. WASHBURN. I think if the gentleman will hear my statement he will withdraw his point of order; at any rate, I shall ask him to do so.

A bill embracing provisions precisely similar to those of this amendment has passed the Senate, and is now on the Speaker's table. The Committee on Commerce of the House have unanimously authorized me to report a bill precisely similar in its terms to this proposition. This amendment proposes legislation of great importance, especially to the valley of the Mississippi River. The obstructions from the different bridges on that river have become of a very serious character. This proposition will put it in the power of the Secretary of War to remove those obstructions at the expense of the railroad companies crossing the river.

Although there is an appropriation made here, I am satisfied ultimately not one dollar is to come out of the Treasury. The appropriation is made to permit the Secretary of War to proceed in the first instance to remove the obstructions.

Then the amount is to be charged to the railroad companies or the bridge companies, and the amount will be covered back into the Treasury.

As this is of such importance to navigation, especially of the Mississippi River, I trust, in view of the fact the Committee on Commerce have unanimously recommended the passage of the bill, and in view of the further fact the Senate has passed the bill, I do trust the gentleman from New York will not object to it.

Mr. HISCOCK. I told the gentleman from Minnesota and the chairman of the Committee on Commerce, as well as the gentleman from Missouri, [Mr. BUCKNER,] that I would not insist on the point of order, but after giving the matter more reflection I came to the conclusion I cannot consent here on this bill to pass upon a question of general legislation, either to allow it to come in or to exclude it. I cannot take that responsibility, and I must insist therefore on the point of order. I am appealed to on both sides of this House for just this sort of legislation. A question of this importance should be submitted to the House in the ordinary way, and it is not within the scope of my duty, as I believe, to permit legislation of this public character in this way; and, as I have already said, I am compelled to insist on my point of order.

Mr. ROBINSON, of Massachusetts. Every bill on the Calendar has its friends, and if you put one on you will have to put them all on. If the committee trades off the point of order as to one it must do it as to all.

Mr. BUCKNER. I told the gentleman from New York this was subject to the point of order, and he agreed not to insist on that point of order. When he determined to insist on the point of order he ought to have made it to the preceding paragraph, which is liable to the same objection—the one for the protection of Rock Island bridge by sheer-booms. If the point of order was to be made to this, then the point of order also ought to have been made to that. But this is a most important measure, and I did hope the gentleman would permit us to have a vote on it.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair has no difficulty in ruling on this amendment, as the amendment requires entirely new action, suits in court, levying money on owners, &c., and is new legislation, requiring an expenditure of money, and is clearly out of order. The Chair sustains the point of order and rules the amendment out.

The Clerk read as follows:

For completing repairs on wharf, $3,800.

Mr. PEELLE. I offer the following amendment.

At the end of line 801, on page 33, add these words:

"For the Indianapolis arsenal, Indianapolis, Indiana: For the general care, preservation, and repair of the buildings, walks, bridges, fences, and grounds, $20,000."

Mr. HISCOCK. I make the point of order on that amendment.

Mr. PEELLE. I ask the gentleman to reserve his point of order for the present.

Mr. HISCOCK. I must make it now, but I ask that the amendment be read.

The amendment was again read.

Mr. HISCOCK. It is not subject to the point of order.

Mr. PEELLE. Mr. Chairman, if my memory serves me there has been no appropriation for the improvement of the Indianapolis arsenal for fully ten years. The buildings are going to ruin. The grounds which were once beautified by the Government have been destroyed. The beams in the main building are rotting away.

The estimates for the improvement and repairs of this arsenal I believe are about $33,000. The Committee on Appropriations have seen fit to allow nothing for the improvement and repairs of the arsenal. It does seem to me that if the arsenal is to be maintained by the Government of the United States, it would be good policy, it would be economy, to make a reasonable appropriation for the preservation of this property. Certainly this Congress will not make any provision for the sale of the numerous arsenals throughout the country, and when they shall have done that, unless they in the mean time have preserved the property by reasonable appropriation, you will find Congress has pursued an unwise course and the arsenals have gone to destruction and depreciated in value for want of a reasonable outlay to preserve them.

I hold this $20,000 should be appropriated for the preservation of these grounds and buildings. I do not believe, in view of the estimates which have been made, $20,000 would be unreasonable if we consider nearly ten years have elapsed since any appropriation has been given, and $20,000 would be less than $2,000 a year for the improvement of that arsenal.

I venture to say that with this $20,000 expended on that arsenal it would sell in the market for more than it will now sell for. Therefore the appropriation of money is not extravagant, but in the line of economy. I therefore hope the amendment will prevail.

Mr. HISCOCK. Mr. Chairman, there has not been a specific appropriation made for this or for several others—in fact, quite a large number of arsenals throughout the country. A gross sum has been given for taking care of all of them, without specifying where it shall be expended. These are arsenals in which no men are employed, and for which there is no present use; and the War Department is entirely satisfied with the sum we have given for the purpose of repairing and keeping them up. I hope the amendment will not be agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment suggested by the gentleman from Indiana.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 6, noes not counted.

So the amendment was not agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

For ordinary care of greenhouses and nursery, including construction of two additional greenhouses for propagation of bedding plants for decorating the public grounds, $4,000.

For ordinary care of Lafayette Square, $1,000.

Mr. HOLMAN. I move to strike out of this paragraph in lines 826 to 829——

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair would remark to the gentleman that the paragraph now under consideration is the one contained in lines 830 and 831, which has just been read.

Mr. HOLMAN. I rose while the paragraph was being read and endeavored to attract the attention of the Chair. I spoke instantly, as soon as the first of these paragraphs was read, but presume the Chair did not hear me.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will, of course, take the statement of the gentleman, and the Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out from the paragraph just read, the words:

"Including construction of two additional greenhouses for the propagation of bedding plants for decorating the public grounds."

Mr. RANDALL. That paragraph is subject to the point of order.

Mr. HOLMAN. My friend suggests to me that this is subject to the point of order, and if I have the right to make the point of order now I will submit it to the House. I do not object to the appropriation for the ordinary care of the greenhouses and nursery, but to the other portion of the paragraph I think the point of order will clearly lie against it. I shall also propose at the proper time to strike out $4,000 and insert $1,500, so that the paragraph will read:

For ordinary care of greenhouses and nursery, $1,500.

This is the usual sum appropriated for that purpose. I submit the point of order that the construction of two new greenhouses is new legislation and not in continuation of work already in existence.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair would remark to the gentleman that it is too late to raise the point of order now, as the gentleman did not rise in the first instance for that purpose.

Mr. HOLMAN. No, sir; I did not rise to make the point of order at the time. It did not occur to me, in fact, that it was subject to the point of order.

But I desire to call the attention of the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations to the fact that the appropriation usually made for this purpose has heretofore been $1,500. I think, Mr. Chairman, that we are somewhat overdoing this business of greenhouses and the culture and care of exotic plants in our city. We have in the first place an expensive and well-managed garden for the propagation of these plants, the Botanical Garden, which I think is entirely proper.

Mr. McCOOK. Yes; the gentleman favored that.

Mr. HOLMAN. And I think in a large degree such a garden should embody whatever there is of interest in the floral world, and that it should be kept in good condition. But again, I desire to call the attention of the committee to the fact that there is building up in connection with the Agricultural Department the same kind of a garden for the culture of these plants; and I think I protested against it at the time. It is a subject which belongs properly to the Botanical Garden, and if the gentleman from New York [Mr. McCOOK] had made his point of order upon that I think he would have made it with good effect. The Botanical Garden, however, I regard as a defensible institution, one that is worthy of consideration and care, and as much a subject of legislative interest as the museum, and it should be maintained. But I see no reason why a similar establishment should be connected with the Agricultural Department, and we have already made very ample appropriations for the decoration and maintenance of the public grounds. Now, this greenhouse at the executive grounds I think should be kept up of course, but I do not believe that the amount should go beyond what has been heretofore allowed for that purpose. This additional appropriation of $25,000 in that direction I think is entirely inexcusable.

Mr. HISCOCK. Mr. Chairman, I call the attention of the committee to what is stated by Colonel Rockwell in his report for this subject, and on account of which and the explanation he made personally, this appropriation was increased. He states in his report that they have at present eight small greenhouses, which do not afford sufficient protection for the winter care and proper growth of the present collection of plants. The increase asked for, if granted, will be used for the construction of additional houses, the necessity of which increases the amount by $2,500 over the amount appropriated for the present fiscal year; and if granted it will be used for the construction of two additional greenhouses.

Now, this appropriation has been recommended, as others have been recommended in the bill, not because they are absolutely necessary, but because they are involved in the general decoration and beautifying of this city. The public parks here are increased, and their decoration is something that we are compelled to look after. They are upon public grounds, and we have been fairly liberal in their improvement. I have no doubt that if all this was stricken out of the bill the wheels of the Government would not cease to revolve; but we have not made perhaps so extravagant an appropriation for purposes of decoration as we might have done. Perhaps I represent an extravagant constituency in such matters; but I believe this a proper increase.

Mr. HOLMAN. I desire to modify my amendment by striking out "$4,000" and inserting in lieu thereof "$1,500;" and I desire to say a word upon that. I feel very confident, and a little examination of the public grounds will show, that we are carrying the work of flowers too far. The public parks are decorated with these plants, and they embellish the grounds to a very interesting extent.

Nobody, I believe, complains of that embellishment; but to go beyond what it is now I think is entirely useless. This is in some degree a matter of legislation which particularly concerns ourselves. It is embellishing the parks which we visit and to which we take our friends when they come to the capital. But the appropriations for this purpose heretofore made are unquestionably ample, and I protest against going beyond the present very ample appropriation. All I ask as to the greenhouses is that the appropriations shall be made as heretofore, and that we shall not establish two new ones. We have already three, the most extensive in the United States—that of the Botanical Garden, that of the Agricultural Department, and the one for bedding plants, &c., for the purpose of embellishing the public grounds. I ask that we go no further, but stop where we are in this branch of appropriation.

The question being taken on Mr. HOLMAN's amendment there were—ayes 15, noes 29.

Mr. HOLMAN. No quorum.

Mr. VALENTINE. I hope the gentleman will not insist on the point of no quorum. Let us get though the bill.

Mr. HOLMAN. I shall have to insist on the point. There is no necessity for this appropriation.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of no quorum having been made, the Chair will order tellers, and appoints the gentleman from New York, Mr. HISCOCK, and the gentleman from Indiana, Mr. HOLMAN.

The committee again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 52, noes 95.

So the amendment was not agreed to.

The Clerk read the following paragraph:

For care, construction, and repair of fountains in the public grounds, including the enlargement of basin and purchase of suitable granite or material for the fountain at the north front of the Executive Mansion, $2,000.

Mr. HISCOCK. I move to amend by striking out the words "granite or."

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read the following paragraph:

For improving various reservations, $15,000.

Mr. HOLMAN. I notice that $26,000 have been appropriated for work upon the various public parks, which mean, of course, these reservations. Now, what is this $15,000 for if it is not for the same purpose for which the $26,000 are appropriated?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman offer an amendment?

Mr. HOLMAN. I move to strike out the last word. I hope the gentleman from New York, [Mr. HISCOCK,] remembering we have already appropriated in a single item the sum of $26,000 for the work upon the various reservations, will explain how it becomes necessary to have an additional sum of $15,000 for improving them. Almost everything in connection with these reservations or public parks is provided for elsewhere, and this seems to be an additional item of $15,000 for the same general purpose.

Mr. HISCOCK. The estimates for the appropriations which we have been over are specific for doing particular things. The money is devoted to a specific object; while this is a general appropriation which covers a mass of general work that applies to them all. It has been the custom for appropriations to be made in that way. In this appropriation there is an increase of $3,000 over what it was last year. An increase of $8,000 was asked for. I shall quote the language of Colonel Rockwell, addressed to the committee, on that subject:

For improving various reservations, $20,000.

This is an increase of $8,000 over the amount appropriated last year, and the entire amount requested can be profitably and economically expended as follows: In the purchase of material (such as gravel for roadways and walks, soil, sod, &c.) required in the necessary care of improved and partly improved parks for which no special appropriation is requested, such as Judiciary Square, nineteen acres; Franklin Square, five acres; Mount Vernon and Staunton Squares, about three acres each; Lincoln Square, six acres, (the entire walk of which needs regraveling;) and in the further improvement of public spaces on prominent avenues, as for instance, Thomas Circle, at the intersection of Vermont and Massachusetts avenues and M street, (which it is proposed to properly inclose with a low, ornamental, rough ashlar stone wall surmounted with a suitable coping;) Iowa Circle, McPherson, Farragut, and Rawlins Squares, (whose asphalt walks require resurfacing;) and to improve certain unimproved public spaces on New Hampshire, Connecticut, Massachusetts, and Pennsylvania avenues, around many of which handsome local improvements are being made by private enterprise.

They asked this large appropriation of $20,000. We went over it carefully with Colonel Rockwell and gave $15,000.

The pro forma amendment was withdrawn.

The Clerk read the following paragraph:

For commencing improvement of reservation numbered 17 and site of old canal northwest of same, $20,000.

Mr. REAGAN rose.

Mr. HOLMAN. I wish to ask the gentleman from New York to give some explanation of this item.

Mr. HISCOCK. Gentlemen will see those grounds if they will step to the window and look directly south. There is a large amount of low ground there on which this improvement is being made.

Mr. REAGAN. Is that public or private ground?

Mr. HISCOCK. It is public ground belonging to the United States. It is ground on which water accumulates, and on which I am told filth is allowed to accumulate, which is a source of disease, almost, in certain localities. The ground belongs to the Government, so I am assured, and this is with the view of improving it. Gentlemen can look out and see it for themselves.

Mr. COX, of New York. I will say to my friend from Texas [Mr. REAGAN] that most of that property is in streets and avennes that belong to the Government. It embraces, I am told, only $41,000 of assessable property. The great body of it is Government property.

Mr. HOLMAN. It seems to be a good field for speculation.

Mr. COX, of New York. I know it is a miserable cess-pool.

Mr. HOLMAN. I make the point of order on the paragraph that this is the commencement of a separate and independent matter, involving in the nature of things new legislation I submit it is not the continuation of a public work, but that it must be regarded, from the very terms made use of, as a separate, independent, and specific public work. I submit, therefore, it is not proper on an appropriation bill; it is the commencement, not the continuation, of a public work.

Mr. REAGAN. I desire to move an amendment.

Mr. HOLMAN. I ask the gentleman to wait till the point of order is decided.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from New York desire to be heard on the point of order?

Mr. HISCOCK. I believe no point of order will lie against this proposition. It is simply an appropriation for the care, maintenance, preservation, and looking after the public property.

Mr. HOLMAN. It is for commencing a certain improvement. It is something separate and independent from all the public works now in progress, and is therefore obnoxious to the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN, (Mr. RICH.) The Chair is of opinion that the point of order is not well taken. This item of appropriation is simply for continuing the general system of improvements about the city of Washington.

Mr. REAGAN. I move to amend by inserting the words "streets and avenues of" before the word "reservation."

Mr. HISCOCK. If the gentleman will modify his amendment in this way, adding to the paragraph the words "provided that no part thereof shall be expended upon other than property belonging to the United States"—if the gentleman will move that amendment, I will not object to it.

Mr. REAGAN. I will modify my amendment as suggested.

The amendment as modified was agreed to.

Mr. HOLMAN. I move to strike out the entire paragraph. I do not think the argument is well founded which has been presented to this committee that this proposed improvement is in the interest of health. In my judgment, it is more certainly in the interest of speculation, although I am very confident that the Committee on Appropriations had no such object in view.

Now, on the score of health, allow me to say that these improvements have not improved the health of the city at all. I resided for a number of years in a part of the city which is now almost deserted, contiguous to the old canal. It was then as healthy a portion of the city as any other part. These improvements have not contributed to the health of the city of Washington.

So far as that is concerned, I cannot consent that this improvement shall be put upon that ground. It might be put upon the ground that we wish to embellish the city at large. That I presume is the ground upon which it rests, and not upon the score of health. I ask a vote on my motion to strike out the entire paragraph.

The motion was not agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

For rent of the office for the use of the "colonel in charge of public buildings and grounds," in the city of Washington, $600; to be paid from the appropriation for rent of quartermasters' offices in the act making appropriations for the Army, and for other purposes, for 1883.

Mr. HOLMAN. I desire some explanation of this paragraph: "For rent of the office for the use of the colonel in charge of public buildings and grounds in the city of Washington, $600."

Mr. HISCOCK. I will give the gentleman an explanation. This paragraph will take no money whatever out of the Treasury. This officer is now a sort of tenant at will of the Quartermaster's Department. This clause is put in here simply that he may have control of his own office.

Mr. HOLMAN. Could not the gentleman from New York give him, instead of being a tenant at sufferance or will of the Department, the right to be there in that office? Why expend any money for the rent of an office when there are any number of unoccupied rooms in the War Department?

Mr. HISCOCK. All there is of it is this: the building is leased by the Quartermaster's Department, the rent of which, $900 a year I think it is, is paid out of appropriations made in the Army appropriation bill. This officer occupies a certain portion of that building; he is there under the orders of the Department.

Now, for the purpose of giving him the control of the building, to which the Quartermaster's Department makes no serious objection, we have concluded that we would appropriate this amount for the rent of offices occupied by him; not to let him take any money from the appropriations of this bill, but to authorize him to expend the amount from appropriations contained in the Army appropriation bill.

The Clerk read the following:

For repairs and fuel at the Executive Mansion as follows:
For care and repair of the Executive Mansion, $10,000.

Mr. COBB. I move to amend the paragraph just read by striking out "$10,000," and inserting "$5,000." I make that motion for the purpose of having some explanation made of this item.

Mr. HISCOCK. I understand that the gentleman asks for an explanation, and certainly I will give him all the explanation in my power. I can only say that this item is according to the estimate from the Executive. While I am on reasonably familiar terms there, I can only say that I understand the Executive asked for this appropriation and I put it in the bill. I believed that the President of the United States might be trusted to make up a proper estimate for the repairs of the Executive Mansion.

Mr. COBB. The explanation is not satisfactory to me. I see that by this bill there is appropriated the sum of $62,000 for repairs of Executive Mansion, taking care of the grounds around the Executive Mansion, &c. Now, I think that sum is too great; I think it is extravagant. I propose to move to amend each one of these paragraphs which I believe are extravagant.

I think that $10,000 for the care and repair of the Executive Mansion is too much. I understand that the Senate has passed a bill to erect a new Executive Mansion, or rather to construct an addition to the present one, for which they propose to expend the sum of $300,000.

Now, I submit that if it costs $10,000 to take care of the old Executive Mansion, there is no telling where the expenditure will run to in the end. I hope, therefore, that my amendment will be adopted to reduce the amount to $5,000, which I think is ample.

The amendment was not agreed to.

The Clerk read the following:

For refurnishing the Executive Mansion, $20,000.

Mr. COBB. I move to amend that paragraph by striking out "$20,000," and inserting "$5,000."

Mr. HOLMAN. Last year $30,000 was appropriated for this purpose.

Mr. COBB. I understand that we have already appropriated during this session a large sum of money for this very purpose. I want to ask the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations [Mr. HISCOCK] to explain why it is that it is now proposed to make an additional appropriation of $20,000 to furnish the Executive Mansion, when we appropriated some time ago, in the deficiency bill I believe it was, $10,000 to purchase carpets and other necessary articles to furnish the Executive Mansion. Why is it that $20,000 more is now needed for that purpose?

Mr. HISCOCK. Mr. Chairman, the $10,000 appropriated in the deficiency bill was used I believe for refurnishing and recarpeting certain rooms in the Executive Mansion, and was exhausted in that work. The Executive asks the sum here proposed to recarpet and refurnish certain other rooms in the Executive Mansion. He wishes this done; and I say in reference to this as I said in reference to the other question, that I am entirely willing to trust the Executive of the United States to furnish the Executive Mansion. That is what we proposed in the Appropriations Committee.

The question being taken on the amendment of Mr. COBB, there were—ayes 20, noes 47.

Mr. COBB. No quorum.

Tellers were ordered; and Mr. COBB and Mr. HISCOCK were appointed.

The committee again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 20, noes 76.

So the amendment was not agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

For care and necessary repair of the conservatories of the Executive Mansion, $5,500.

Mr. HOLMAN. I wish to call the attention of the gentleman from New York [Mr. HISCOCK] to the fact that I think there must be a mistake in this item. There was appropriated last year for repairs and preservation of the greenhouse $5,500. Certainly no considerable repairs can be required again this year. In the Forty-fourth Congress, third session, the appropriation was for ordinary repairs and extension of greenhouse, $1,500. I presume that last year some repairs were required, and hence the enormous increase from $1,500 to $5,500. But I submit to the gentleman from New York that we can now safely go back to the old item as it stood for years, at $1,500. I therefore move to amend by making this appropriation the same as in former years—$1,500. During the five or six years that this sum was appropriated there was no complaint so far as I have heard that those conservatories were not elegantly kept up.

The question being taken on the amendment of Mr. HOLMAN, it was not agreed to; there being—ayes 11, noes 44.

Mr. HOLMAN. I move to amend by striking out $5,500 and inserting $3,000. I am willing to double the sum that has been deemed necessary for this purpose in former years; but I am not willing, when Congress has found it necessary to authorize important repairs upon an establishment like this, and appropriates with a view to such repairs, that this appropriation should be the steady basis of all subsequent appropriations. I do not believe the Government should be niggardly in its expenditures upon the White House; but, on the other hand, I do not believe in lavish and unreasonable expenditures for that or any other purpose. If the former appropriation of $1,500 for the ordinary repair and superintendence of the conservatory was sufficient, why is it not sufficient now? I appeal to the gentleman whether the mere fact that one Congress finds it necessary to make extensive repairs is to be taken advantage of as a basis for all subsequent appropriations for the same object. I am willing to double the sum which a Democratic House thought was ample.

Mr. HISCOCK. What was given for the year 1880?

Mr. HOLMAN. I have not looked at the figures for that year; but I know what was appropriated during the Forty-fourth Congress, $1,500 for ordinary care of this green-house; and I heard no complaint in connection with that appropriation. If the gentleman should state that important repairs are necessary to be made, the case would be different; but I do not believe in these extra perquisites.

The question being taken on the amendment of Mr. HOLMAN, it was not agreed to; there being—ayes 18, noes 45.

The Clerk read as follows:

For lighting the Executive Mansion and public grounds: For gas, pay of lamplighters, gas-fitters, plumbers, plumbing, lamps, lamp-posts, matches, and repairs of all kinds; fuel and lights for office, and stables, for watchmen's lodges, and for the greenhouses at the nursery, $15,000: Provided, That for each burner not connected with a meter in the lamps on the public grounds no more than $25 shall be paid per lamp for gas, including lighting, cleaning, and keeping in repair the lamps, under any expenditure provided for in this act; and in case a contract cannot be made at that rate the engineer in charge is hereby authorized to substitute other illuminating material in the lamps on the public grounds, and to use so much of the sum hereby appropriated as may be necessary for that purpose.

Mr. MURCH. I move to amend by striking out "$25," in line 883, and inserting "$20."

I am led to submit this amendment by a thorough investigation which I have made into the subject of gas in this District, an elaborate statement of which I submitted to the House on the 22d of last month. In that statement I showed that the profits of the gas company in this District were in excess of those of almost every other manufacturing company in the United States—aggregating in a period of thirty-one years, on a capital of $500,000, $10,000,000 and upward.

In connection with my remarks on that day I submitted to the House a resolution contemplating the investigation of this system of gas-works. That resolution under the ruling of the Speaker was sent to the Committee on the District of Columbia. The resolution related to the manufacture of gas; and I was led to believe that the Committee on Manufactures, of which I am an humble member, was the proper committee to investigate the subject; or if not that committee, then the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, who have a sub-committee especially charged with the investigation of the subject of gas.

Shortly after the reference of the resolution to the Committee on the District of Columbia, I was notified by the chairman of a subcommittee appointed by that committee, that they were ready to give me a hearing on this matter.

I appeared before the committee on the day specified at ten o'clock in the morning, with experts, to demonstrate the truth of my statements as submitted in the RECORD. The chairman of the sub-committee was absent. After waiting until twelve o'clock, the time for the meeting of the House, and the chairman of the sub-committee not being present, and the second on the sub-committee being, as he admitted, a member of a gas company, having my statements, my documents, and the Gas Journal to substantiate everything I had said, I was compelled to go away without submitting my facts to the committee.

Now, I do not attribute any blame to the committee. I know the committee has a great variety of subjects submitted to its consideration. I know the chairman of the sub-committee might have been called away on important business, but I have never been notified since that time the committee has been willing to hear me.

From my investigation of this subject and from the facts adduced here, which any member can satisfy himself of, and which I have never heard contradicted, it appears to me that $20 a light, sixteen-candle power, of the bleary, red, smoky, wavering gas we get in this District, is enough.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman's time has expired.

Mr. COBB. I will take the floor and yield my five minutes to the gentleman from Maine to continue his remarks.

Mr. MURCH. An eminent gas engineer of the city of Providence, I cannot recall his name just now, stated in an investigation made in Boston on the subject of gas, that the coke and chemicals resulting from the manufacture of coal into gas nearly paid for its cost. So I am led to believe that at $20 a lamp of sixteen candle-power, which the lamps have here, and the statement of the company substantiates it, is enough.

In this modern age of progress, the old gas-lamps should be done away with entirely. Let any member of the House walk along F street and see the line of magnificent illuminators in that street, equaling almost broad day light. I am informed that light can be furnished at a cost much less than what we are now paying for gas.

I am willing and anxious, Mr. Chairman, to cut the cost of gas in this bill to the total extinction and exclusion of gas in order that electricity may be substituted for it. Only think, this great nation, and this beautiful city, its capital, with the President and with the heads of Departments, with magnificent buildings located here, groping along in almost utter darkness! Why, sir, it should lead the way in illuminating progress as in everything else.

Mr. BAYNE. Cannot the gentleman give us the rates in other cities.

Mr. MURCH. I cannot exactly. But in other cities the rate is about $18 or $19. In some, it is a little more. But nowhere does it exceed $22.

Mr. HISCOCK. When the gentleman says $18 or $19, does that include the lighters and repairs of lamp posts, and all that sort of thing? My recollection is that in my city——

Mr. MURCH. I hope the House will allow me time to answer the gentleman's question.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

The committee rose informally; and a message from the Senate, by Mr. SYMPSON, one of its clerks, announced the passage of the following bill and joint resolution, with amendments; in which concurrence was requested:

A bill (H. R. No. 5535) fixing the rate of interest upon arrears of taxes due July 1, 1879, and on all special assessments due the District of Columbia which may be paid by July 1, 1882, and for other purposes; and

Joint resolution (H. R. No. 69) authorizing the Public Printer to pay the employés of the Government Printing Office the pay deducted from them during the obsequies of the late President Garfield, and for other purposes.

It also announced the passage of the following joint resolutions; in which concurrence was requested:

Joint resolution (S. R. No. 91) authorizing the payment temporarily of certain employés of the War Department; and Joint resolution (S. R. No. 90) making an appropriation to defray the expense of printing the memorial cards to accompany the additional numbers ordered of the memorial address on the late President Garfield.

SUNDRY CIVIL APPROPRIATION BILL.

The committee resumed its session.

Mr. MURCH. Mr. Chairman, in reply to the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations in regard to other matters being grouped with gas itself, as lamp-posts and repairs, &c., I will say I cannot state positively at this stage. If I had known this matter would come up this morning I would have been prepared, but I only arrived last night from Chicago.

But here I find are many items aggregated together, namely, for stables, for plumbing, for lamp-posts, lamps, matches, and other appliances, all embraced in this statement, or paragraph; and I received in answer to a request made by me to the Register of the Treasury, along in March, a letter, in which he states the cost of illuminating the White House and executive grounds to be $13,000. I notice here the amount is $15,000, so that, taking that as a scale, $2,000 would be left, which I presume is intended for repairs of posts and for lamps and matches.

Now, the whole District and the Capitol grounds pay an enormous sum for their lighting; and further on in the bill I shall submit an amendment in regard to the lighting of the Capitol grounds, and will endeavor to show that the cost is entirely too high, and will show what it ought to be.

I do not know of any further remarks that I desire to make upon this point, unless some gentleman wishes to ask a question in reference to it.

Mr. NEAL. I move to strike out the last word.

Mr. HISCOCK. I desire to say a word explanatory of the action of the committee, if the gentleman will yield to me first.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will recognize the gentleman from New York in charge of the bill first, and the gentleman from Ohio afterward.

Mr. HISCOCK. My recollection, Mr. Chairman, is that for 1880 we paid $28 a light.

Mr. MURCH. Higher than that at that time.

Mr. ATKINS. No; $25.

Mr. NEAL. Twenty-five dollars was the price paid for lighting.

Mr. HISCOCK. Well, I will not pretend to be accurate as to the exact date or amount, but I know that the reduction was made at some period to the amount which is included in this bill, or if it was not reduced a different mode of payment was adopted.

Mr. ATKINS. If the gentleman from New York will permit me, this occurred, I will say, in the last session of the Forty-fifth Congress, when it was reduced to $25. Prior to that it was over that amount.

Mr. BLACKBURN. It was $25 a light, and the city did the lighting.

Mr. HISCOCK. Yes, that was my understanding. Then it was investigated, I think, thoroughly, and I believe that investigation was conducted by my friend from Indiana, [Mr. COBB.] That is my present recollection, and if I am in error he will correct me. The reduction, I think, was made largely upon that report.

Mr. ATKINS. Let me interrupt the gentleman again to say that it was fixed by the gentleman from New York, [Mr. HEWITT,] who had charge of the sundry civil bill.

Mr. HISCOCK. Yes, but it was investigated also in the District of Columbia bill, where the largest items were, as well as upon the sundry civil bill by Mr. HEWITT. The present Committee on Appropriations adopted the rate of compensation fixed by these gentlemen, and that is all I know about it. We thought that was a fair basis, and decided to act upon it.

Mr. NEAL. Mr. Chairman, it must not be supposed that the members constituting the District of Columbia Committee are all Don Quixotes or Sancho Panzas, but we are practical business men who, when a matter of business comes before us, treat it in a business-like way and give it a reasonable and business-like consideration as we believe.

The Forty-sixth Congress ordered an investigation of the gas company's affairs here. A learned professor from the Johns Hopkins University, of Baltimore, was brought over here to investigate the question, which he did and made his report. That report is at the service of the gentleman from Maine or of any other gentleman who desires to take the trouble to read it. In regard to the character of the works, their capacity and condition, his investigation was as full, complete, and exhaustive as a report could be made.

Now, in regard to the profits made by the company. That also was shown by the report made by the company to the Forty-sixth Congress upon the motion of the gentleman from Maine.

Mr. MURCH. And that is what I base my statement on.

Mr. NEAL. That shows what the profits were. It was not necessary, therefore, to investigate as to the character of the work, and the quality of the gas and the profits made again. There was nothing to investigate if we had seen fit to enter into an investigation, as the ground had been thoroughly gone over on a previous occasion. In addition to that, Mr. Chairman, the Government of the United States appoints a gas inspector who is, as I believe, a competent man for the position. We have made an appropriation already for his salary for the ensuing year.

Mr. MURCH. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. NEAL. No, sir; not now, I have but five minutes. His investigation shows, and a report is made every month, that the gas is of the best quality and equals that of any coal gas in the United States.

Now, a word in regard to the price charged by the company. Last year, under the leadership of the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. COBB,] the price was reduced to $25 a post, and the gas company was required to pay the expense of lighting and repairs and breakage, and these items amounted to $5.60 a post. That reduced the price of gas actually received by the company to $19.40. That is sixty cents below what the gentleman from Maine proposes to pay. The price seems to be a very reasonable one. The price of gas charged to the city for its offices is $1.47, and there is no city that I know of where it is less than $1.85. The price to consumers is only $1.75 a thousand, net.

Mr. BAYNE. It is less than that in Pittsburgh.

Mr. NEAL. I think so. Therefore, while I am not here as the defender of the gas company or anything of that kind, the investigations we have made in our committee have satisfied me the price is now as low perhaps as it ought to be. I fully sympathize with what the gentleman from Maine has said in regard to the propriety of substituting electric lights for gas in this city. I trust that may be done. But it cannot be done by putting down the price of coal gas so low that it cannot be manufactured.

Mr. MILLS. They make 66 per cent. profit.

Mr. NEAL. Oh, no.

Mr. MILLS. The report says so.

Mr. BLACKBURN. I desire to say a word in vindication of the action of the Appropriations Committee with reference to this appropriation. When I chanced to be the chairman of the Committee on the District of Columbia I had occasion to look into the operations of this gas company and the prices at which they furnished gas to the District. The House may as well understand it once for all. This gas company is the creature of this Congress, it owes its charter to Congress, and is amenable to such laws and such rates of compensation as Congress may prescribe. Your power is absolute in dealing with this company. You may put its price of gas at any rate of charge you please, and it has no recourse.

I trust, therefore, that recognizing this power as complete and full in the premises, this House will deal fairly with the question. The price of gas has been reduced three times by Congressional action. It stands to-day at the nominal price of $25 per lamp in the matter of lighting the streets, and for Government use. That is the nominal price. It is $25 a lamp, less the cost of lighting, cleaning, and repairing the lamps, which is $5.60; so that in point of fact the cost of lighting the streets to-day to the Government is not $25, but $19.40 per burner.

Again, by the act of June 23, 1874, the company is required in lighting the streets of this city to use a six-foot burner, whereas in the city of New York a three-foot burner is used. In the wide avenues of this city and its much wider streets than those of any other city on this continent, a three-foot burner would be insufficient. This is an additional charge upon the company, and yet the actual rate of charge against the Government for gas in this city to-day is not $25 a lamp, nor $20 a lamp, but deducting the cost of lighting and repairs it is $19.40 a lamp.

I hold in my hand a tabulated statement which I desire to submit to the House that they may see whether this is too costly a rate or not. I do not deal with the figure of $19.40 a lamp. I shall give the gas company no credit for the deduction of $5.60 a lamp for lighting, cleaning, and repairing. I deal with the nominal or the maximum figure. I hold in my hand an authentic statement of the cost of gas in all the principal cities. In the city of Washington it is put down at $2 a thousand; that is the maximum or nominal price; because the cost to the individual on account of the rebate is $1.75 per thousand, and to the Government it is $1.47. The following is the tabulated statement to which I have referred of the rates charged in many of the principal cities of the country:

Memoranda as to price of gas, January, 1881.

	Price per M.
Richmond, Virginia, (works owned by city)	$2 00
Washington, District of Columbia, (private company)	2 00
Georgetown, District of Columbia, (private company)	2 25
Baltimore, (private company)	2 00
Wilmington, (private company)	2 00
Philadelphia, (works owned by city)	2 00
Trenton, New Jersey, (private company)	2 50
Newark, New Jersey, (private company)	2 50
Jersey City, New Jersey, (private company)	2 50
New York, (private company)	2 25
Brooklyn, (private company)	2 00
New Haven, (private company)	2 50
Hartford, (private company)	2 50
Providence, (private company)	2 25
Boston, (private company)	2 00
Portland, Maine, (private company)	2 50

In Baltimore $1.85 per thousand is charged for gas used in street-lamps; and the city lights, extinguishes, cleans, and repairs the lanterns.

In Boston $1.75 per thousand is charged, and the city does the same as at Baltimore.

The city of Washington, according to the above tabulated and authenticated statement, is to-day furnishing gas cheaper than any of the other cities on this continent included in that statement. [Here the hammer fell.] One word more and I have done. If the House thinks this price is too high its power is complete and absolute to reduce it to whatever point it pleases.

Mr. ROBESON. If Congress makes the rate too low will not the gas company be obliged to recoup on the city?

Mr. BLACKBURN. In that case they must of necessity advance their rates on the individual consumer; and when the rate charged for gas stands here at the lowest rate known on the continent, it seems to me hardly fair to force the gas company to make good its losses by reason of arbitrary legislation at the expense of individuals.

Mr. COBB. I offer a pro forma amendment. I do not regard it as a very safe rule to look into the contracts and the price of gas in other cities. I know one thing. When those contracts are looked into you will find those gas companies all over this country make from 25 to 50 per cent. profit every year; and I know another thing, that so far as my experience is concerned in the city of Washington I have never been in a city in this country where the gas was so poor and the light so poor. I am occupying a first floor, and it takes four burners to make such a light as I can see to read by. I have never had this occur in any other city. We have had gas in my town for twenty-odd years, and with one single burner in my parlor, sitting-room, or office I get as much light as from the four burners in the room I have occupied here for three years.

I called the attention of this gas company, through its attorney, last winter was a year ago, to the character of the light. He undertook to remedy it by putting new burners on my chandelier. When he had put on the new burners the pressure was not great enough, and the consequence was that my light after all was very dim.

I say that in my judgment there are no people beneath the sun who are so much imposed upon as the people of Washington by this gas company, which is drawing from them their life-blood as it were by making them pay every year for gas which the company does not furnish.

I have carefully considered this gas question. I remember that at one time, as a member of the city council of my own city, I sent all over the country for the purpose of getting the best information I could on the subject. And I say to you that the gas company of this city, furnishing the quality of gas it does and with the prices which it charges, can make 50 per cent. profit every year; and I know what I am saying.

It is an outrage upon this House, upon the members of it who are supplied with gas by this company. A year ago, during the investigation to which the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations [Mr. HISCOCK] alluded a moment ago, I called the agent of this gas company before the committee. He said that if we reduced the price per lamp from $30 to $25 the company would have to stop. I told him that they could stop it, then; let the city be in darkness until we could procure other means of lighting it.

Then, a Mr. Spaulding, whom the gentleman well knows, came along with his brush light and proposed to light up the city. And immediately the mouth of the gas company was closed from that time to this, and we cut down the price to what it now is. And I say to you that if we reduce the price to $20 per lamp I have no doubt in the world that the gas company will obtain a profit of at least 25 per cent.

In Pittsburgh, where my friend lives, the gas company can furnish gas for sixty cents per thousand feet, as the gentleman well knows. Of course the gas company of Pittsburgh has some facilities which this company in Washington has not; they can get their coal more conveniently and cheaper and they can get better coal from which to make their gas. But the ordinary charges of the company in this city, with the pressure put on here, is equivalent to $4 a thousand feet. The company cheats the people of this city and defrauds them day by day and night by night; that is the fact. I know it from my own experience and investigation.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired. The pro forma amendment having been withdrawn, the question recurs upon the amendment of the gentleman from Maine [Mr. MURCH] to strike out "$25" and insert "$20" as the price per lamp for gas.

The question was taken upon the amendment; and upon a division there were—ayes 36, noes 27.

So (no further count being called for) the amendment was adopted.

The Clerk read the following:

For the construction, maintenance, and repair of military-telegraph lines: For the construction and continuing the construction, maintenance, and use of military-telegraph lines on the Indian and Mexican frontiers and in the Northwest, for the connection of military posts and stations, and for the better protection of immigration and the frontier settlements from depredations, especially in the States of Texas and Nevada and the Territories of New Mexico, Arizona, Dakota, Washington, Montana, Idaho, and Wyoming, and the Indian Territory, under the provisions of the acts approved March 3, 1875, and June 20, 1878, $50,000: Provided, That out of said sum the Secretary of War is hereby authorized, in his discretion, to purchase the Cheyenne and Black Hills Telegraph Line, running from Fort Laramie, Wyoming Territory, to Deadwood, Dakota Territory, with the branch line running from Hat Creek, Wyoming Territory, to Fort Robinson, in the State of Nebraska, and all telegraph-line material, instruments, batteries, repair tools, and office furniture for the operation and repair of said lines, at a price to be fixed in his discretion, not to exceed $15,000.

Mr. McCOOK. Before we pass over this item I think the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations [Mr. HISCOCK] should explain it to the committee. In the mean time I will reserve any point of order upon it.

Mr. HISCOCK. The only explanation I can make is this: this paragraph was put in with discretionary power to purchase this telegraph line. A communication from the late Secretary of War was brought to the attention of the committee by some member of the House, and this paragraph was inserted in the bill, embracing the language here employed, giving discretionary power to the Secretary of War to purchase this line if he chose.

Mr. McCOOK. As I understand, the present Secretary of War has never made any recommendation of the kind.

Mr. DUNN. I will inform the gentleman from New York [Mr. McCOOK] that the present Secretary of War and the Signal Officer have reported to the Committee on Pacific Railroads against this purchase, saying that there was no necessity for it. There was a bill pending before the Committee on Pacific Railroads on this subject, and the committee have decided against the purchase.

Mr. HISCOCK. I do not object to its going out.

Mr. DUNN. It ought to go out of the bill.

Mr. McCOOK. I make a point of order against it.

Mr. HISCOCK. It is not subject to a point of order.

Mr. McCOOK. Then I move to strike out the proviso of this paragraph, beginning in line 950.

Mr. SPRINGER. I understand that this paragraph is subject to a point of order, and I make it.

The CHAIRMAN. The paragraph was discussed prior to the making of the point of order.

Mr. SPRINGER. The gentleman from New York [Mr. McCOOK] made the point of order.

Mr. McCOOK. I reserved the point of order if it was necessary to make it.

The CHAIRMAN. The motion to strike out the proviso will be submitted to the Committee of the Whole.

The proviso was as follows:

Provided, That out of said sum the Secretary of War is hereby authorized, in his discretion, to purchase the Cheyenne and Black Hills Telegraph Line, running from Fort Laramie, Wyoming Territory, to Deadwood, Dakota Territory, with a branch line running from Hat Creek, Wyoming Territory, to Fort Robinson, in the State of Nebraska, and all telegraph-line material, instruments, batteries, repair tools, and office furniture for the operation and repair of said lines, at a price to be fixed in his discretion, not to exceed $15,000.

The question was taken upon the motion to strike out the proviso, and it was agreed to.

The Clerk read the following:

And it is provided that to support the Signal Service no money shall be expended except such as is appropriated by this act and the act making appropriations for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government for the fiscal year 1883, and such sums as are specifically appropriated for said service in the act making appropriations for the support of the Army for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1883, and for other purposes; and the further sum of $300,000, payable from the respective appropriations in said last-named act, similar to those heretofore drawn upon for its support, which sum, or so much thereof as may be necessary, the Secretary of War may apply to the support of said service from said appropriations; and it is further provided that at the next session of Congress the Secretary of War shall submit to Congress a detailed estimate of the force required for the Signal Service for the fiscal year commencing July 1, 1883, of the officers and other employés that will be necessary, and their compensation, respectively, and the amount that should be appropriated for labor when the employés cannot be specifically estimated for, and for material and for rent of offices and for any other objects that he may deem necessary, each separately stated.

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. I desire to call the attention of the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations to this paragraph. A communication was sent by the superintendent of the Signal Service Bureau calling attention to the fact that owing to the peculiar phraseology of this paragraph the money intended to be appropriated for the use of the Signal Service cannot be used for that service. I will call the attention of the chairman of the committee to the phraseology referred to.

Mr. HISCOCK. What is the date of the communication which the gentleman has?

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. I think the gentleman has one of the same character.

Mr. HISCOCK. What is the date?

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. July 8. I will call attention to that communication in a moment. I read from the bill:

And it is provided that to support the Signal Service no money shall be expended except such as is appropriated by this act and the act making appropriations for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government for the fiscal year 1883, and such sums as are specifically appropriated for said service in the act making appropriations for the support of the Army for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1883, and for other purpose.

Now, there is no specific appropriation for that purpose.

Mr. HISCOCK. Oh, yes, there is.

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. While the whole amount is included here, it is not specifically named.

Mr. HISCOCK. Oh, yes.

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. That is the point which the Chief Signal Officer makes. His letter is here and I would like to call attention to it, so that if this clause is so worded as to defeat the intention of the appropriation it may be corrected.

Mr. HISCOCK. The Army bill makes an appropriation, I believe, of $10,000 specifically for the Signal Service. Then in the appropriation for the pay of enlisted men of the Army provision is made for five hundred enlisted men in the Signal Service. Those are the items which we intended to indicate, the pay of the enlisted men and the $10,000 for the Signal Service appropriated in the Army bill. Then it was the intention of the committee in adopting this phraseology to take $300,000 more from the Army bill.

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. That is the point the officer makes, that under the peculiar phraseology the money cannot be used for the Signal Service, but is appropriated for the use of the Army. I ask that this letter may be read so that the error, if there is one, may be corrected. My attention has just been called to the matter. The committee certainly does not desire to defeat the object of the provision.

The Clerk read as follows:

WAR DEPARTMENT,
OFFICE OF THE CHIEF SIGNAL OFFICER,
Washington City, July 8, 1882.

MY DEAR SIR: The House Committee on Appropriations has seen fit to make such parts of the general appropriations for the Army specific as refer to the maintenance of the Signal Corps; that is, for such quartermaster stores, transportation of instruments and men, extra-duty pay, commutation of rations, and medical supplies and attendance, not previously specifically provided, but has not set aside the full amount already appropriated for this purpose in the Army bill by $60,000, that sum being about $360,000, while they have given $300,000. These expenditures are indispensable, the rates being fixed by law and regulations over which this bureau has no control, and unless this sum is added to that already made specific on pages 40 and 41, lines 973 to 974, House bill 6716, there will be a deficiency at the close of the year of this amount.

This change will add nothing to the money appropriated for the Army, only authorizing its use for the Signal Corps, for which it has already been appropriated, in place of practically transferring it to the general uses of the Army.

Also lines 936-937, page 39 of this bill cut off from the appropriation as estimated for and previously reported, for the observation and report of storms, $60,000. This will destroy one-sixth of the work of this bureau, the full amount, $310,000, being absolutely essential to the service as now constituted, and it cannot be fully carried on at a less expense. The telegraphic and other work is now done at the least possible expense, and if this appropriation is reduced a part of the work must be omitted that will impair the whole. The service is now carried on with great regularity and accuracy, at the least possible cost, and if this reduction is now made the Signal Corps, "as now constituted," and its work cannot be maintained during the current year.

I have been informed that this reduction and specific legislation has arisen because of the Howgate defalcation, believing that the bureau can now bear it, but I had already deducted the probable yearly default, or about $60,000, from my estimates and brought it to the lowest possible figure, and because I had done my duty and exposed fraud I do not think it fair treatment that that fact should be used to cripple my bureau, as these reductions certainly will. The law now requires that the Signal Corps "be maintained as now constituted," which cannot be done if these deductions are made. All the expenditures of the corps are so guarded and carefully regulated that there can be no loose or improper expenditure in it. These sums must be included, or the work of this bureau will necessarily suffer. The natural growth of the work, with the addition of the cotton region reports, has added largely to the expense during the past year, of which no estimate is included.

I am, very respectfully, your obedient servant,

W. B. HAZEN,
Brig. and Bvt. Maj. Gen'l, Chief Signal Officer United States Army.

Hon. GEORGE W. STEELE, M. C.,
House of Representatives, Washington. D. C.

Mr. BUTTERWORTH, (interrupting the reading.) Mr. Chairman, the reading might as well be suspended, for nobody is listening.

Mr. HISCOCK. The gentleman, if he has himself listened, must have discovered that the letter does not criticise the phraseology of the bill; but the point is made that we do not appropriate enough.

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. If that is so, I do not propose to discuss the propriety of increasing the appropriation. But if the error suggested in the communication does exist, I would like to correct it hereafter.

Mr. HISCOCK. At some other time I will not object to an amendment in that respect, to make it clear and certain that the money we intend to devote to this purpose may be so used.

The CHAIRMAN. There being no amendment, the Clerk will proceed with the reading of the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

For the road to Arlington, Virginia, National Cemetery: For repair of the road leading from the Aqueduct bridge, Georgetown, District of Columbia, to the Arlington National Cemetery, Virginia, $5,000.

Mr. McCOOK. These appropriations are under the head of the War Department; but it seems to me it would be well to amend the bill so as to state specifically that the amounts are to be expended under the direction of the Secretary of War.

Mr. HISCOCK. There is no doubt about that being the construction.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair would remark that the portion of the bill the clerk is reading is under the heading of "War Department."

Mr. McCOOK. But in a previous part of the bill it is stated specifically that certain appropriations shall be expended under the direction of the Secretary of War. My suggestion may be hypercritical, but it seems to me no doubt should be left as to the meaning of the language.

Mr. HISCOCK. The reason for adopting the language in the former provision was that some question has been made by the auditing officers in reference to that. In regard to this, there is no such question.

Mr. McCOOK. If there is any doubt, I think we had better provide that these appropriations shall be expended under the direction of the Secretary of War.

Mr. HISCOCK. They are absolutely under the control of the War Department, the auditing officers paying only upon the approval of the Secretary of War.

Mr. GUNTER. I move to amend by inserting after the pending paragraph the following:

For improving the road leading from Fayetteville, Arkansas, to the national cemetery, near that city, $5,000.

For the purpose of showing the size and character of this cemetery——

Mr. HISCOCK. I make a point of order on this amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York makes or reserves a point of order?

Mr. HISCOCK. I make a point of order. Let the amendment be read again.

The Clerk again read the amendment.

Mr. HISCOCK. The point of order I make is that there is no work of that sort in progress.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is not advised what has been done heretofore.

Mr. GUNTER. If the gentleman has reference to the roadway there is no improvement made, but there is a national cemetery there.

Mr. HISCOCK. The road he proposes to improve is entirely outside of the cemetery.

Mr. GUNTER. It is the main road.

Mr. HISCOCK. In no way connected with public property, and therefore it is not a public work.

Mr. GUNTER. When the Clerk reads the portion of the report which I have sent up, the gentleman will find that it is a portion of public property, and that it does belong to the Government.

Mr. HISCOCK. It is precisely like the cases where bills have been introduced to build roads to cemeteries, &c.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will hear the report read as a part of the remarks of the gentleman from Arkansas on the point of order.

Mr. GUNTER. Yes, sir.

The Clerk read as follows:

ARKANSAS—FAYETTEVILLE NATIONAL CEMETERY.

This cemetery is situated about one mile southwest of the court-house.

The lot is a rectangle, about 462 feet wide east and west by 564 feet long north and south, and contains nearly six acres of rolling land, which, with the right of way to the country road, was purchased by the United States for the sum of $700. It is inclosed by a brick wall finished this year. It is built of good materials and looks well. The entrance is in the center of the north side. It is closed by double iron gates over the carriage-way, and by two small side gates, all hung on stone piers.

Mr. GUNTER. In connection with that, Mr. Chairman, I wish to say there are 1,205 soldiers buried in that cemetery. It is about a quarter of a mile from the main entrance to the main road leading to the town in which I live. The right of way was purchased with the cemetery, and belongs to the Government of the United States. It not only belongs to the Government of the United States but there has been more or less improvement made of that right of way, but not sufficient to make it easy of travel from the cemetery to the town on the outside of the cemetery, and particularly on Decoration Day and other public occasions.

Furthermore, Mr. Chairman, the Secretary of War has made a report to the Committee on Military Affairs (to which I had referred a bill on the subject) asking for this appropriation. The Secretary recommended this appropriation be made.

The CHAIRMAN. It seems this amendment is not for the improvement of any right of way belonging to the United States.

Mr. GUNTER. Oh, yes, it is.

The CHAIRMAN. But that it is for the improvement of a road leading from Fayetteville, Arkansas, to the national cemetery near that city, which includes the whole road.

Mr. GUNTER. Yes, sir; that road proposed to be improved is the property of the Government, as is shown by the report which I had read from the desk a moment ago.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair begs to be corrected if in error. Is this road which is proposed to be improved the right of way to the county road?

Mr. GUNTER. That is so; and I will ask that my amendment be so modified.

The CHAIRMAN. The amendment will be read as modified by the gentleman from Arkansas.

The Clerk read as follows:

For improving the road leading from the county road near Fayetteville, Arkansas, to the national cemetery near that city, $5,000.

Mr. HISCOCK. It is the same amendment, and the gentleman's modification does not improve it. It is for building a road from some point near the cemetery, and not for improving the Government property near the cemetery.

Mr. GUNTER. I will modify it.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman insist on his point of order?

Mr. HISCOCK. There is no point of order on that; but I desire to say if it is for the improvement of Government property under the general clause appropriating money for that purpose we have given all that is proper to be given. I am utterly and entirely opposed to appropriating a gross sum for a particular purpose and then enlarging it for objects included under the general appropriation.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order not being made, the Chair will hear the gentleman from Arkansas on the merits of the proposition.

Mr. GUNTER. I will state in reply to the gentleman from New York that there is no general appropriation in this bill which can be applied to this special purpose, and there are several appropriations made in this bill for similar purposes to that of my amendment.

Mr. BROWNE. What is the distance between the county road and the cemetery?

Mr. GUNTER. About one-quarter of a mile, and in winter-time and in wet weather it is almost impassable.

Mr. BROWNE. And it takes $5,000 to construct one-quarter of a mile of road in Arkansas?

Mr. GUNTER. Yes, sir, at that place, and the Secretary of War recommended a higher sum than that.

Mr. BROWNE. What is the character of the county road where the cemetery road intersects it?

Mr. GUNTER. It is a good road, for it enters within the boundaries of the city.

Mr. BURROWS, of Michigan. I would like to ask the gentleman from Arkansas if this is recommended by any one?

Mr. GUNTER. This bill to which I have referred I introduced, and it was sent to the Committee on Military Affairs and by that committee referred to a sub-committee of which the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. DAVIS] was chairman. He referred it, I am informed by the clerk of the committee, to the Secretary of War, and the Secretary of War recommended that the appropriation should be made for the construction of the road, on the 11th of April, I believe.

Mr. BURROWS, of Michigan. Without opposing this amendment I desire to say that I find from the report of the Secretary of War that there are 1,200 bodies interred in this cemetery; that it is beautifully located on an elevated piece of ground, and that the amount expended on it up to June 20, 1874, was $24,217.79, and the amount estimated for the year 1875–'76 was $750. But I do not find any recommendation in that for the construction of this road.

Mr. GUNTER. No, for that report was made in 1874.

Mr. BURROWS, of Michigan. The latter reports which I have also examined, as far as I have been able to discover, make no such recommendation. Certainly I have not been able to find any.

Mr. DAVIS, of Illinois. I desire to say simply, Mr. Chairman, that the bill introduced by the gentleman from Arkansas was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, and by that referred to a sub-committee, and that committee have not acted upon the question.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment of the gentleman from Arkansas as modified, appropriating $5,000.

The amendment was not agreed to.

Mr. ROBESON. I desire to recur now for a moment to the paragraph which has been already passed with regard to the Signal Service, and offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The CHAIRMAN. The amendment will be read:

Insert after line 988:

"And it is provided that no detail of an officer from the line of the Army for duty on the Signal Service shall be for a longer period than three years."

Mr. RANDALL. That is new legislation.

Mr. ROBESON. It is directly in accord with that paragraph of the bill and limits it.

Mr. RANDALL. I insist that is new legislation, and as such subject to the point of order.

Mr. ROBESON. It directs how that appropriation shall be used.

Mr. RANDALL. I insist upon the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. Unless gentlemen wish to discuss the point of order the Chair is ready to rule upon it. The Chair regards it as obnoxious to the rule. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Miscellaneous objects:

For the transportation of reports and maps to foreign countries: For the transportation of reports and maps to foreign countries, through the Smithsonian Institution, $300.

Mr. ROBINSON, of New York. I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

Insert after line 1017:

"For the purchase of seventy-five copies of Hunter and Patton's Port Charges of the World for the use of United States consulates, to be distributed by the Secretary of State, $1,875."

Mr. HISCOCK. I make the point of order that that amendment is not germane to the bill; it is new legislation; it provides for the purchase of property or of publications not authorized by existing law, and is not in order on this bill.

Mr. ROBINSON, of New York. Mr. Chairman, in response to the point of order made by my colleague, I wish to say simply that this matter has been recommended by the Secretary of State; and I hold in my hand an original letter from Secretary Frelinghuysen asking that this be done. Merchants have been requesting for some time that this should be done; and I see no inconsistency in this amendment that does not appear in many others which have been presented in connection with this bill.

It is absolutely necessary for the benefit of our merchants in foreign countries that they should have the opportunity of consulting this work. Its importance is apparent to all. In two or three minutes I could explain the necessity for it, but on the point of order I am not able to enter into the merits of the question. I should like, however, to have Secretary Frelinghuysen's letter read in this connection.

The CHAIRMAN. Unless it relates to the point of order the Chair could hardly entertain it and allow it to be read at this time.

Several MEMBERS. Print it.

Mr. ROBINSON, of New York. I will submit the matter to the decision of the Chair, but I hope that this amendment will not be ruled out of order.

The CHAIRMAN. This is a proposition, as the Chair understands, to purchase books which are privately published, for the use of the Government, and where no provision is made by existing law for their purchase or use. That being the condition of the amendment, the Chair is compelled to hold that it is obnoxious to the point of order, and that it cannot be entertained. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read the following paragraph:

Lands and other property of the United States: For custody, care, protection, and sale of lands and other property belonging to the United States, $1,000. The Secretary of the Treasury is authorized to sell such lands as have been acquired by the United States by devise, upon such terms and after such public notice by advertisement as he may deem best for the public interest.

Mr. HOGE. I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

That the third section of the act of June 14, 1878, entitled "An act authorizing the Solicitor of the Treasury, by and with the consent of the Secretary of War, to cancel certain contracts for the sale of land made at Harper's Ferry, in the year 1869, by the United States, to resell the same, and sell or lease all other real estate and riparian rights now owned by the United States at Harper's Ferry, West Virginia," be amended to read as follows:

"SEC. 3. That the Solicitor of the Treasury is further authorized to make sale of the whole or any part of said property, or, if he deems it expedient and better for the public welfare, lease for any term of years or sell any part of all other real estate and riparian rights now owned by the United States at or near Harper's Ferry, Jefferson County, West Virginia: Provided, That the Solicitor of the Treasury, with the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury, shall, before the sale of the water-power property, cause it to be appraised at its fair cash value by three sworn appraisers, to be appointed by the Secretary of the Treasury; and the Solicitor of the Treasury may, in his discretion, allow the said property to be bid off at such appraised value upon such terms and after such public notice as he may deem best for the public interests."

Mr. HISCOCK. I make the point of order on the amendment that it is new legislation and does not retrench expenditure.

Mr. HOGE rose.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will hear the gentleman from West Virginia [Mr. HOGE] on the point of order.

Mr. KENNA. I ask the gentleman from New York to reserve the point of order.

Mr. HISCOCK. I cannot reserve the point of order. It is patent the amendment is subject to the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will hear the gentleman from West Virginia, if he desires to be heard on the point of order.

Mr. HOGE. The amendment is directly in the line of the provision of the bill as reported. The paragraph in the bill authorizes the Secretary of the Treasury—

To sell such lands as have been acquired by the United States by devise, upon such terms and after such public notice by advertisement as he may deem best for the public interest.

Now, this amendment comes from the Solicitor of the Treasury with the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury. It is in the line of the exercise of the very power which is meant to be conferred here by the bill. It does not change the existing law with reference to any increased expenditure, but merely amends the law with regard to the mode of sale.

Mr. ATKINS. Does the law provide for the sale of this property?

Mr. HOGE. It does.

Mr. ATKINS. And this is simply modifying that law?

Mr. HOGE. It simply modifies that law. And I may refer to a fact bearing on the point of order. It increases no expenditure. They have actually to pay more for the custody of this property than it is worth. The desire now is to ascertain by appraisers appointed by the Secretary of the Treasury himself what is the fair market value of the property; and the amendment gives authority to sell at that price, so as to get rid of what is a source of expense. It is a matter of extreme importance in the estimation of the Secretary of the Treasury.

Mr. HISCOCK. The question is whether this is new legislation. It is the amendment of an existing statute, and it certainly is not in the direction of reducing expenditure. No purpose of that kind is to be effected. Now, I certainly cannot consent here to waive a point of order on an amendment for the sale of valuable property belonging to the Government when the committee that reported this bill has not had a chance to investigate it, and when it is proposed to have it merely considered here in this hasty way. I must therefore insist upon my point of order. I have been pressed here upon this floor by a dozen gentlemen to allow amendments to the bill to sell armories, and all that sort of thing, in different States, and I have resisted in every instance, and they have yielded.

Mr. KENNA. I desire to make a single statement on the point of order. The bill as reported by the committee contains an appropriation of $1,000—

For custody, care, protection, and sale of lands and other property belonging to the United States.

It is conceded this property is worthless so far as concerns any use to which the Government desires to put it, and it may as well be conceded it is a source of expense to the Government as it stands.

It is a fact that under existing law the sale is provided for. The only effect of the amendment offered by my colleague is to change the manner of the sale. The sale itself will reduce expenditures of the Government in reducing the cost of taking care of the property, and I submit the amendment is in order in the full spirit of the rule.

Mr. HISCOCK. I desire to make one other suggestion as to the species or class of property to which this Harper's Ferry belongs; and this presents another ground for the point of order, namely, that the amendment is not germane. This item does not look to the care of that kind of property at all. The armory department is under the control of the Secretary of War and is looked after by that Department of the Government, while the appropriation in this paragraph is for miscellaneous purposes.

Mr. HOGE. If the gentleman will permit me, I will say that this property, by special statute, is under the care of the Solicitor of the Treasury.

Mr. HISCOCK. Admitting that to be true, the amendment looks to an entirely different purpose from that embraced in the paragraph.

Mr. KENNA. It will not do for the gentleman from New York to say what the provision in the bill looks to when that provision on its face shows nothing of the kind. The clause itself does not indicate that the property the care of which is provided for is of that particular character. It is as general as language can make it. It is a fact that this very property which is embraced in the amendment of my colleague is a source of cost to the Government. The moment the law providing for its sale is carried out in the manner here proposed the Government will be relieved of that cost. I submit, therefore, that the amendment is not obnoxious to the rule.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is ready to rule on the point of order. The Chair calls the attention of gentlemen to the fact that the legislation proposed in the amendment passes beyond anything in the bill. It provides for the canceling of certain contracts to begin with——

Mr. HOGE. If the Chair will permit me, that is only the title of the act.

The CHAIRMAN. The old act, passed in 1869, provides for reselling or leasing all the real estate and riparian rights now owned by the United States at Harper's Ferry. It is proposed to substitute for that the right to sell the whole or any part of said property if deemed expedient and better for the public welfare, to lease for a term of years, &c.

Mr. KENNA. All that is provided for in the existing law. The only change proposed by the amendment is in regard to the appraisal.

The CHAIRMAN. In that case the Chair would regard it as an amendment, not of this act making an appropriation, but of a different statute, already a part of the law. That would therefore be general legislation on an appropriation bill, and the Chair must rule it out.

Mr. HOGE. This paragraph now provides that—

The Secretary of the Treasury is authorized to sell such lands as have been acquired by the United States by devise, upon such terms and after such public notice by advertisement as he may deem best for the public interest.

Mr. HISCOCK. The point of order has been decided.

Mr. HOGE. I understand that. I am referring to this paragraph of the bill. The portion which I have referred to is new legislation.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair regards it as new legislation, but no point of order was made against it.

Mr. HOGE. I know that; but I desire to move an amendment to insert after the words "by devise" the words "or by purchase."

Mr. HISCOCK. I make the point of order that that is new legislation.

Mr. HOGE. The paragraph in the bill is new legislation.

Mr. HISCOCK. I admit that it is new legislation, but it stands here without any objection having been made to it, and is now a part of the bill.

Mr. KENNA. If the gentleman makes a point of order against the amendment of my colleague [Mr. HOGE] I will make a point of order against the entire clause.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will hold that it is within the power of the committee to amend a clause of the bill by increasing or diminishing the appropriation or by enlarging the scope of legislation there proposed. The Chair entertains the amendment of the gentleman from West Virginia, [Mr. HOGE.]

Mr. HOGE. I will state briefly the object of my amendment. Under existing law it is impossible, without great expense, without advertising all over the country at an enormous cost, to sell this property at Harper's Ferry.

There has been an utterly mistaken idea as to the value of the property, which idea has embarassed the Secretary of the Treasury and the Solicitor. They now understand that the property is comparatively valueless.

The retention of it by the United States will be to keep the town of Harper's Ferry in the condition of a deserted village for all time to come. No one will purchase this property, as was expected at one time, for the purpose of establishing large manufactories there.

It was sold at one time for a large sum to a syndicate organized here in Washington, as gentlemen well know. Not one sixpence of that sum was ever paid, and the contract was forfeited. The property now lies there in ruins, as gentlemen can see any day in going by there, and no offer is made for it.

Manufacturing enterprise and capital are not going into the interior where there is no raw material to be converted into the manufactured article, because if they did so the consequence would be that they would have to pay the cost of transportation of the raw material as well as of the manufactured article, and they would not be enabled to compete with other manufacturers. It is true the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad would take it for a song, but they do not require it.

Mr. VALENTINE. I would inquire of the gentleman if that historic spot known as John Brown's Fort is included in this property?

Mr. HOGE. John Brown's Fort is included.

Mr. VALENTINE. Then I object to it, because I want to reserve that for a monument.

Mr. WILSON. Take it out in Nebraska, if you want it.

Mr. HOGE. The object of the amendment which I offered, which was prepared by the Secretary of the Treasury himself, and was ruled out of order, was to enable the Secretary of the Treasury to make some disposition of this property. I now move to insert the words "or by purchase" after the words "by devise," in order to enlarge the authority given by this section, so that without being limited and cramped by the existing law in regard to expensive advertisements the solicitor may have power to sell this property under this provision as he would sell other property.

Mr. HISCOCK. I desire to call the attention of the committee to the enormous power that this amendment would give to an officer of the Government—the power to sell all the lands that we have acquired by purchase. This is proposed here upon an appropriation bill which we are hastily considering.

It was proposed to amend the statute regulating the sale of property which might be acquired by purchase, and that would have been equally vicious. I apprehend that there is no man who would desire to vest, not simply in one officer of the Government but in all officers of the Government, this vast and comprehensive power.

Mr. HOGE. Will the gentleman permit me——

Mr. HISCOCK. I will make a statement in reference to this provision in this appropriation bill, in order that the committee may see how far the Committee on Appropriations have gone. There are little pieces of property all over the United States—I do not know that there are more than one or two of them—that have been devised to the United States. They are parts, perhaps, of the residuary estate of some individual who devised the residuum of his estate to the General Government. It is not property which was purchased by the United States because the Government had some use to which it could put it, but an estate which has come to the Government and which the Government wishes to liquidate and settle up and take possession of.

Mr. HOGE. I will cover that point most gladly, and modify my amendment.

Mr. HISCOCK. I am opposed to any form or modification of the amendment on this bill which will authorize the sale of any property which the United States Government has purchased.

Mr. HOGE. I will modify my amendment so as to insert, after the words "by devise," the words "or by purchase at Harper's Ferry, West Virginia."

Mr. ROBESON. The gentleman from West Virginia [Mr. HOGE] yields to me to make a suggestion. I wish to remind him that the expressions "by devise" and "by purchase" are in law synonymous, and that he had better use the phrase "by deed" instead of "by purchase."

Mr. HOGE. Very well; I accept that suggestion; it would not make any difference under our law, but I will modify the amendment by striking out "purchase" and inserting "deed."

The question being taken on agreeing to the amendment, it was not agreed to, there being—ayes 32, noes 44.

The Clerk read as follows:

For continuing the publication of the official records, and printing and binding, under direction of the Secretary of War, of 10,000 copies of a compilation of the official records, Union and confederate, of the war of the rebellion, so far as the same may be ready for publication during the fiscal year, to be distributed as provided in the act approved June 16, 1880, $33,000.

Mr. DAVIS, of Illinois. I move to amend by adding after the paragraph just read the proviso which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Provided, That the Secretary of War be, and he hereby is, authorized to receive, for the period of one year from the passage of this act, from the late commanding officers of the United States troops serving in the war of the rebellion, or from the senior officer now living who participated in the actions or in the campaigns of said troops, reports of their respective commands; also from those officers who wish to correct errors in their original reports, or who can furnish additional information by more complete and detailed reports. The reports received in pursuance of this act shall be arranged and prepared, under the direction of the Secretary of War, for publication in a supplemental volume to series 1 of the history of the war now being prepared and published.

Mr. HISCOCK. I make a point of order on this amendment. In the first place, it is new legislation; in the second place, it is a bill pending before the House.

The CHAIRMAN. On the last point the amendment is very visibly subject to the point of order. Does the gentleman from Illinois desire to be heard upon the question?

Mr. DAVIS, of Illinois. I had hoped that the Committee on Appropriations would not raise any point upon this amendment, as it is legislation which is necessary, and which every soldier who served during the war of the rebellion, every man who has read the history of the war, knows ought to be passed. The records of many of our corps and regiments are deficient; and although this amendment embodies the provisions of a bill pending before the House, it is a measure which has been asked for by many of our Grand Army of the Republic organizations as well as by the society which has been formed for the purpose of securing and preserving materials for the history of the war. Of course, if the chairman of the committee does not withdraw his point of order, I must submit.

The CHAIRMAN. Having heard the gentlemen from Illinois on the point of order, the Chair is obliged to sustain it.

Mr. SPRINGER. I move to amend the paragraph by striking out the words "to be distributed as provided in the act approved June 16, 1880," and inserting "to be distributed as may hereafter be provided by law."

Mr. HISCOCK. I believe that is subject to a point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The subject of the distribution of these documents being embraced in the bill itself, the Chair is disposed to consider it as being in the power of the Committee of the Whole to change the mode of distribution.

Mr. SPRINGER. Under the present law these records are being distributed, 15,000 copies to the House of Representatives and 10,000 to the Senate. This is a serial publication. The first volume of the series was published and distributed to members of the Forty-sixth Congress; the three succeeding volumes have been distributed to members of this Congress, who will probably receive one more volume, making five volumes which will have been distributed at the end of this Congress.

Mr. PEELLE. Does the gentleman say that the second volume was distributed to members of this Congress?

Mr. SPRINGER. I was mistaken. The first and second volumes were distributed during the last Congress; the third and fourth have been distributed to members of the present Congress. With the next Congress there will be an enlargement of thirty-two in the membership of this House, but no corresponding increase in the number of these publications. A great many members of the next Congress will be new members, whose volumes of this series will begin with volume 6. They will have none of the previous volumes. This publication will continue until it has reached between ninety and one hundred volumes, extending, perhaps, over a period of ten years. Those members who may retire from office with the close of this Congress will receive no later volume than the sixth. Thus the volumes which have been distributed will become fragmentary parts of uncompleted sets.

I desire to bring these facts to the attention of the committee for the purpose of showing that the entire method of distributing these volumes as now provided by law is wrong and ought to be discontinued. These volumes are valuable as public records. They are records—official records—Federal and confederate—of the war of the rebellion. They are suitable for public libraries and for private gentlemen who have space in their libraries for such records.

I desire that some other mode of distributing these books should be provided, some mode by which the volumes of this important work, upon the publication of which we have just entered, shall be placed in public libraries and in the hands of such individuals as may deserve to receive these publications. It is desirable that the entire publication to the end of the series shall pass into the same hands, so that when it has been completed, at an expense to the people of perhaps a million of dollars, it will be preserved in public and private libraries, and in that way be made a useful publication to historians and scholars desiring to study the authentic materials of the history of the late war. I ask my amendment be read, and I will say in addition that the Committee on Printing, if this amendment is agreed to, will report at an early day some means of distributing this publication which will be satisfactory to the House and Senate.

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out these words: "In the act approved June 16, 1880," and insert "as may hereafter be provided by law."

Mr. RYAN. Let me ask the gentleman from Illinois, if his amendment shall prevail and no subsequent action be taken in reference to the distribution of this publication, whether these volumes can be distributed at all?

Mr. SPRINGER. They will be held until a manner has been provided for their distribution. I desire they shall be held by the Public Printer until we shall determine some satisfactory mode of placing these volumes for preservation. I can tell gentlemen that will be done before we adjourn.

Mr. ROBESON. I think the original proposition which the Chair admitted as not subject to the point of order did not contain the words "as hereafter provided by law," and hence, referring as it does to laws hereafter to be enacted, it is clearly new legislation and not in order.

Mr. HISCOCK. This is the truth about it, that if you strike out this provision then there will be no mode for the distribution of these documents. The gentleman, I understand, proposes to bring in another bill.

Mr. BRIGGS. I want to ask the gentleman from Illinois whether any subsequent Congress, as these books are continued to be published, cannot change the mode of distribution to suit themselves? Is there any way by which the hands of any Congress hereafter can be tied up in reference to the distribution of these books.

Mr. SPRINGER. Of course that is so.

Mr. BRIGGS. That has been the result in previous Congresses where we have attempted to keep together sets of publications.

Mr. ATKINS. If the amendment shall prevail no future Congress would change the mode of distribution which shall be adopted, but would allow these books to go into public and private libraries where they could be consulted.

Mr. BRIGGS. I think that would not be the result. We cannot tie the hands of any future Congress, and the records of prior Congresses show such to be the fact.

Mr. SPRINGER. I have been asked frequently by members of the House as well as others for the republication of volumes 1 and 2 of this series which were printed and distributed in the last Congress. Members of this Congress not members of the last have begun with volume 3, and they have said, "We have not volumes 1 and 2, and those to whom we have sent the other volumes want volumes 1 and 2, and the only way in which we can get them is by the Committee on Printing bringing in a resolution to reprint those volumes." When we come to the next Congress the members who then come in for the first time will begin with volume 7, and will not have the preceding volume. We should settle the matter of the disposition of these important public documents now, so that the publication may be preserved in public and private libraries, where it may be consulted by students and others.

Mr. WILSON. When the Democratic party comes into power we will have this fight all over again. [Laughter.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time for debate on the amendment has expired.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 21, noes 36.

Mr. SPRINGER. No quorum.

The CHAIRMAN appointed Mr. HISCOCK and Mr. SPRINGER as tellers.

The committee again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 31, noes 76.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. HISCOCK. I move the committee rise.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. KASSON reported that the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union had, according to order, had under consideration the bill (H. R. No. 6716) making appropriations for sundry civil expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1883, and for other purposes, and had come to no resolution thereon.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. HISCOCK. Mr. Speaker, there is on the Speaker's table a joint resolution from the Senate containing an appropriation for some branch of service in the War Department, and I ask that it be taken up now. The Secretary of War has been here this afternoon and says it is necessary it should have immediate consideration.

The SPEAKER. Where is the resolution and what is its number?

GEORGE C. COBB.

Mr. RANDALL. While that is being found I desire to make a request. A law has been passed for the relief of George C. Cobb, allowing a new draft to be issued by the Treasury Department in favor of the minor children of a former officer of the revenue in the State of Alabama. Among these papers on file in the House is the original draft, which was on its transmission, but before reaching its destination the party for whom it was intended died; and I ask leave of the House to withdraw from the files of the House that original draft, in order that it may be delivered to the Treasury Department and a new draft issued. The amount is about $400.

The SPEAKER. Is there a bill authorizing the reissue?

Mr. RANDALL. It is now the law; but it is necessary that the original draft itself, which is among the papers on which the Committee on Ways and Means acted, should go to the Treasury Department to be destroyed before they can issue the new draft.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks that under the rule that can be done.

Mr. RANDALL. I do not ask for any of the papers other than the draft.

The SPEAKER. This can be done under the rule.

Mr. RANDALL. I thought it safer to ask permission of the House in this manner.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Pennsylvania?

Mr. RANDALL. I am quite willing that the Clerk of the House should send this draft to the Treasury Department. That is, perhaps, the better way, and I suggest that the Clerk of the House be directed to send it to the Treasury Department. The name of the party is George C. Cobb, and H. R. No. 5536 is the bill to which I have referred.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Pennsylvania?

There was no objection, and it was ordered accordingly.

PAY OF CERTAIN EMPLOYÉS OF THE WAR DEPARTMENT.

Mr. HISCOCK. I now call up, Mr. Speaker, for present consideration Senate joint resolution No. 91, authorizing the payment of salaries of certain employés of the War Department.

The SPEAKER. The joint resolution will be read.

The joint resolution was read. It is as follows:

Resolved, &c., That the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, authorized to cause to be paid from the appropriation heretofore made for the support of the Army for the current fiscal year the compensation of employés engaged in the Quartermaster-General's Department and the Subsistence Department in the investigations of claims under the act of July 4, 1864, and the necessary expenses of such investigations for that part of the current fiscal year ending on the 20th day of July, 1882.

Mr. HISCOCK. I move that the joint resolution be concurred in.

The Senate joint resolution was read a first and second time, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

Mr. HISCOCK moved to reconsider the vote by which the joint resolution was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

CORONNA, TAUSSIG & CO.

Mr. SPEER, from the Committee on Ways and Means, by unanimous consent, reported, as a substitute for House bill No. 3874, a bill (H. R. No. 6729) for the relief of Coronna, Taussig & Co. and others; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

PAY OF EMPLOYÉS, GOVERNMENT PRINTING OFFICE.

Mr. PEELLE. Mr. Speaker, I desire consent to call up at this time House joint resolution No. 69, for the purpose of concurring in the Senate amendment. I ask that it be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Joint resolution (H. R. No. 69) authorizing the Public Printer to pay the employés of the Government Printing Office the pay deducted from them during the obsequies of the late President Garfield, and for other purposes.

Mr. PEELLE. I ask that the Senate amendment be read.

The amendment is as follows:

Amend by adding at the end of the joint resolution the following: "and a sufficient sum therefor is hereby appropriated out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated."

The Senate amendment was agreed to.

Mr. PEELLE moved to reconsider the vote by which the Senate amendment was concurred in; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. ROBESON. I move that the House do now adjourn.

The SPEAKER. Pending the motion to adjourn, the Chair desires to submit some reports from the Committee on Enrolled Bills and some personal requests of members.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

Mr. ALDRICH, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found duly enrolled bills of the following titles; when the Speaker signed the same:

A bill (S. No. 1549) for the relief of William J. Pollock; and

A bill (S. No. 1960) authorizing the New Orleans and Northeastern Railroad to construct bridges over the channels of Pearl River and Lake Pontchartrain.

JUDICIAL DISTRICT, STATE OF IOWA.

The SPEAKER. The Chair desires to announce at this time the conferees on the part of the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the bill (H. R. No. 4166) to divide the State of Iowa into two judicial districts, and appoints Messrs. ROBINSON of Massachusetts, THOMPSON of Iowa, and CONVERSE.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted, as follows:

To Mr. HUBBS, indefinitely, on account of important business.

To Mr. COLERICK, indefinitely, on account of the serious illness of his sister.

To Mr. BERRY, for three days, on account of important business.

WITHDRAWAL OF PAPERS.

By unanimous consent, leave to withdraw papers from the files of the House was granted to Mr. HUBBELL in the case of Samuel W. Abbott, there being no adverse report.

NEWBURGH CENTENNIAL CELEBRATION.

The SPEAKER. In compliance with the provisions of the joint resolution, approved July 1, 1882, "authorizing the Secretary of War to erect at Washington's headquarters, in the city of Newburgh, New York, a memorial column, and to aid in defraying the expenses of the Centennial celebration in that city in the year 1883," the Chair appoints the following-named representatives as members on the part of the House of the joint select committee of arrangements to perform the duties prescribed by that resolution. Mr. BEACH of New York, Mr. KETCHAM of New York, Mr. CURTIN of Pennsylvania, Mr. BURROWS of Michigan, Mr. KNOTT of Kentucky, Mr. TOWNSEND of Ohio, Mr. ELLIS of Louisiana, and Mr. RANNEY of Massachusetts.

The question being taken on the motion to adjourn, it was agreed to; and accordingly (at four o'clock and forty minutes p. m.) the House adjourned.

PETITIONS, ETC.

The following memorial and petitions were laid on the Clerk's desk, under the rule, and referred as follows:

By the SPEAKER: The petition of Seth Driggs, relative to certain awards made by the Venezuela commission—to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

By Mr. ARMFIELD: The petition of 142 citizens of the seventh Congressional district of North Carolina, for a confirmation of the call for a peace congress—to the same committee.

By Mr. VALENTINE: The petition of 106 citizens of Nebraska, for the confirmation of the call for a peace congress—to the same committee.

SENATE.

MONDAY, July 10, 1882.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. J. J. BULLOCK, D. D.

The Journal of the proceedings of Saturday last was read and approved.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATION.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of War, transmitting a report from Major Amos Stickney, Corps of Engineers, upon a survey of Pass Manchac and Bayou Manchac, from its mouth to the Mississippi River, made in compliance with the river and harbor act of June 14, 1880; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce, and ordered to be printed.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. MORRILL presented the petition of Charles H. Ross & Co. and other wholesale liquor dealers of the city of Baltimore, praying for legislation extending the period for whisky in bonded warehouses to five years from date of deposit in such warehouses; which was ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. MORGAN presented the petition of J. W. Smith and others, citizens of Marengo County, Alabama, praying for the passage of a bill for the construction of the proposed ship-railway across the Isthmus of Tehuantepec; which was ordered to lie on the table.

INTERNAL-REVENUE AND TARIFF DUTIES.

Mr. MORRILL. I am directed by the Committee on Finance to report amendments to the bill (H. R. No. 5538) to reduce internal-revenue taxation, and I ask that the bill be reprinted with the amendments attached.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be reprinted with the amendments.

Mr. BECK. I submit an amendment to the bill, which the committee did not vote favorably on to-day. I desire to have it printed also.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Kentucky does not desire to print his amendment with the bill?

Mr. BECK. No; I merely desire it printed as an amendment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be printed.

Mr. BECK. Do I understand the Senator from Vermont to ask for a reprint of the bill?

Mr. MORRILL. I ask that the bill be reprinted with the amendments.

Mr. BECK. But the bill, I understand, was before the Senate, and not before the committee this morning. There were only amendments before the committee.

Mr. MORRILL. I only ask to have the bill reprinted with the amendments for convenience. If the Senator prefers the other mode, I have no objection to printing the amendments separately.

Mr. BAYARD. What is the request of the Senator from Vermont?

Mr. MORRILL. That the amendments agreed upon in the committee be printed with the bill. I thought for convenience only the bill should be reprinted, with these amendments attached; but if the Senator from Kentucky prefers to have them printed separately, I have no sort of objection.

Mr. BECK. I do not care how it is done; but the bill having been reported on a previous day, I did not quite understand what was desired.

Mr. MORRILL. I merely want the bill printed in that form so as to be convenient for Senators; nothing else.

Mr. BECK. That is right. I did not understand the Senator from Vermont at first.

Mr. BAYARD. It is understood that this is not a unanimous report of the committee, by any means.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be printed with the amendments of the committee.

Mr. COCKRELL. As I understand, the Senator from Vermont in this case wants to have the original bill printed in connection with the amendments of the committee reported this morning.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That is all, for the convenience of the Senate. It is so ordered, there being no objection.

Mr. MORGAN. I offer an amendment to the same bill which I ask may be printed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment intended to be proposed by the Senator from Alabama will be printed.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. MORGAN, from the Committee on Public Lands, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 1667) granting the right of way over the public lands in Alabama and Florida to the Saint Louis, Montgomery and Florida Railroad and Immigration Company, and to grant to said company the right to purchase public lands in said States, and for other purposes, reported it with amendments.

Mr. ROLLINS. I am directed by the Committee on the District of Columbia to report back the bill (S. No. 1913) for the relief of William Bowen adversely.

Mr. ALLISON. I hope the bill will be placed on the Calendar.

Mr. ROLLINS. If the Senator from Iowa will allow me to get through with my reports he will see that there is no necessity for the request he has made.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be indefinitely postponed if there be no objection.

Mr. ALLISON. I object to the bill being indefinitely postponed for the present, until I know what the reasons are for that course.

Mr. ROLLINS. If the Senator from Iowa is not willing to take my word, all right; let the bill be placed on the Calendar. I beg leave to make another report in connection with the one just made. The Committee on the District of Columbia, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 1768) for the relief of William Bowen, have directed me to report a substitute for that bill by way of amendment. Now, if the Senator from Iowa wants the Senate bill placed on the Calendar, he may do so. I ask that the Senate bill be indefinitely postponed.

Mr. CONGER. Does the committee report a substitute or an original bill?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is a substitute.

Mr. CONGER. Then why should the Senate bill be postponed indefinitely?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Because the House bill is reported favorably.

Mr. ROLLINS. I ask that the Senate bill be postponed indefinitely.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senate bill will be postponed indefinitely, and the House bill will be placed on the Calendar.

Mr. PLUMB, from the Committee on Public Lands, to whom were referred the bill (S. No. 176) granting to the State of Missouri the public lands heretofore granted that State to aid in the construction of the Saint Louis and Iron Mountain Railroad, and repealing so much of the act of July 4, 1866, as places certain conditions and limitations upon said grant, and the bill (S. No. 2131) to repeal all laws and parts of laws granting public lands to the State of Missouri to aid in the construction and extension of the Iron Mountain Railroad, or the Saint Louis and Iron Mountain Railroad, from Pilot Knob, in the State of Missouri, to the southern boundary line of said State, and to declare such lands forfeited to the United States, and to relieve said Saint Louis and Iron Mountain Railroad from any duty or obligation imposed by any acts making said grants of transporting the property, troops, or mails of the Government of the United States free of toll or other charges, or at rates below those charged for commercial traffic, asked to be discharged from their further consideration, and moved their indefinite postponement; which was agreed to. And he reported as a substitute for them a bill (S. No. 2135) to repeal section 1 of the act entitled "An act making a grant of lands in alternate sections to aid in the construction and extension of the Iron Mountain Railroad from Pilot Knob, in the State of Missouri, to Helena, in Arkansas," approved July 4, 1866, and for other purposes; which was read twice by its title.

Mr. GARLAND, from the Committee on the Judiciary, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 676) to refer the claim of the captors of the ram Albemarle to the Court of Claims, reported it without amendment; and submitted a report thereon, which was ordered to be printed.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 638) to refer the claims of the captors of the ram Albemarle to the Court of Claims, asked to be discharged from its further consideration, and that the bill be postponed indefinitely; which was agreed to.

Mr. JONES, of Nevada, from the Committee on Commerce, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 1179) to create a district for the inspection of the hulls and boilers of steam-vessels, reported it without amendment.

Mr. ROLLINS, from the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 4173) for the erection of a public building at Brooklyn, New York, reported it without amendment.

PUBLIC BUILDING AT OXFORD.

Mr. VEST. I am directed by the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 4179) for the erection of a public building at Oxford, Mississippi, to report it favorably without amendment.

Mr. LAMAR. For a very imperative personal reason I ask the Senate to allow that bill to be taken up for consideration and put upon its passage.

By unanimous consent, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

Mr. CONGER. What place is that?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Oxford, Mississippi.

Mr. INGALLS. Are there United States courts held at that point?

Mr. LAMAR. Yes; there have been for half a century.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

PUBLIC BUILDING AT BROOKLYN.

Mr. LAPHAM. For like reasons, which are very controlling, I ask that the prior report for a public building at Brooklyn be considered at this time.

By unanimous consent, the bill (H. R. No. 4173) for the erection of a public building at Brooklyn, New York, was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. PLUMB (by request) asked and, by unanimous consent, obtained leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 2136) for the relief of the Mississippi Central Railroad Company; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. BUTLER asked and, by unanimous consent, obtained leave to introduce a joint resolution (S. R. No. 93) authorizing the Secretary of War to lease Fort Washington; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. MILLER, of New York, asked and, by unanimous consent, obtained leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 2137) donating four condemned cannon and four cannon-balls for the soldiers' burial lot in the Hudson, New York, cemetery; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

WITHDRAWAL OF PAPERS.

On motion of Mr. LAPHAM, it was Ordered, That leave be granted to withdraw the petition filed with the bill (S. No. 2076) for the settlement of the claims between the Eastern band of Cherokee Indians and the Western Cherokee Nation by reference to the Court of Claims.

THOMAS M'MANNUS.

Mr. CAMERON, of Pennsylvania. I ask that the bill (H. R. No. 4966) for the relief of Thomas McMannus, reported adversely on Saturday last, be placed on the Calendar.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The vote by which the bill was indefinitely postponed will be reconsidered, if there be no objection. The Chair hears no objection. The bill will be placed on the Calendar.

DISTRICT CEMETERIES.

Mr. PENDLETON. I submit the following resolution:

Whereas by an act of Congress, approved on the 11th day of August, 1856, entitled "An act for the relief of the Columbian Harmony Society of the city of Washington," certain persons under the name of the Columbian Harmony Society were authorized to sell a certain square of ground in the city of Washington known as No. 475, and to reinvest the proceeds in other grounds for burial purposes outside of the corporate limits of the city of Washington, said investment to be made subject to the approval of the Secretary of the Interior; and

Whereas it has been alleged that the said association has not complied with the provisions of the act aforesaid, and in many respects violated the trust therein imposed; Therefore,

Be it resolved, That the Committee on the District of Columbia be, and they are hereby, directed to investigate as to the management of said Columbian Harmony Society, and whether they have complied with the provisions of the above cited act, or any other act of Congress relating to the government of cemeteries in this District, and to report back to the Senate such bill as, in the judgment of said committee, is necessary for the proper protection of the rights of the lot owners in said cemetery.

Mr. INGALLS. Before the Senate adopts the resolution in terms, which is an explicit direction to perform certain duties, I prefer that the resolution be referred to the committee for examination.

Mr. PENDLETON. The suggestion of the Senator from Kansas is entirely agreeable to me, as I suppose from his statement the committee will make an investigation as to the necessity of further investigation. I therefore ask for the reference of the resolution to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It will be so referred.

ARIZONA SOUTHERN RAILROAD COMPANY.

Mr. DAWES. If there is no further morning business at this moment, I ask the consent of the Senate to take up a bill which I am confident will cause no debate. If it does I will withdraw it. It is the bill (S. No. 1959) granting the right of way to the Arizona Southern Railroad Company through the Papago Indian reservation, in Arizona. I think there will be no objection to the bill.

Mr. McMILLAN. If it will not lead to debate I consent to its consideration.

Mr. DAWES. If it leads to debate I will withdraw it.

By unanimous consent, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

The bill was reported from the Committee on Indian Affairs with an amendment in section 1, line 13, after the word "and," to strike out "due compensation made to them, under the direction and with the approval of the secretary of the Interior" and insert "such compensation as may be fixed by the Secretary of the Interior be paid to him by the said railroad company, to be expended by him for the benefit of the said Indians;" so as to make the proviso read:

Provided, That the consent of the Indians occupying said reservation be first obtained, and such compensation as may be fixed by the Secretary of the Interior be paid to him by the said railroad company, to be expended by him for the benefit of the said Indians.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. MCPHERSON, its Clerk, announced that the House had passed the joint resolution (S. R. No. 91) authorizing the payment temporarily of certain employés of the War Department.

The message also announced that the House had concurred in the amendment of the Senate to the joint resolution (H. R. No. 69) authorizing the Public Printer to pay the employés of the Government Printing Office the pay deducted from them during the obsequies of the late President Garfield, and for other purposes.

The message further announced that the House had agreed to the report of the committee of conference on the bill (H. R. No. 4167) to enable national banking associations to extend their corporate existence, and for other purposes; and that the House, by unanimous consent, had further agreed to strike out, in line 25, page 7, of the said bill, the word "hereinafter" where it occurs before the word "provided," and insert the words "by law" after the word "provided;" and that the bill be enrolled accordingly, and requesting the concurrence of the Senate therein.

The message also announced that the House insisted on its disagreement to the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. No. 4166) to divide the State of Iowa into two judicial districts, agreed to the conference asked by the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. GEORGE D. ROBINSON of Massachusetts, Mr. WILLIAM G. THOMPSON of Iowa, and Mr. G. L. CONVERSE, of Ohio, managers at the conference on the part of the House.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

The message further announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the following enrolled bills and joint resolution; and they were thereupon signed by the President pro tempore:

A bill (S. No. 1549) for the relief of William J. Pollock;

A bill (S. No. 1960) authorizing the New Orleans and Northeastern Railroad to construct bridges over the channels of Pearl River and Lake Pontchartrain; and

A joint resolution (H. R. No. 69) authorizing the Public Printer to pay the employés of the Government Printing Office the pay deducted from them during the obsequies of the late President Garfield, and for other purposes.

RIVER AND HARBOR BILL.

Mr. McMILLAN. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the river and harbor bill.

The motion was agreed to, and the Senate resumed, as in Committee of the Whole, the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 6242) making appropriations for the construction, repair, and preservation of certain works on rivers and harbors, and for other purposes.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The pending question is on the amendment of the Senator from North Carolina, [Mr. RANSOM,] which will be read.

The ACTING SECRETARY. At the end of line 457 it is proposed to insert:

Improving the Potomac River in the vicinity of Washington with reference to the improvement of the navigation, the establishment of harbor lines, and the raising of the flats, under the direction of the Secretary of War and in accordance with the plan and report made in compliance with the river and harbor act approved March 3, 1881, and the reports of the board of engineers made in compliance with the resolution of the Senate of December 13, 1881, $500,000.

Mr. RANSOM. Mr. President——

Mr. McMILLAN. Before the Senator from North Carolina proceeds, I desire to say that I do not intend to ask the Senate to limit debate on this amendment, but I hope the Senate will concur with me in endeavoring to dispose finally of the bill during the day.

Mr. RANSOM. I am very glad that the chairman of the Committee on Commerce has made that suggestion; and while no limitation of five minutes is to be placed upon the debate on this amendment, I shall endeavor to bring what I have to say on the subject within that limitation.

It will be remembered that over a year since a resolution was adopted by the Senate directing the Committee on Commerce to consider this question of the Potomac flats, and subsequently, in December last, a special committee was appointed by the Senate for that purpose. Immediately after the submission of the question to the Committee on Commerce last year, the committee waited upon the President of the United States, the Secretary of War, and the Chief of Engineers and requested that a board of the best engineers in the Army should be selected to observe the river front and make a report upon it. In consequence of the excessive heat and sickness of the last summer that board could not perform its duty until near the winter.

In the mean time thorough observations, as comprehensive, as accurate, and as detailed as they could be, were made by the engineer in charge of the work, Colonel Abert. After his observations had been returned and his report made to the Chief of Engineers, a board consisting of General Gillmore, Colonel Craighill, and Colonel Comstock was summoned by the Secretary of War to consider this subject. I have their report now in my hand, made, as they truly assert, after the fullest consideration of the subject. With the permission of the Senate I will ask the Secretary to read a summary of their report for the information of the Senate. It is brief, it is clear, it is distinct, and I hope that Senators will give it their attention. The reading will occupy but a minute.

The Acting Secretary read as follows:

The board is of the opinion that an improvement which shall combine substantially and in its essential features the harbor and shore lines of my plan from Easby's Point to the arsenal, and the low-grade filling and surrounding embankment of that plan below the Long Bridge, with a cheaper revetment than I propose, with Major Twining's high-grade filling and sluicing ponds between the Long Bridge and Easby's Point, offers a better solution of the various questions connected with the improvement of navigation, the establishment of the harbor lines, and the reclamation of the flats than any of the other projects or combination of projects that have been considered. It is regarded as necessary to the proper execution of this plan as thus defined that the channel depths in both Washington and Georgetown Harbors should be sufficient to accommodate the largest draught that can be brought up to Arsenal Point, with such additional depth at the wharves that vessels can receive their full cargoes without grounding at low water; that the filling over the flats above the Long Bridge, as well as the crest of the surrounding embankment below, should be carried up to a height of 3 feet above the flood-slope of 1877; that the flushing ponds should not be less than 8 feet deep, and be provided with inlet and outlet gates of ample dimensions, automatically arranged, for filling the ponds from the Georgetown channel to the level of high water and emptying them into the Washington channel to the level of low water during each oscillation of the tide; that an ample system of drainage for the reclaimed areas be provided; that all sewage now discharging into the Washigton channel should be intercepted and conveyed away to the James Creek sewer canal east of the arsenal; and that the Long Bridge shall be rebuilt at an early period during the progress of the improvements, with wide spans upon piers offering the least possible obstruction to the flow of water.

Mr. RANSOM. Upon the submission of that report to the committee a large number of gentlemen, supposed to be skilled in questions of this character, skilled in engineering, and skilled in sanitary science, were summoned before the committee, and the question of the improvement of the Potomac River front was submitted to them. I have here (it has been before the committee for some time) the report of their testimony.

In the first place, the board of engineers, with Colonel Abert especially in charge of the work, and Major Twining, now unfortunately dead, but who was perhaps better acquainted with the work and all of its surroundings than any other man, all agree that the work is practicable beyond question. The question was submitted by the committee to each one of the engineers, and the testimony was uniform and unanimous that the work could be done in the manner prescribed by the board for the sum of $2,500,000. Upon this question the engineers have not a shadow of doubt, nor had the committee.

The next question which the committee considered was the question of health, and there were examined before the committee Dr. Chancellor, of Baltimore, a gentleman eminent in his profession as a physician of great sanitary skill in the improvement of the health of cities; Major Towle, of New York, the chief of the board of sewerage of that great city; Mr. Waring, of Newport, the eminent sanitary engineer; Dr. Cabell, the president of the National Board of Health of the United States; Dr. Garnett, of this city, a gentleman of forty years' practice here; Dr. Wales, Surgeon-General of the Navy, (and without making any discrimination I feel it my duty to say here that I have never heard and never read anywhere so clear a statement in reference to any subject, so complete a demonstration as his testimony made of this case;) Dr. Townshend, the District health officer; Dr. Bulkley, a physician of forty years' practice in the city; Dr. Lincoln, of as long experience; Dr. Verdi, Dr. Busey, and Dr. Turner, of the National Board of Health. All these gentlemen were examined, and of all these experts the unanimous opinion was that the improvement of the Potomac flats would add greatly to the health of the city. The testimony of all the experts except three concurred in the statement that the Potomac River flats form now the chief and principal cause of malarial sickness in the city of Washington.

Mr. President, with the unanimous report of the board of engineers, with the unanimous testimony of the experts summoned before the committee to testify in relation to this matter, the committee with confidence submits the question to the Senate.

What will be accomplished if this amendment is carried out? In the first place, the engineers say—and about that we cannot hesitate—that this improvement will secure to Washington and Georgetown a commodious, a convenient, a safe harbor for vessels of the largest draught. In the second place, they declare that it will save the city for all time to come from every possibility of overflow. I need not call the attention of Senators to what we witnessed here a little over a year ago—Washington City, the capital of the country, deluged by a flood of the Potomac. The engineers declare that this improvement if carried out will effectually save the city from all danger of overflow. In the third place, they declare and actually demonstrate, if such a thing is capable of demonstration, that this improvement will deliver the city of Washington from the curse of malarial malady.

Those are the three great objects to be accomplished by this improvement. I should insult the Senate, I should derogate from myself, if upon this statement of the engineers and this statement of the physicians I were to occupy the time of the Senate at this late hour of the session with a further statement of the question. It seems to me to be too clear for dispute. At the proper time in the debate I have no doubt attention will be called to the title of the United States to the land proposed to be reclaimed, when I propose to say something in reference to that question.

Mr. VEST. Mr. President, I feel that I have a duty which is unpleasant but nevertheless proper for me to discharge in opposing this amendment to the river and harbor bill. As a member of the Committee on Commerce and a member of the special committee on the Potomac flats, I have advocated earnestly to the extent of my ability the improvement of the Potomac flats and of the city of Washington. There can be, I think, no sort of question that Washington City should be improved, as the capital of a nation of fifty millions of people, worthy of the great position which it must have before the world. But, Mr. President, there are certain rules of the Senate, there are certain rules of parliamentary and legislative propriety, which, however much I may desire the improvement of these flats, and however much I may favor large appropriations for that purpose, forbid me, under my sense of obligation as a Senator here representing part of a State, from violating what I believe to be the fundamental rules of this Senate in its proceedings, and from violating the very nature of the bill which is now before us for consideration.

For fourteen months a special committee has had under consideration this subject, and I undertake to say now and here, in the presence of the chairman of that committee and of my colleagues upon it, that the whole scope of our investigation—and I use the words deliberately—the whole scope has been with reference to the sanitary effects of this improvement upon the city of Washington, and not as to its commerce. Not one particle of evidence was taken by us in regard to the commercial advantages to be derived from this improvement.

The chairman of the committee has enumerated a long list of eminent surgeons and specialists whose testimony was taken in regard to this improvement, and yet not one ordinary engineer was called before the committee in regard to the effect of this appropriation upon the commerce of the city of Washington. The chairman of the committee says that the engineers agreed that two and a half million dollars would be the limit of the expenditure. The testimony shows that the plan submitted by the two engineers, Colonel Abert and Major Twining, the latter now deceased, would require an appropriation of from two and a half millions as the lowest estimate up to five millions as the highest.

Now, I put it to the chairman of the committee and to the Senate, would there be any pretense here, any justification in this testimony, in what we all know in regard to the commerce of this city, for an appropriation of two and a half millions or five millions for the improvement of the harbor of Washington or its river front for commercial purposes? Why, sir, the whole commerce of the city for years would amount to no such sum in the aggregate. What Senator would rise up and undertake to justify the improvement of this river front to the extent of two and a half or five million dollars upon the ground of commercial advantage, upon the ground of the extent of the commerce of this city? I assert here, and the evidence shows it, that the whole scope of our investigation, the whole meaning of it, the whole intent of it was with reference to the sanitary effect of this improvement, and nothing else. Therefore, Mr. President, this appropriation has no place in a river and harbor bill.

This amendment does not specify the plan upon which this money is to be expended. For what was the special committee organized? It was organized to take into consideration all the circumstances and to report them to the Senate on this much vexed and agitated question, and report the plan and scheme upon which the money of the people was to be expended in the improvement of the national capital. I ask the chairman of the committee now, under this amendment whose plan is to be adopted?

Mr. RANSOM. If the Senator had attended to the statement that I asked to have read by the Secretary of the Senate he must know whose plan is recommended. The amendment itself declares that it is the plan recommended by the board of engineers. Here it is on the second page of the document I hold in my hand.

If I do not interrupt my friend I will state further that he will scarcely find a page of the engineers' report, or of all of this testimony, in which there is not a special reference to the navigation of the river. The Senator will find several questions put, I think, by himself in reference to that very matter.

Mr. VEST. If he has that document, will the Senator point me to the testimony of one witness on the question of the improvement of the river front for the purposes of commerce? Will the chairman of the committee undertake to say that the whole scope and end of our investigation was not in regard to the sanitary condition of the city by reason of this improvement?

Mr. RANSOM. I do not wish to interrupt the Senator from Missouri, but as he has asked a question I will answer. The Senator from Missouri has certainly contemplated all the time for the last year that this investigation looked both to the navigation of the river and the improvement of the health of the city; first of all the navigation of the river, and secondarily—not secondarily in importance, but secondarily in consideration—the improvement of the health of the capital.

Mr. VEST. As a matter of course, in an investigation like this, which resulted in testimony amounting to one hundred and twenty-one pages of printed matter, there would be mentioned incidentally an improvement of the channel of the river; but I say now, and I challenge contradiction in regard to it from any source, that the whole scope of this testimony—for I was one of the Senators who took the testimony and helped to examine the witnesses—was with reference to its sanitary condition and the sanitary effects of the improvement.

Mr. RANSOM. Will my friend from Missouri permit me to put him right in the beginning, for I do not wish him to diverge too far. In Senate Executive Document No. 126, Forty-seventh Congress, first session, page 2, under the heading "Harbor of Washington," is the report of Engineer Abert as preliminary to the report of the engineers. In the third paragaph he says:

I have the honor to submit herewith a brief summary of the results obtained by this survey between the Aqueduct Bridge and Giesborough Point, together with a plan and estimate for the improvement of the navigation and the raising of the flats and for establishing the harbor lines of Washington City.

Mr. VEST. Of course.

Mr. RANSOM. There, upon the forehead, right at the door of this investigation, stands the navigation of the river and the fixing of the harbor lines.

Mr. VEST. Yes, Mr. President, and after the frontal presentation, to which the chairman has alluded, there follow one hundred and twenty pages of testimony, in which for one word in regard to the improvement of the channel there are five hundred words in regard to the sanitary condition and the effects of this improvement upon the health of the city.

Mr. RANSOM. For this simple reason, that the information of the engineers upon the question of navigation and the harbor was so perfect, so absolute, so indisputable, that it was not necessary to go further, and the Senator from Missouri knows that. The Senator from Missouri at this moment has not a doubt that this will improve the harbor of Washington City.

Mr. VEST. The Senator from Missouri has no sort of doubt that if this question rested on the single and sole issue of the improvement of the harbor at Washington it would not get $50,000 under any state of the case whatever, and the Senator from North Carolina knows it. Take away the sanitary condition, take away the effect upon the health of the city, take away the impetus that the measure received from the death of General Garfield, and the charges made in the newspapers of the country that he died poisoned with malaria from the Potomac flats, and you would not hear of any improvement of this harbor. What does the commerce of this city amount to?

Mr. BLAIR. It seems to be assumed that good health is not essential to a port. If the port at this city is breeding pestilence is not an appropriation to remove the cause of that pestilence appropriate? Is it not in order and is it not as legitimate a provision in a river and harbor bill as anywhere else in the world? Suppose the yellow fever was breeded in the Potomac flats as malaria is breeded there, and that this but for the yellow fever would be a great commercial port, would it not be of some consequence for us to make an improvement of the harbor so far as to improve its sanitary condition, and would it not be proper to do so by a provision in the river and harbor bill?

Mr. VEST. I rather think not. I rather think that in improving the rivers and harbors of this country Congress does not propose to turn itself into a sanitary commission in order to make a hospital in the District. As a member of the Committee on Commerce I distinctly decline any such jurisdiction. We are here, on this bill, to improve the commerce of the country and not to act in reference to its health. There is a department of the Government whose duty it is to report statistics and make examinations on that subject, and I believe we have a special commission as to yellow fever, I will say in answer to the Senator from New Hampshire.

But I come back to the point I made that this river and harbor bill ought not to be loaded down with a bill in regard to sanitary condition and sanitary improvements. The Senator from North Carolina says that his amendment provides for the improvement according to the report of the board of engineers. We had that report made long ago, before the special committee was organized, and the very question submitted to our committee for fourteen months was whether we would take one report or the other, or one plan or the other. Colonel Abert had one plan, and Major Twining had another, and it was our duty to have reported between the two and to have put this great improvement as an isolated proposition on its own merits.

Mr. RANSOM. I know that the Senator from Missouri and I both are seeking the same end. What is the truth in reference to this matter? If the Senator from Missouri will look at the report of the board of engineers summoned to review this whole question, he will see that they have adopted substantially Colonel Abert's plan and Major Twining's plan with some additions suggested to that board by the testimony of the sanitary experts. The plan recommended to-day is substantially the plan of Twining and Abert adopted by the board of engineers.

Mr. VEST. I beg the pardon of the Senator from North Carolina. It is not the same plan, and if the Senate feels enough interest in the matter to examine these reports it will see it is not the same plan. A single quotation will suffice to show it. Here is a part of the general report made by the board of engineers:

That the modification proposed by the board is as follows.

* * * * * * *

This project I estimate to cost $1,891,483.

That is the single item to protect the city by an embankment from Eighteenth street to the Monument lot. Then again:

It is estimated that the cost of the improvement as recommended will be about $2,500,000.

It is desirable that an appropriation of not less than $1,000,000 should be made in one sum.

I asked Colonel Abert this question:

Have you ever made an estimate of how much it would cost to fill up the whole of it?

That is, all these flats. What was the answer?

A. The estimate I made at one time amounted to nearly $5,000,000. I think it advisable, however, to retain a winter harbor for the protection of the shipping from the ice.

Q. What you were speaking of?

A. The winter harbor which I spoke of before. Retaining this harbor which occupies the position of the Washington channel, the cost of reclaiming the entire area, amounting to about seven hundred acres, would be about $5,000,000.

By the CHAIRMAN:

Q. To fill the whole level two feet above high-water-mark would cost about $5,000 000?

A. Five million dollars.

By Senator VEST:

Q. Your present plan of improvement would cost $2,500,000?

A. Yes, sir.

The present plan of improvement, leaving out the winter harbor of refuge and the channels of the river, to build up at least two feet above high-water mark and to put in the lakes or ponds which Major Twining advocated, without reference to the improvement of the channel, will cost two and a half million dollars. What I wanted was this: I wanted a bill which specifically adopted a plan and a report which should state to the Senate the cost of this improvement according to that plan, and then to put it before the Senate and before the country upon its own merits, not to load down a river and harbor bill now amounting to $20,000,000 by an improvement based upon sanitary elements and sanitary considerations. I will vote as much as any Senator to improve this city, and to improve the Potomac flats, and I believe that seven hundred acres of land can be obtained for a beautiful park, and that the land itself will more than pay the cost of the improvement, but I want it to stand upon its own facts, to stand upon its own testimony, but not a five-hundred-thousand-dollar appropriation tacked onto the river and harbor bill, where it does not belong with any propriety or according to the rules of the Senate.

I know that upon Saturday the Senate indicated its intention to pass this appropriation. I do not expect to defeat it, nor will that influence my course at all, whether I am the only Senator who votes against it here or not. The Senate generally, permit me to say respectfully, votes that to be in order which it wants to enact; and what it did upon Saturday is no parliamentary precedent to me. The Senate intended to pass the appropriation, and therefore they declared it to be in order, and yet it was put in here without notice, put in as the chairman of the committee said at the instance of the special committee. I speak for myself when I say that I was opposed to offering it as an amendment to the river and harbor bill, and am opposed to it now.

One other word in regard to the title to these flats and I am done. The chairman of the committee and myself went to the Land Department in order to examine into the legal condition of any title. As to my own opinion as a lawyer I have no hesitation in saying that I believe the title is good in the Government. I do not believe the claimants have a shadow of a scintilla of a title. That is my opinion as a lawyer; and yet I have been very often and egregiously mistaken in my opinion, as every other practitioner in my profession doubtless has been. I have been mistaken, and I may be mistaken now, but I do not think I am.

I want to tell the Senate one thing: that I have information from a brother Senator to the effect that there will be expensive and tedious litigation in regard to the title. I do not suppose it is to be avoided and I do not mention it here as an argument.

I am in favor of improving the flats; I am in favor of making an appropriation to improve them; but I am opposed to tacking this amendment onto a river and harbor bill, where it does not belong. It should be put here in a separate bill, upon a report commensurate with the importance of this great question, so that the Senate could go to the country and justify its action and say to them: "Here are the data and the statistics upon which we make this appropriation and upon which we take out of the Treasury this money." This amendment comes here and says the work is to be done according to the report of the board of engineers. Is it Abert's plan, is it Twining's plan, or is it the entire plan of that board of engineers? The chairman of the committee will not say so. We do not know what plan is to be adopted. We simply fling into the river and harbor bill a half million dollars in order—to use the language of one of the friends of the bill to me this morning—to commit Congress to this improvement and afterward to take the hap-hazard of parliamentary action and of subsequent reports whether it is to be one plan or the other. Sir, the special committee of which I am a member was organized, in my judgment, to determine that very question. It was that, and that alone, we were sent fourteen months ago to examine and report upon, and I very much regret that the report was not made and the bill put here in order that I might advocate it as earnestly, if not as eloquently, as my distinguished friend from North Carolina.

Mr. GARLAND. Mr. President, the Senate on Saturday last, with considerable emphasis, decided that the amendment offered by the Senator from North Carolina to the river and harbor bill was in order. In view of the plain reading of the twenty-eighth rule, I am sure nothing could have induced the Senate to adopt that decision except the intention unalterable to vote this appropriation, and inasmuch as that is the determination of the Senate, I wish, if I can, to put this amendment in as good condition as possible. I was of the opinion that the amendment was out of order, and I am now of that opinion; but the Senate has said that it is in order, and I acquiesce in that decision.

I favor the project, as I stated on Saturday, of doing this work, and it is immaterial to me whether it is done as a sanitary regulation, or whether it is done as a regulation affecting the navigation of the Potomac, or as a regulation affecting the commerce of the Potomac, or whether it is done as affecting the postal service on the Potomac. If it can be brought in under all these clauses the city of Washington is particularly and peculiarly fortunate, for it has protection more ample, if that be the case, than any other city of the United States, so far as the Constitution and the laws of the country are concerned.

This city is the city, in one sense of the word, of every citizen of the United States, and it is the city of a great many people that actually do not live here but have business here, and it has now become almost the home of every member of Congress in fact, on account of the prolonged sessions of Congress during which we are kept here. Therefore, this improvement is not local in its effects; it is far-reaching, going to all parts of the country, and as a sanitary regulation or a commercial regulation or a navigation regulation it meets my entire and my hearty support; and particularly if it is necessary to redeem this city from being among the "swamp and overflowed lands," I am more heartily than before in support of the proposition. It has been stated that last February a year ago a good portion of this city was overflowed, much of it the property of the Government, and as I have started out on that theory I am still on that theory. I am willing to improve, to levee, to fortify it, to do whatever else is necessary to redeem it, if any of the property of the Government is on "swamp and overflowed lands."

Now, as to the amount required I do not know; I cannot form any conjecture. It seems that two Senators of the special committee having this matter in charge differ, and differ upon some report which has not been read here which I have not had the pleasure of seeing; but the Senate will bear in mind that this is placed, as all appropriations of this character are, under the direction and control of the Secretary of War, and, as a matter of course, he will not expend any more than is absolutely necessary. While I agree with the Senator from Missouri that I would much prefer to have had a plan brought in in a separate bill from the special committee or some other committee that had taken care of this subject, yet as, for good reasons stated by the Senator from North Carolina, that has not been done, and the Senate has voted that this amendment is in order, I feel that I am acting under a sense of duty in supporting the amendment; but I wish to call the attention of the Senator from North Carolina to one thing connected with it.

Under section 355 of the Revised Statutes it is made the duty of the Attorney-General when the Government erects public buildings, makes harbor improvements, light-house improvements, and all things of that character, to look into the title of the property and see that the title is good which the United States is going to procure before money is expended under any appropriation. That section of the statutes is not broad enough to cover this case, possibly because this is a different kind of improvement from any that is specified in that section; and I think if the Senator from North Carolina will consider it, it is important to put some duty in this amendment on the Attorney-General that he may see that the United States is not made liable in this proceeding, or at least that her rights are protected. I have written out, as a general clause to come in at the close of this amendment as now proposed, the following:

> And it is hereby made the duty of the Attorney-General to examine all claims of title to the premises to be improved under this appropriation and to see that the rights of the Government in all respects are secured and protected.

I do not know that that carries out fully the idea at last, for I have written it hurriedly here at my desk; but as the Senator from North Carolina has examined this matter and has been looking into it for months, I propose this to him more by way of suggestion, that a proper amendment may be framed, so that the Government will not place itself in jeopardy when it undertakes to make this improvement which is so much needed, in my opinion, by this District. With this suggestion to the Senator from North Carolina who has the amendment in charge, I repeat I approve the amendment, it having been voted in order by the Senate on Saturday.

Mr. CONGER. I desire to say but a few words.

Mr. RANSOM. Will the Senator from Michigan allow me to say one word before he goes on? In reply to what was said by my friend from Missouri in reference to the cost, let me state that in the very report of the board of engineers which is referred to and adopted by this amendment this statement occurs:

> It is estimated that the cost of the improvement as recommended will be about $2,500,000.

Mr. CONGER. Mr. President, some criticism has been made by my colleague on the committee for the improvement of the Potomac River and the flats, the Senator from Missouri, upon the fact that only a small portion of the printed testimony is taken up with the testimony of engineers in regard to the river improvement itself. I confess to some little surprise at that criticism on the report. This Government has been for quite a number of years appropriating annually from thirty to sixty thousand dollars, and I think a higher sum some years, for dredging out the Georgetown channel and the Washington channel for the sole benefit of navigation. The special committee found in going upon a boat around all these waters to examine them that the material dredged out of the Georgetown channel had been sent and was then being sent many miles down the river, where it could be deposited without increasing the danger of filling the channel of the Potomac below. We found, also, very much to my surprise, that just at the Long Bridge the material dredged from the Washington channel had been dumped in a side-cut made for that purpose, and was raised again by a dredge from that point and loaded into cars on what is called the Long Bridge Island, or whatever the name of it is, and on those cars carried off, filling up along the Long Bridge.

There have been from year to year for the past twelve years reports of engineers as to the best method of improving the Georgetown and the Washington channels for navigation. Appropriations have been made continually, the work has been going on continually, the dredges are from day to day and from month to month, as long as the appropriation lasts, engaged in taking up the sediment deposited in the Georgetown and Washington channels and removing it somewhere; first, down below Alexandria, and then, when that was found to interfere with the channel, it was carried by a tedious process far down the river to find a place in some side bayou or channel and there dumped. To meet that want Congress requested and the Secretary of War ordered a board of engineers to take into consideration the improvement of these two channels, to find out why, with a vast area of partly exposed flats, covered at high tide and uncovered at low tides, it was that it should be necessary to go to all this expense of removing ten, fifteen, and twenty miles, the accumulated and accumulating sediment taken from these channels when there was ground right in front of the city which required its deposit upon it to raise it above high-tide mark, and thus benefit the health of this city. It is a fact reported by the engineers and testified to by the twelve or fifteen experts that the mode of improving the Georgetown and Washington channels, carried on at an expense of more than half a million of dollars up to this time, has promoted the unhealthiness of the city, and carried away far down the river a part of this sediment which might have been thrown up here and made an island or made dry land that would have become healthy.

The first few pages of the report of the testimony before the committee is taken up with the examination of Colonel Abert, one of the board who made this long and elaborate report under the direction of Congress and the Secretary of War, in explaining that report. The committee had it before them; it has been printed for the use of the House and the Senate. The whole matter with all its details is spread out. Then Major Twining, who had charge of all these improvements in the city, was called, and his examination was taken. He testified to the report of the board of engineers, he testified to the amendment and modification of that report which was made to improve the health of the city, in addition to those which were made for the improvement of these channels.

I never heard any question in regard to the fullness of the examination with reference to the engineers' reports for the improvement of these two channels of the river. They are clear, explicit, conclusive. Added to this, there was a great deal of very valuable testimony taken from medical experts and engineer experts in regard to using the appropriation which has been given heretofore and might hereafter be given for the improvement of the flats in its sanitary aspect. That is as clear and plain in the testimony taken as anything can be. The report of the engineers all through contemplates the exact thing that this amendment provides for. I have stated the substance of it. It is set out in the report of the testimony fully, and the Senator from Missouri made, as will appear from this testimony, his own inquiries in regard to that very mode of commencing this work. As any one can see from looking at the map, it is to commence by dredging or by piling a foundation from Easby's Point, just below Rock Creek, along the flats down to Giesborough Point, and along the present channel of the Potomac to Georgetown, then returning along the Washington channel to the Long Bridge. It was perfectly apparent that that project made provision for the channel lines. The engineers recommended a wall of large stone wherever there was danger from the current of its washing away, and recommended in some places a riprap bank; for other parts of it, a stone wall of one form or another, partly founded upon piles and partly sunk down by dredging into the bottom of the river, which should be the outer boundary of the Georgetown channel on the one side and the outer boundary of the improvement of the flats on the other. This appropriation is for that part of the work which provides for defining and fixing by a wall the boundaries of the channel, and that only.

I may say that I would have desired myself, after many weeks of investigation of this subject, that a bill should be introduced separately, or that a provision should be embodied in this bill authorizing the commencement of the work and carrying it on in accordance with the report of the board of engineers as explained by Colonel Abert and Major Twining. I think that the whole people of this country, with almost a united voice, who understand anything at all in regard to the sanitary condition of Washington from the exposure of this soil to a twice-a-day overflow and a twice-a-day uncovering, with all its accumulations of filth, to the sun, demand that this work should have been commenced long ago, and it should be commenced now vigorously and completed as soon as it may be.

Why, sir, it seems to me it makes but little difference in principle whether this goes into a river and harbor bill or whether it be a separate bill. The authority to do all that is contemplated by the appropriation proposed now is under the regulation of commerce. It is therefore a proper subject-matter for a river and harbor bill. The Committee on Commerce have not put into the river and harbor bill any appropriation at all for these channels and for their improvement. They left it out for the express purpose of having this great work as an auxiliary to health adopted by Congress and so carry on the two together.

Congress has exclusive power to legislate in regard to this District. Congress may put upon a river and harbor bill or upon any other bill it chooses any provision in regard to the Potomac River within the District of Columbia. It is legitimate under the power to regulate commerce, for there can be no improvement of the Potomac flats in reference to their sanitary condition that does not first require the Washington and Georgetown channels to be provided for before a dollar is expended for the reclamation of the flats.

I do not wish to dwell upon this. The board recommends that $2,500,000 be appropriated for these great improvements of the channels for navigation and the reclamation of the flats for sanitary purposes. This amendment proposes $500,000 to commence the work of improving permanently the Georgetown and Washington channels. It is not enough. Another Congress must make a larger appropriation. There will not be a dollar left for the reclamation of the flats, except in so far as the dumping what is dredged out of these channels inside the sea-wall improvement tends to fill them up, instead of carrying it by tugs and by boats miles and miles down and throwing it into the Potomac far below and thereby perhaps obstructing navigation.

I hope at least this amendment will be adopted. I may say that the amendment offered by the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. GARLAND] meets my approbation, not because I think there is any title to any of this land under water, not because I think there is any court in the world that would sustain that title for an hour, but because before such a work of improvement is entered upon, or while it is being entered upon, and you approach the land on which there is said to be some kind of claim, it is well for the Government and it is at least safe for Congress to take the necessary precaution to avoid committing the Government to any encroachment upon private rights.

Mr. JONES, of Florida. Will the Senator permit me to ask a question before he takes his seat?

Mr. CONGER. Yes, sir.

Mr. JONES, of Florida. What, may I ask, is the character of this title to which allusion has been made?

Mr. CONGER. I understand the character of the title to be that many years ago some person, assuming that the low grounds in the Potomac in the District of Columbia were to be governed by the same rules and laws as are provided for accretions in rivers or islands formed in the bed of rivers in the West, where the Government has the control of the rivers, asked to have a survey made of these flats and claimed that a boat could go around these flats, which are uncovered at low tide, and covered a foot or two deep at high tide, as I understand.

Without stopping perhaps to reflect upon the subject, the Commissioner of the General Land Office ordered a survey upon the request. These lands, I said, were within the District of Columbia, where the Government owned the whole and had exclusive legislation over them. They never were intended, of course, in the judgment of anybody I have ever heard speak on it, to be treated as wild lands, and accumulations in rivers over the Territories of the United States in the West, where the soil, rivers and all, belong to the United States. But so much was done. A survey was had, and on that survey the party securing it asked for a patent. Then the Land Office commenced to inquire into the matter—it had gone through to that extent carelessly—and the Land Office refused a patent and declared that there was no law authorizing such a survey on the Potomac River and within the District of Columbia; that there was no law referring to such lands; that the law relied on applied to entirely different lands, where the relations of the Government to the soil were entirely different; and so it has stood from that time to this. Those who asked for this survey, and who claim some kind of title by virtue of the fact that the Land Office had yielded so far as to grant the survey, claim that they have a title which ought to be enforced by a patent. The Land Office never has given any patent. The Land Office has always refused since that first survey to treat this as land which was subject to any kind of entry whatever; by survey, by accretion, or anything else.

Mr. JONES, of Florida. Am I to understand then that there is no patent outstanding for this land?

Mr. CONGER. There is no patent outstanding for this land. It is just in that inchoate condition that somebody attempted or thought he could acquire a title to it.

Mr. RANSOM. Will the Senator from Michigan allow me to interrupt him for a second? There was a patent granted.

Mr. CONGER. I may be mistaken in that.

Mr. RANSOM. But a decision of the Commissioner of the General Land Office was afterward made saying that it should not have been granted, and refusing to grant any other patent.

Mr. CONGER. I may be mistaken in regard to that. If there was a patent granted, it has been declared by the office of no validity. Perhaps that is the statement I ought to have made. At any rate, it was stopped before any title passed or any pretended title passed; it has been annulled in the office. That is what I meant to say, and that, I think, is the condition of the case.

These flats are in that part of the Potomac River which lies off the ground upon which the Washington Monument is situated, up toward Georgetown, covered in the summer with reeds and grass, presenting a green appearance, over which the water does not rise entirely, and in the winter, when it is cleared off, covered with logs and slime and dead animals mostly. It is that part of this river over which the sewerage from Rock Creek and from the B street canal floats and covers, settles among the reeds and among the grass, and as the tide goes down and the sun beats upon it exposes that whole surface to the worst kind of malarial generation.

I make these remarks because even if we go no further than the improvement of the Washington and Georgetown channels, and this appropriation is strictly for their improvement, much benefit will result. If we follow the plans of the engineers and bind those channels by a sea-wall and deepen the channels by dredging, there is a proposition behind the sea-walls to throw the mud dredged out and thus aid in filling the flats. We have expended more than this half million solely on these two channels within the last thirty years. I would prefer, if it might be, that we should have in this bill a larger appropriation, at least a million dollars, to commence this work.

Sir, in my opinion, the safety, the health of the Government officials, of Senators, of Representatives, of all the employés of the Government, of every citizen of this city, depends—and the testimony which we have taken corroborates the statement—upon removing as quickly as may be this source of malaria and of miasma. No man can go into that region, with a mild, southerly wind blowing, and stay there half an hour, from the stench and miasma that arises from these flats. Go near Easby's Point, along the river as far as the Observatory and down to the Washington Monument, and what do you see? Houses built there once, deserted now; a vast region as desolate, as uninhabited, as uninhabitable as any region on God's footstool; property worth nothing, life worth nothing, health worth nothing there; the place gradually deserted. The people that once owned that land have left it; the houses are tenantless. That is the situation of it; and what affects that part of the city lying nearest to the flats affects also, as it floats over this city with the prevailing southerly winds of summer and fall, the health of the whole city. This is due not alone to the flats, but, as these experts and medical men say, the lack of drainage and the lack of proper sewerage in the low grounds adjoining the flats add to the difficulty.

Sir, the attention of the public was called to this matter during the last summer, when the President of this people lay in the White House for days and for weeks subject to the malarial influences of that region. Since the people of the United States knew of the heroic struggle of that martyred man for his life, when he was contending not only with the bullet of the assassin but with the noxious vapors pressing upon him and upon other people of the city, they have been satisfied that it was necessary, even at the risk of extinguishing the taper of life, to remove the President to a healthier situation. There was one universal throb of joy in every heart when it was known that the President had been removed from the miasmatic and malarial region of the White House to the pure sea air of Long Branch, and there was a universal demand on Congress to take steps at once to remove from this capital that disgraceful malarial, miasma-breeding region, the Potomac flats.

I would prefer to vote, as I have suggested, for the appropriation in gross of $2,500,000 to improve the Georgetown and Washington channels of the Potomac in connection with the improvement of the flats, and use that ever accumulating sediment which comes down from above in throwing up above the water-line and covering these miasmatic regions; but that perhaps may not be now.

Let us adopt the amendment offered by the Senator from Arkansas as a guard for the United States, and let us know what we are to meet, and let us make this appropriation and show to a waiting people that we at last heed their voice in making the capital of this nation at least a decently healthy place for citizens and for officials to reside in.

NATIONAL BANKING ASSOCIATIONS.

Mr. ALLISON. I ask unanimous consent to lay this bill aside for a moment in order that I may present a report of the committee of conference on the bank bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. FRYE in the chair.) Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Iowa? The Chair hears none.

The Acting Secretary read the following report:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. No. 4167) to enable national banking associations to extend their corporate existence, having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend, and do recommend, to their respective Houses, as follows:

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendments of the Senate numbered 10, 15, 16, 17, 18, 22, and 23, and agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 7, and agree to the same, with an amendment, as follows: Page 6, strike out all after "provided," in line 24, down to and including "by," in line 25, and insert after "provided," in line 24, "herein," and insert after "notes," in line 25, "shall be issued as provided by this act;" and the Senate agreed to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 14, and agree to the same, with an amendment as follows: Page 7, strike out section 8 and insert:

"SEC. 8. That national banks now organized, or hereafter organized, having a capital of $150,000 or less, shall not be required to keep on deposit or deposit with the Treasurer of the United States United States bonds in excess of one-fourth of their capital stock as security for their circulating notes; but such banks shall keep on deposit or deposit with the Treasurer of the United States the amount of bonds as herein required. And such of those banks having on deposit bonds in excess of that amount are authorized to reduce their circulation by the deposit of lawful money as provided by law: Provided, That the amount of such circulating notes shall not in any case exceed 90 per cent. of the par value of the bonds deposited as herein provided: Provided further, That all national banks which shall hereafter make deposits of lawful money for the retirement in full of their circulation shall, at the time of their deposit, be assessed, for the cost of transporting and redeeming their notes then outstanding, a sum equal to the average cost of the redemption of national-bank notes during the preceding year, and shall thereupon pay such assessment; and all national banks which have heretofore made or shall hereafter make deposits of lawful money for the reduction of their circulation shall be assessed and shall pay an assessment in the manner specified in section 3 of the act approved June 20, 1874, for the cost of transporting and redeeming their notes redeemed from such deposits subsequently to June 30, 1881."

And the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 19, and agree to the same with an amendment, as follows: Page 9, strike out all after "purpose," in line 13, down to and including line 19, and insert: "And provided further, That the provisions of this section shall not apply to bonds called for redemption by the Secretary of the Treasury, nor to the withdrawal of circulating notes in consequence thereof;" and the Senate agree to the same.

W. B. ALLISON,
JUSTIN S. MORRILL,
JAMES B. BECK,
Managers on the part of the Senate.

WM. W. CRAPO,
NELSON DINGLEY, JR.,
A. H. BUCKNER,
Managers on the part of the House.

Mr. VEST. I ask that the report lie over and be printed that we may look at it.

Mr. COKE. I hope it will lie over and be printed.

Mr. ALLISON. Of course, if Senators desire that, I have no objection; but I should like to explain in a few minutes what the committee have done.

Mr. VEST. It is a matter of very great importance; and I should like to have the report printed.

Mr. BECK. I think the chairman of the committee of conference had better explain the report; and then if anybody asks that it lie over, it may very well do so. I think the House substantially agreed to all the Senate did; but at the same time an explanation should be made.

Mr. ALLISON. I will state briefly that the first change of any moment is found on page 7 of the bill, where the Senate inserted a provision requiring banks having a capital of $100,000, or less, to have at least one-third of their capital stock in bonds of the United States as security. That is struck out, and national banks of $150,000 capital, or less, are required by the conference report to have one-fourth of their capital in United States bonds. That is the first provision of any moment.

Mr. BECK. The House provision in that regard required banks of $150,000 capital to have only $10,000 in bonds.

Mr. ALLISON. Yes, sir. The next provision was in relation to banks withdrawing their circulation because of bonds called in by the Secretary of the Treasury. The Senate struck out the House provision in that regard wholly. The House insisted that where there was a compulsory withdrawal of bonds by the Treasury Department for the purpose of payment, the three million limitation found in section 9 of the bill should not be insisted upon, and therefore the original House proviso is retained in the bill with the exception of the last clause, which requires the bonds to be taken out within thirty days.

The principal difficulty the conferees had was with sections 12 and 13, section 12 being the section relating to gold certificates, and particularly the clause inserted with reference to the clearing-houses, and the thirteenth section being the section proposed by the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BECK] in reference to the overcertification of checks. The House has receded from its objections in regard to these two sections, and they are agreed to exactly as passed by the Senate. So in substance the provisions of the bill as passed by the Senate are retained, with the single exception that I have stated.

Mr. BECK. I desire to say that there seemed to be some difficulty or misunderstanding relative to the $100,000,000 limitation on the Treasury reserve as to the redemption of greenbacks. While I do not understand that there ought to be any difficulty, and do not see the trouble suggested as to the provision made by the Senate which has been stated elsewhere, I am willing to allow until to-morrow to have the point thoroughly examined and considered.

Mr. ALLISON. We did not change that. The Senate provision in reference to the reserve and the other provisions of section 12 are retained in the bill precisely as it passed the Senate. However, if any Senator desires to have the whole question go over and the report printed, I will make no objection.

Mr. VEST. I think I understand it, but I would rather see it in print.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It is requested that the conference report lie over and be printed. To that request the Chair hears no objection. Accordingly it will lie over and be printed.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. MCPHERSON, its Clerk, announced that the House had concurred in the amendments of the Senate to the following bills:

A bill (H. R. No. 5535) fixing the rate of interest upon arrearages of taxes due July 1, 1879, and on all special assessments due the District of Columbia, and which may be paid by November 1, 1882, and for other purposes; and

A bill (H. R. No. 6676) to more effectually punish house-breaking in the District of Columbia, and for other purposes.

The message also announced that the House had agreed to the report of the committee of conference on the bill (S. No. 1723) to increase the water supply of the city of Washington, and for other purposes.

The message further announced that the House had passed the following bills; in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate:

A bill (H. R. No. 2402) to quiet title to certain land in Washington, District of Columbia; and

A bill (H. R. No. 6702) to authorize the transfer of the property of the National Soldiers' and Sailors' Orphan Home to the Garfield Memorial Hospital.

RIVER AND HARBOR BILL.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 6242) making appropriations for the construction, repair, and preservation of certain works on rivers and harbors, and for other purposes.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I am a little astonished at my friend from Missouri, [Mr. VEST,] who is generally so liberal and broad-gauged on questions of this sort, sticking in the bark and indulging in technicalities, when he usually looks at the merits of great questions. I cannot understand why a proposition that relates to so great a river as the Potomac and to a port like the port of Washington is not one cognate and proper in the river and harbor bill. Why, sir, have we not here a harbor; have we not here a great river? We once had one of the most magnificent harbors at Washington City upon the whole Atlantic coast. Seventy years ago the water was deep enough for a whole navy of British men-of-war to float in sight of the Capitol of the country.

Forty years ago there were forty feet of water at the navy-yard, and there were twenty-four feet at Georgetown and at the bridge, and now we have not more than four or five feet of water there, and not more than fourteen feet of water at the navy-yard. Forty years ago the largest ships that ever carried the flag of our country across the sea could ride in safety there, and not more than two months since a gentleman's yacht went aground in the harbor. In the olden time Georgetown was a great commercial city; Alexandria was ahead of Baltimore as an importing and exporting city. Congress has neglected its navigation. It has allowed the river to fill up by the wash of the country above and by the sewage of this city, until now a fishing smack can scarcely go up this stream to Georgetown.

It has been the neglect of the Government that has destroyed the commerce of Georgetown and of Alexandria. It has been the neglect of the Government that has destroyed the health of the city of Washington. In my judgment, since I have been in Congress not less than ten or twelve members of the House and Senate have died of the poisonous malaria inhaled from these swamps. I have been sick myself; I am sick to-day; and the poison comes from malaria brought in every day through the winds that bring us the air that flows over these deadly swamps of the river.

I think the city of Washington and the country generally owe my friend from North Carolina a debt of gratitude for pressing this measure with such persistency in the Committee on Commerce and before the Senate. I hope to see Congress take this river in hand, confine its waters into a channel, and let it scour itself out and make a harbor to a depth of water that shall again invite the largest ships that float up to this point. There is nothing to prevent this. Here is our navy-yard. We build ships here and have no water to float them out to sea. I hope to see the day when these flats will be entirely reclaimed, when the navigation will be opened up to commerce again, and when Alexandria shall be a city of importance as a commercial town, and when the health of this city shall be perfect, and when we shall have abundance of water. I am willing to vote any reasonable amount to accomplish that.

I have nothing more to say, except that I shall support the amendment of the Senator from North Carolina with great cheerfulness.

Mr. RANSOM. That there may be the most accurate and the fullest information which we can have on the subject of the patent to Kidwell, I ask that a letter from the Commissioner of the General Land Office be printed in the RECORD.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. FARLEY in the chair.) If there be no objection the letter will be printed in the RECORD. The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

The letter is as follows:

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR,
GENERAL LAND OFFICE,
Washington, D. C., April 18, 1882.

SIR: The patent to John L. Kidwell for the Kidwell Meadows, so called, containing 47.71 acres, lying south of the National Observatory, and extending from opposite Twentieth to Twenty-sixth street west, appears from the records of this office to have been issued under the provisions of the joint resolution of Congress of February 16, 1839, (5 Stats., 365.) The proceedings relative to this application and payment for and the survey and patenting of this tract were under regulations prescribed by the Secretary of the Treasury in August, 1839, for carrying said joint resolution into effect.

The joint resolution related to certain acts of the Legislature of Maryland respecting titles to vacant lands which were in force in the District of Columbia by virtue of the provisions of the act of Congress of February 27, 1801, (2 Stats., 103,) continuing in force the laws of the State of Maryland within that portion of the District ceded by said State to the United States.

The laws of Maryland prescribing the method of securing titles to vacant land, and which were operative in the District of Columbia as above recited, were, among others, the acts of November, 1781, chapter 20, and November, 1788, chapter 44. The act of 1781, "to appropriate certain lands to the use of the officers and soldiers of this State, and for the sale of vacant lands," was construed to mean that all lands within the State in Washington County westward of Fort Cumberland were appropriated to discharge the obligations of the State to officers and soldiers, and the residue after completing that engagement to the use of the public. (Kilty's Land-Holder's Assistant, page 308.) The thirteenth section of the act of 1788 removed the limitations of the former act and made all vacant land in the State, as well westward of Fort Cumberland as elsewhere not affected by outstanding warrants, subject to be taken up in the usual manner by warrant at the price of three shillings and nine pence per acre. (Ibid. 315.)

The warrants referred to were orders of survey to be issued on the order or "titling" of the Treasurer, and were restricted by the third section of the act of 1781 to vacant cultivable lands, the technical phrase being "warrants of vacant cultivation." (Ibid. 309.)

The joint resolution of Congress of 1839 authorized certain officers therein named to perform the duties which had been required of State officers under Maryland laws, and empowered the Secretary of the Treasury to make the necessary regulations to carry the Maryland acts into effect. It was provided in the joint resolution that "any land which may have been ceded to or acquired by the United States for public purposes shall not be affected by said acts."

The Treasury regulations defined the proceedings necessary in obtaining titles to land under said joint resolution. Assuming that these laws and regulations authorized and provided the means of securing individual titles to islands, flats, and marshes in the Potomac River within or adjacent to the city of Washington, several applications for orders of survey were made from time to time, which were granted, but under which no surveys were executed. These orders provided that the land to be surveyed must be firm land not subject to tidal overflow. In some instances surveys were returned, but were rejected by the Commissioner of the General Land Office on the ground that the land was submerged by tidal flow, and was therefore not subject to survey and disposal under the Maryland acts and joint resolution of Congress. The application of Mr. Kidwell for a patent for the so-called "Kidwell's land," being the bar on the upper side of the Long Bridge, was rejected for this reason.

On September 10, 1867, Mr. Kidwell applied for a warrant of survey for the tract known as "Kidwell's Meadows," and which was described in the application as an island in the Potomac River, between Washington City channel and the swash channel, commencing nearly opposite Fifteenth street west and extending to a point where D street north strikes the canal or river. The order of survey was issued September 12, 1867, and its execution was made subject to the usual provision that the land to be surveyed should be "firm land and not subject to tidal overflow." The survey was returned by the county surveyor October 19, 1867. An examination of this survey was deemed necessary, and Mr. S. J. Dallas, principal clerk of surveys in the General Land Office, was designated as examiner-general for this purpose. Mr. Dallas made the examination, and on February 28, 1868, reported to the Commissioner of the General Land Office that he found the premises to be under the ice in the Potomac River, presenting no appearance of land, but submerged and subject to tidal overflow, and "of course not fit for 'vacant cultivation,' as required by the third section of the act of 1781." He also found that the survey had been "returned in total disregard of the law and of the instructions embodied in the warrant of survey." The survey was accordingly rejected.

On October 17 and 24, 1869, a re-examination was made at the request of Mr. John Wilson, attorney for Kidwell, and upon this re-examination the examiner-general rescinded his former opinion and approved the plat of survey. In this re-examination, made under more favorable conditions than the examination in the original instance, he found the "Kidwell Meadows" to be from three and a half to four feet above low water, and from a foot to a foot and a half above ordinary high water, as near as he could judge owing to the density and vigorous growth of wild rice and other weeds which impede a clear view of all parts of the meadows. He did not think the land fit to produce successful crops of corn, but thought it susceptible of producing fodder and affording pasture for cattle.

Upon the re-examination, and the approval of the plat of survey by the examiner-general, patent was issued to Mr. Kidwell December 6, 1869. The amount paid for this tract was $23.86, or fifty cents per acre.

In reference to this patent, and to similar applications, Mr. Commissioner Drummond, in a letter to Mr. A. R. Shepherd, dated January 22, 1873, said: "All applications made since I assumed charge of the Land Office in February, 1871, have been refused for the following reasons:

"1. Because the land was subject to every-day's overflow by tide-water, and therefore not in a condition to be surveyed.

"2. Because I thought that the disposition of the land was not clearly authorized by law.

"3. Because I did not deem it proper to dispose of lands situated in the immediate vicinity of Washington, at a nominal sum, to private parties who could hold and use them so as to impede and obstruct harbor improvements, unless the law clearly and imperatively made it my duty to do so."

The foregoing statement comprises the facts of record in this office relative to the patent issued to John L. Kidwell for the "Kidwell Meadows," so called.

The brief time I have for the consideration of the subject does not permit me to express an opinion upon the legal points involved in the case.

Very respectfully,

N. C. MCFARLAND, Commissioner.

Hon. M. W. RANSOM, United States Senate.

Mr. RANSOM. I do not see the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. GARLAND] in his seat, but I desire to say that, so far as I can, I approve of and accept his amendment. It strikes me as a very good one and a very proper one. I had some conversation with him on the subject before it was presented. I hope it will be adopted.

Mr. SHERMAN. I desire to add, with the consent of the Senator from Arkansas, to his amendment; I do not see him now in his seat——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair understands that the amendment offered by the Senator from Arkansas has been accepted by the Senator from North Carolina.

Mr. SHERMAN. I have no doubt the Senator from North Carolina will accept what I propose, because it is in the same line.

Mr. RANSOM. That is an amendment which the Senator from Ohio has shown me. Let it be read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair does not understand that the amendment will be in order unless it is accepted.

Mr. SHERMAN. It will be in order now.

Mr. RANSOM. Let the amendment be read.

The ACTING SECRETARY. It is proposed to add to Mr. GARLAND's amendment:

And, if he deems it necessary, he is authorized to cause a suit or suits in equity to be instituted in the name of the United States in the supreme court of the District of Columbia against any and all claimants of title under any patent which in his opinion was by mistake or was unavoidably or illegally issued for any part of the marshes or flats within the limits of the proposed improvement.

Mr. RANSOM. Should it not read, "A suit or suits in law or in equity?"

Mr. SHERMAN. This provision is taken from the bill reported by the committee in the House. It was deemed necessary there, and I think it should be inserted here.

Mr. INGALLS. Let the amendment of the Senator from Arkansas as proposed to be amended be now reported.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chief Clerk will report the amendment of the Senator from Arkansas as proposed to be amended by the Senator from Ohio.

The Acting Secretary read as follows:

And it is hereby made the duty of the Attorney-General to examine all claims of title to the premises to be improved under this appropriation, and see that the rights of the Government in all respects are secured and protected; and if he deems it necessary he is authorized to cause a suit or suits in equity to be instituted, in the name of the United States in the supreme court of the District of Columbia against any and all claimants of title under any patent which in his opinion was by mistake or was unavoidably or illegally issued for any part of the marshes or flats within the limits of the proposed improvement.

Mr. DAWES. I suggest to the Senator from Ohio to strike out "unavoidably" and insert "from any cause."

Mr. SHERMAN. The word "unavoidably" is used in the amendment to cover a case where the patent was issued, because it was supposed some provision of law required it to be done. However, the word "unavoidably" is not necessary. The words "by mistake, or illegally" are sufficient.

Mr. RANSOM. I suggest to the Senator from Ohio, to say "suits in law or in equity."

Mr. SHERMAN. The claimant under this patent has no possession whatever except a title which it may be necessary to extinguish by a bill in equity.

Mr. RANSOM. In the investigation of this question we do not know what may occur, and the term "in law" can do no harm.

Mr. SHERMAN. The amendment is copied from the House bill, which was very carefully considered in all its bearings. As a matter of course no suit in law can be brought, because the persons claiming have no possession and no right to possession.

Mr. RANSOM. My only purpose is to give the Attorney-General the fullest discretion and the largest power in making the examination. The term "in law or in equity" can do no harm.

Mr. SHERMAN. I have no objection to such a modification.

Mr. MCMILLAN. I inquire of the Senator from North Carolina whether this amendment is a condition precedent to the applicability of the appropriations?

Mr. RANSOM. It is not.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Ohio modify the amendment which he sent to the desk?

Mr. SHERMAN. I have no objection to inserting the words "in law" before "in equity" at the proper place, and to striking out "unavoidably" and inserting "for any cause."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. If there be no objection the amendment suggested by the Senator from Ohio will be so changed. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Ohio to the amendment of the Senator from Arkansas, which has been accepted by the Senator from North Carolina.

Mr. BAYARD. I suggest to the Senator from Ohio that the legal proceedings, proceedings of law or in equity, be taken by the Attorney-General in his discretion.

Mr. SHERMAN. That is my amendment.

Mr. BAYARD. No, you direct him to commence suit in a certain court, in the supreme court of the District of Columbia.

Mr. SHERMAN. The amendment begins by providing that if the Attorney-General deems it necessary he is authorized to cause suit to be instituted.

Mr. BAYARD. I understand that this proceeding is of a cautionary nature, to protect the United States against some alleged claim of title. The legal fact is known that on a bill filed by the Attorney-General a court of equity may decide to compel the claimant of a shadowy title to bring his right into court. Whether the language of the Senator's amendment would cover that fully is not quite clear to me. I think it would be better to direct the attention of the Attorney-General to the fact that there were or might be certain claims against this property, and instruct him to take such proceedings at law or in equity as would be necessary to bring them to a test. That I believe is the object of the amendment. I suggest, therefore, that instead of directing him to commence suit in a particular court, it direct him to take such proceedings at law or in equity as may be necessary in his judgment to protect the title of the United States.

Mr. SHERMAN. I think the amendment as now proposed does precisely what the Senator from Delaware thinks it ought to do.

Mr. BAYARD. I presume an appeal will lie to the Supreme Court of the United States?

Mr. SHERMAN. Certainly.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Ohio to the amendment of the Senator from North Carolina.

Mr. RANSOM. There is no objection to the amendment.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment as amended.

Mr. McMILLAN. When this amendment was offered I deemed it my duty, believing it to be entirely out of order as an amendment to this bill, to interpose that objection. The Senate overruled the objection by a vote, I think very erroneously; but it is very evident from that action, and from all the indications upon the floor of the Senate, that the amendment will prevail. I do not think it necessary to discuss it further. It certainly should not be incorporated in this bill, whatever may be its merits as a separate measure. Upon that I express no opinion. I shall content myself with voting against the amendment.

Mr. INGALLS. Before the final vote of the Senate is taken, I trust the Senator from North Carolina will advise the Senate as to what method of improvement is proposed to be adopted, and what is the ultimate amount of appropriations that Congress will be expected to make before the reclamation and improvement of the channel is completed.

I said on Saturday evening, when this matter was before the Senate, that various plans and estimates had been submitted, ranging in expenditure from $1,900,000 to $5,000,000, and extending in time from a period of two years to an indefinite period that may not be less than ten. I have no doubt that some appropriation should be made, and that it is wise and proper and just that this amendment should go upon the bill; but before we act in making this preliminary appropriation we ought to be more definitely advised than we are at present whether the amendment, if adopted, will involve the expenditure of $2,000,000 or of $5,000,000, and whether we are to have the Holland system adopted, which is to build a dike or containing wall around the seven hundred acres, leaving the interior to be disposed of in a different manner, or whether the entire surface by filling is to be elevated ten or twelve feet above the flood level.

I hope, therefore, that the Senator from North Carolina, in pursuance of the suggestion that he made when this matter was under debate on Saturday, will advise the Senate what they may expect if the amendment is agreed to.

Mr. RANSOM. The Senator from Kansas was not in the Senate, I think, this morning when I undertook to make a short preliminary statement in reference to this amendment.

Mr. INGALLS. That I heard. I heard the preliminary statement; that is, I heard the conclusion of the report of the engineers read.

Mr. RANSOM. The inquiry of the Senator from Kansas is a very proper one, and I will endeavor in a word or two to make the idea of the committee comprehensible to him, because I know the Senator from Kansas is perhaps the best advised Senator in this body upon this question, if he will permit me to say so. The plan which this amendment proposes is the one recommended by the board of engineers, General Gillmore, Colonel Craighill, and Colonel Comstock.

Mr. INGALLS. On what page of the testimony will that be found?

Mr. RANSOM. It will not be found in the testimony, but will be found in the report of the Secretary of War, in the executive document.

Mr. INGALLS. Upon what page of the executive document?

Mr. RANSOM. It begins at page 9.

Mr. SHERMAN. I suggest to the Senator that at the bottom of page 12 and on the following page he will find the conclusions of the board.

Mr. RANSOM. Yes, sir. I am stating now where it all is. It begins on page 9 of Executive Document No. 126, and ends on page 14.

As the Senator from Kansas has been considerate enough to advise me beforehand what he desires to know, I will come at once to the point of his suggestion. The Senator wishes to know whether the plan recommended by the board of engineers, and which is suggested in this amendment, is a plan for filling up the flats or a plan adopting what is known as the Holland method of diking the flats. The plan proposed by the board of engineers is a plan for filling up the flats. It proposes to reclaim the flats, to fill up the flats almost entirely.

Mr. INGALLS. That is, to elevate the entire seven hundred acres, so that the whole surface will be above flood level?

Mr. RANSOM. Yes, sir; so that the whole surface will be above flood level, but not so that the whole surface will be as high as the embankment. I do not know that I can make myself clear to the Senate, but I will try to do so, at least to the Senator from Kansas. The plan proposed by the engineer of the city and the river, and adopted by the board of engineers, was to put all around the reclaimed land a heavy embankment sufficiently high and above all flood, but not to extend that embankment over the whole area of flats, simply making an embankment and then raising the flats up to within five or six feet of the top of the exterior embankment. They said that if they had $5,000,000 it would be better to raise the whole area of the flats up to the summit of the embankment, but for economy's sake they thought it would be as well to let the embankment be twelve feet high and the whole area of the flats somewhere from six to nine feet high. That is the original plan of Major Twining, improved by Colonel Abert; and finally, I may say, almost perfected by the board of engineers adopting in their plan the suggestion of the sanitary engineers in reference to the health of the city. As I understand it, when the work is completed the flats will be raised above the flood-mark; there will be perfect drainage of the area reclaimed; a thorough reclamation of that part of the sewage of the city connected with the flats; and an entire prevention of all overflow of the city.

Mr. INGALLS. And a total expenditure, when the work is entirely completed, of $2,500,000?

Mr. RANSOM. Yes, sir; if my friend from Kansas will look at it he will see that the total expenditure under that plan is $2,500,000.

I had as well, perhaps, say now, while I am on the floor, not to prolong this debate, that what is known as the Holland plan, putting a dike around and using pumps for throwing out the water of the sewage, received no favor whatever with any of the engineers of the United States, or any of the sanitary engineers except one. It met with their decided disapprobation.

Mr. VEST. I do not want to continue the discussion, but there is a vast difference of opinion between the members of the select committee on this question. From the beginning my idea was that this improvement should be complete and final; that it should not be done by piecemeal; that it should not be done by parcels; that it should be worthy of the country, worthy of the national capital, and that it should be a finality.

Mr. RANSOM. I dislike to interrupt my friend from Missouri, but will he permit me to say that which I ought to have said before? What the Senator from Missouri says is strictly true; he has always been in favor of a grand, bold, and thorough improvement; he has always insisted that the flats should be elevated up to the summit of the exterior wall or embankment, but if he will look at the testimony he will find that Colonel Abert and Major Twining both declared that this plan, if carried out as devised by them now, could be afterward supplemented without inconvenience by the elevation of the whole flats up to the summit of the exterior wall, and that if the Government should think proper to make further expenditures this would be but preliminary to the final work, if Congress should so desire it.

Mr. VEST. The testimony of Colonel Abert and of Major Twining, as I will proceed to show by reading, for that is the best evidence, was that this expenditure of $2,500,000 would be for a partial improvement; that so far as it went it was well enough, but that it was imperfect, and that they only recommended it because they did not believe Congress would give over two and a half million. It was their statement repeatedly before the committee that they believed the improvement which ought to be made would cost $5,000,000, but they only asked for two and a half million because they thought Congress would not give any more.

I proceed to read from that testimony to show that this amendment, based upon the report of the committee, must necessarily be imperfect; that it is partial; that it does not do what the Senator says should be done; and that instead of improving the Potomac flats or removing this deadly malaria of which we have heard so much this morning, there is no assurance that two and a half million dollars will do any such thing; and the testimony we took from these experts shows it. One of them is now dead, in his grave, and the ablest, in my judgment, of all the engineers who have passed upon this improvement. I read from the eleventh page of the testimony taken before our special committee a question I asked of Colonel Abert and his answer:

Question. What do I understand you now to say you would do if you had the money?

Answer. If I had the money I would fill the entire area proposed to be reclaimed to the level of two feet above the flood of 1877, or to an average of twelve feet above low water. Such an improvement would possess the best sanitary conditions, and would afford the ground for excellent building-lots or for a fine park, as might be desired.

By Senator GORMAN:

Q. That is not the recommendation of the board, is it?

That is, of the board upon whose recommendation my friend from North Carolina bases his amendment.

A. No; the recommendation of the board is based upon the assumption that the appropriation would be limited to $500,000. They endeavored to secure what they regarded as the best plan which could be executed for this sum of money.

Not the best plan to be had, but the best plan to be had for two and a half million dollars.

Q. But I want to understand the recommendation of the board?

A. The board recommend the adoption of the lines laid down upon my map as the exterior lines or front of the inclosed area. Above the bridge they recommend Major Twining's plan of filling. Below the bridge they recommend the plan described in my report. Above the bridge Major Twining proposes to fill to the level of two feet above low water between Easby's Point and the sewer-canal. Between the sewer-canal and the bridge he proposes to inclose the area with an embankment of the same height, and to excavate the interior so as to form a pond of one hundred and twenty-seven acres, and a depth of not less than eight feet, provided with inlet and outlet gates to be used for flushing the Washington channel. Below the Long Bridge the method of improvement has been already described. This is the plan recommended by the board, subject to such modification of details as a further study may suggest as advantageous or expedient.

Q. So I understand—

Said the Senator from Maryland, [Mr. GORMAN.]

So the recommendation of the board is only to fill two feet above low water the entire surface, with a bulk-head twelve feet above low-water mark or two feet above high-water mark?

A. To the level of about two feet above the freshet of 1877.

Q. Do you concur in that recommendation?

A. I think the plan a good one. I should prefer to fill the entire area from Easby's to a point opposite Giesborough to the general level of two feet above the freshet of 1877, leaving the sewer-canal to be dealt with by the District commissioners.

By Senator VEST:

Q. Have you ever made an estimate of how much it would cost to fill up the whole of it?

A. The estimate I made at one time amounted to nearly $5,000,000. I think it advisable, however, to retain a winter harbor for the protection of the shipping from the ice.

In this unsatisfactory, imperfect, unspecific condition this matter is left. So far as it goes, say the board of engineers, we propose to improve to the extent of two and a half million dollars, not that it removes this malaria; it is good in so far as two and a half million dollars will do it, but they say if they had $5,000,000 they would undertake to make a perfect improvement. I suppose, however, the Senate will vote to pass it anyhow and I have no more to say about it.

Mr. INGALLS. Mr. President, there has been a great deal of unfounded romance about the sanitary aspects of this question. Every time this subject comes up for discussion we are treated to disquisitions upon the tremendous danger that threatens this community from the exposed condition of the Potomac flats; we hear about the Kidwell Bottoms as a pestilential bog, a fetid, feculent quagmire that is continuously sending up its poisonous exhalations to be drifted over upon this side and resulting in depopulation and the destruction of the value of property and health and in subsequent death. We are also told by the Senator from Michigan [Mr. CONGER] that the country was shocked to learn during the illness of President Garfield that malarial complications also entered into the treatment of his disorder, so that he was ultimately compelled to be removed from the White House to Long Branch, where he died.

Mr. President, all these assertions are contradicted by the plain facts in regard to the health of this city. The per cent. of zymotic or preventable diseases is less in Washington than in any other city of its population on the continent. The general health of the people here is better than in any other city of its size upon the continent. I believe that the final conclusions of the physicians are that the allegation that the illness of the late President was in any way seriously affected by the malarious exhalations from the Potomac flats is wholly without foundation. I say this for the purpose of repelling the argument that is continually made here that Congress has been delinquent in its duty toward the people of this District by refusing heretofore to make vast appropriations for the purpose of reclaiming this morass in front of the city.

That something ought to be done I have no hesitation in saying, but I am bound to add also that the present condition of this amendment is exceedingly unsatisfactory to me. We are told that there are some doubts about the title to this property, and amendments have been offered for the purpose of protecting the rights of the United States Government in case this appropriation is made. It does not appear to me to be material whether the property belongs to the Government or to the Kidwell heirs. If it is essential from sanitary or commercial considerations that the improvement should be made, it makes no odds whom the property belongs to. We do not require when we improve rivers and harbors or when we dig canals that there shall be first an effort made to protect the rights of the Government or the rights of private citizens. If we decide that the work ought to be done we direct the authorities to condemn the property and proceed with the work, and leave the subject of damages to be decided thereafter. So it makes no difference whatever whether the property belongs to the Government or belongs to the Kidwell heirs. If sanitary considerations or commercial considerations require that this wall shall be built, the channel rectified, and the flats reclaimed, it should be done irrespective of the question of title, because I believe in case of damage it may be assumed that the amount we should be called upon to pay would be the value of the property when the work was begun and not the enhanced value that might arise after the work had been completed.

But there is another aspect of the case to which I want to call attention. It is left in doubt by this amendment whether this reclaimed land, amounting to about seven hundred acres above and below the Long Bridge, is to become a part of the public reservation of the city, or is to be used hereafter for commercial purposes and for purposes of speculation and sale. I believe that the vast area which is to be reclaimed, elevated, diked, in whatever manner you please, ought to continue to remain a part of the public reservation extending from the Capitol to the Naval Observatory, and that no amendment should be agreed to by the Senate and that no plan of reclamation should be adopted by the Senate which does not provide that this final disposition shall be made of that ground.

In the testimony taken before the select committee there is evidence going to show what the commercial value of this property would be after it had been reclaimed, showing that it would be worth so many cents a foot and consequently so many dollars an acre, leaving the impression that it was the purpose in reclaiming this property to give it a commercial value and have it sold either for wharves or docks or business houses, so that it might add to the commercial value of the city. I am opposed to that, and I would desire that whenever this plan is adopted it shall provide that the land shall be a part of the public reservations of the city, to be built in it, included in it, adopted in it, so that from the Capitol to the Naval Observatory there shall be one continuous and unbroken mall or reservation devoted to public purposes.

Mr. DAWES. How about the railroad?

Mr. INGALLS. I would remove the Baltimore and Potomac Railroad at once if it were in my power; and if it were not possible to do that, I would compel them to build viaducts the full width of the roads wherever they cross them, which should be sufficient to afford safe and easy transit both for horse and foot travelers. I think that ought to be done, and done promptly.

I regret exceedingly that the select committee when they had the subject referred to them did not report to us an intelligible bill, a complete and comprehensive plan, which should not only enable us to vote as to what ought to be adopted as the engineering system but also to declare what disposition should be made of the seven hundred acres of ground after it is reclaimed. That is wholly left in doubt, and to that extent it is unsatisfactory.

The Senator from North Carolina states that it is proposed to adopt the plan mentioned in the report of the board of engineers; and to that extent, of course, we know what is to be done, but the rest is all left to the dark. We have not any information as to the amount that is to be expended, as to the result that is to be accomplished, nor as to the disposition which is to be made of this vast tract of territory after it has been reclaimed.

Mr. RANSOM. Since I was last on the floor, I have received a paper from the Commissioner of the General Land Office, which I ask may be printed in the RECORD. It is too long to be read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin, in the chair.) The paper will be printed in the RECORD, if there be no objection.

The paper is as follows:

MEMORANDUM.

The title of the United States to the bed of the Potomac River through the District of Columbia was derived from the cession of jurisdiction by the State of Maryland.

The United States has such title to the soil under the navigable waters of the Potomac River within the District, and to the islands, flats, bars, and marshes in said river, as the State of Maryland had.

The alienation of the sovereign title to the shores of navigable waters and the soil under them, or the disposal of the flats, bars, and marshes within such waters, was not authorized by the general land acts of the State of Maryland.

The laws of Maryland providing for the disposal of vacant lands, and which were adopted by Congress for the District of Columbia, authorized the disposal only of lands of a certain defined character.

The United States could dispose only of such lands within the District under those laws as the State of Maryland could have disposed of prior to the cession under those laws.

If the tract now in question could not have been disposed of by the State of Maryland under the act of 1781, it could not legally have been disposed of by the United States under the joint resolution of Congress of 1839.

The land that could have been disposed of under the general land acts of Maryland was land suitable for occupation and cultivation. It was not land that by the accumulations and hardening of future years might become suitable for cultivation, but land actually cultivable. The term "vacant cultivation" as authoritatively construed, implied unappropriated land that could be cultivated.

If the "Kidwell Meadow" was in 1869 a strip of marsh in the Potomac River, subject to overflow by tide-water, it was not cultivable land authorized to be disposed of by the Maryland acts and the joint resolution of 1839.

If the land was not of the character authorized to be surveyed by said laws, and the instructions issued thereunder, that is to say, if it was not "firm land and not subject to tidal overflow," its survey in 1867 was illegal and the approval of said survey in 1869 was without authority.

The public land laws of the United States are not operative in the District of Columbia, and the disposal of land, the property of the United States therein, can only be made by special authority of Congress. Patents for lands in said District cannot issue without express provision of law.

If the patent to Kidwell was not for land authorized to be disposed of by the Maryland acts and the joint resolution of 1839, its issue was without authority.

The land must also have been vacant, unappropriated land. The Maryland acts contemplated only the disposal of lands of such character. It was further provided in the joint resolution that "any land which may have been ceded to, or acquired by, the United States for public purposes shall not be affected by said acts."

The Potomac River in its course through the District is appropriated to the public uses of navigation. The alienation of the title of the United States to the flats, bars, and marshes therein would impair those uses by impeding harbor improvements and interfering with the removal of obstructions.

The United States is the proprietor of the land adjoining the Kidwell Meadows, so called, having acquired the same for the uses of the Naval Observatory and other public purposes.

The land in question is of alluvial formation. If in 1869 it had been raised above low-water mark by gradual accretion, it had become attached to the adjoining property through riparian rights, and would for that reason have been taken out of the class of lands subject to the operation of the Maryland acts and the joint resolution, first, because the title to the adjoining property had passed from the State of Maryland to private proprietors prior to the cession, and second, because of the public uses to which the adjoining property had been dedicated by the United States.

The segregation of such land and its disposal at private sale would have required special authority of Congress, without which an attempted sale by the executive officers of the United States would be void.

The patent to Kidwell can be sustained only on the following propositions:

First. That the land was firm cultivable land in 1869.

Second. That it was above high-water mark at that date and not subject to tidal overflow.

Third. That it was unappropriated to any public purpose.

Fourth. That it was separated from the mainland by a navigable channel, and was an island in fact, and not an accretion to the mainland.

Fifth. That it was without the municipal jurisdiction of the city of Washington.

Sixth. That the acts of Maryland and the joint resolution of 1839 contemplated the disposal to private persons of the islands, flats, bars, and marshes in the harbor of Washington.

Unless each and all of the foregoing conditions are met the patent to Kidwell was issued without proper authority.

But whether said patent was issued without authority, or whether it is voidable by reason of fraud or mistake, or whether it conveys a valid title to the land, are questions that can, of course, only be determined by the courts.

Mr. FARLEY. Mr. President, I shall be compelled to vote against the amendment, and I wish to state the reasons which will control my action. In the first place, the Committee on Commerce have never considered this question in any shape or form. It is true that the original application was referred to the Committee on Commerce last May a year ago. In December of last year a select or special committee was created for the purpose of taking the whole matter into consideration. They had all the paraphernalia of carrying on the investigation; they had their stenographer and their secretary, and they had before them as witnesses all the persons who have examined this question. Not one word of their examination has ever been submitted to the Committee on Commerce. I understand the Senator from North Carolina now to say that the Committee on Commerce had nothing to do with it. Therefore, I say the proposition now to ingraft this amendment upon the river and harbor bill ought to have no place in this body.

Mr. RANSOM. But the Senate determined by a very decided vote on Saturday last that it had a proper place on the bill.

Mr. FARLEY. I am speaking now of the propriety of the Committee on Commerce being saddled with this important amendment of half a million dollars—for what? To improve the harbor of Washington? To improve the Potomac? No, sir; the very object of the creation of the select committee was, as has been properly and ably stated by the Senator from Missouri and others, to investigate the sanitary condition of the Potomac flats. To that end they have sought testimony; they have had experienced physicians before the committee time and again, and not one word of their testimony has ever been submitted to the Committee on Commerce.

I say, as an humble member of the Committee on Commerce, that here is a bill that is already subject, in my opinion, in many respects to the just criticism of the country as to the enormity of the appropriations which have been reported by that committee, amounting now to nearly $20,000,000, an increase of more than $2,000,000 over the bill as it passed the House. Yet without the committee having any intimation reported by the select committee to the Committee on Commerce, they are asked now to be charged with having this half million dollars added to this enormous bill.

In the month of December last the select committee took this whole question from the Committee on Commerce. During the summer months last year no action was taken by the sub-committee of the Committee on Commerce. Then it was withdrawn from that committee in December, and now we are asked to consent that the Committee on Commerce shall be charged with having increased the river and harbor bill another half million dollars by what should have been an entirely separate and different proposition.

I am not opposed to any appropriation which will tend to relieve what experts have said is an unhealthy influence in this city. I happened to be present on one occasion, and heard the testimony of some eminent physicians before the select committee; and in comparing, as was said by the Senator from Kansas a few moments ago, the condition of the health of this city with other cities, it was estimated by some of the eminent physicians whom I heard testify that so far as the health of Washington was concerned it compared favorably with the cities of Baltimore, Philadelphia, New York, and other large cities on the Atlantic side.

I am not opposed to a proper appropriation in the proper place for the improvement of the flats of the Potomac, nor would I be opposed to a bill improving the Washington and Georgetown Harbor, if there is such a harbor, but that question was never submitted to our committee. Three members of the Committee on Commerce are members of the select committee.

Mr. RANSOM. Five.

Mr. FARLEY. Three: the Senator from North Carolina, [Mr. RANSOM,] the Senator from Michigan, [Mr. CONGER,] and the Senator from Missouri, [Mr. VEST.] Then two others were added to it.

Mr. RANSOM. No; the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. KELLOGG] is on the select committee. There are five members of the Committee on Commerce on the select committee.

Mr. FARLEY. Who are the others?

Mr. RANSOM. I say that five members of the present Committee on Commerce are members of the select committee.

Mr. FARLEY. How many members are on the select committee?

Mr. RANSOM. The present select committee upon the Potomac flats is composed of seven members, five of whom belong to the Committee on Commerce, and two, the Senator from Maryland [Mr. GORMAN] and the Senator from Pennsylvania, [Mr. CAMERON,] do not belong to that committee. The present committee is composed of Messrs. RANSOM, KELLOGG, CONGER, JONES of Nevada, VEST, GORMAN, and CAMERON of Pennsylvania.

Mr. FARLEY. Then I stand corrected as to the members of the Committee on Commerce who were appointed on the select committee. As I have stated before, all matters pertaining to this proposition were taken from the Committee on Commerce, and that committee is not entitled to any particular credit or to any dishonor in any action that may be taken upon the pending amendment. That committee has had nothing to do with it; it has been in the hands of the select committee. The Senator says if I had paid proper attention to what was stated in the Committee on Commerce I would have known more about the history of this proposition. I remember that on the last day of the meeting of that committee this question was submitted to the committee and was rejected without any particular argument being presented before it. That I remember perfectly well. I paid that much attention to it; and I apprehend that I shall be sustained in this position by the chairman of the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. RANSOM. On the contrary, the Senator is mistaken in that position. I do not know that it is quite proper to speak in the Senate of what happened in committee, but as the Senator has spoken of it I will say that on the last day when other matters were through, and at the proper time, this matter was proposed to the Committee on Commerce, and upon the suggestion of the Senator from California it could not be heard, and then the committee, with some consideration for the select committee, did not reject it but expressly declined to give a vote upon it, saying that they did not wish to give the proposition a black eye.

Mr. FARLEY. Will the Senator answer me a question?

Mr. RANSOM. With very great pleasure.

Mr. FARLEY. Was anything stated as to any conclusion that had been arrived at by the select committee?

Mr. RANSOM. No; simply because a majority of the committee then present protested earnestly, as the chairman knows, against any further consideration of the matter, and it was agreed not to vote on the matter, but to let it pass.

Mr. FARLEY. The Senator was mistaken in the statement that upon my suggestion in the committee this matter was rejected.

Mr. RANSOM. I did not say that it was rejected.

Mr. FARLEY. I understood the Senator to say that a majority of the committee refused to vote on it at all.

Mr. RANSOM. I never said it was rejected. On the contrary, the Senator said it was, and I rose to correct him.

Mr. FARLEY. The Senator does not seem to have understood my position, or I do not understand his. I simply say that I am perfectly willing to vote for any proper appropriations that may be reported by the select committee in the form of a bill for the purpose sought to be attained by this amendment; but I object to the measure going upon the river and harbor bill, and I believe a large majority of the Committee on Commerce think the same thing, as was stated just now by the honorable Senator from North Carolina. The question now, as has been suggested, is that the Senate has passed upon the parliamentary right of having this appropriation on the bill. That is all very true; the Senate has so acted.

Mr. President, I have very little more to say in reference to this matter except to ask that the Committee on Commerce shall not be chargeable in any shape or form with the adoption of this amendment by the Senate. As was suggested by the honorable Senator from North Carolina, when I made the remark a moment ago, the labor that had been performed by the committee I have no doubt was very extensive. The Senator from North Carolina seems to have misunderstood my statement. The testimony taken and the report made here show that they have performed a large amount of labor. What I complain of is that that work which they had performed in taking and accumulating testimony was not submitted to the Committee on Commerce for its consideration, but it is proposed here to add this half million dollars in addition to what has been already put upon the bill.

That was my statement. I said the committee had performed a labor, and it is in a shape that could have been presented time and time again before the Committee on Commerce. The Senator misunderstood me if he understood me to say they did no work, because the evidence they have taken shows they have performed a large amount of labor; but I think we should have had it before us so as to have understood what the report was. We have had no report; we have had no bill from them.

I have said what I have in reference to this matter because I believe it due to the Committee on Commerce of which I am an humble member, and due to myself as having opposed this amendment both in committee and on the floor.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. RANSOM] as amended.

Mr. GARLAND. My amendment was accepted by the Senator from North Carolina I understand, and then the Senator from Ohio offered an amendment to that.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from North Carolina as modified by the amendments offered by the Senator from Arkansas and the Senator from Ohio.

Mr. VEST. On that question I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. McMILLAN. I understand the question to be upon inserting the appropriation for the Potomac flats in the river and harbor bill?

Mr. RANSOM. That is it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That is the question.

The yeas and nays were taken.

Mr. GARLAND. I do not know how the Senator from Vermont, [Mr. EDMUNDS,] if here, would vote. If he were present, I should vote for the amendment.

The result was announced—yeas 54, nays 7; as follows:

YEAS—54.

So the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CONGER. There is one mistake which should be corrected on page 7, line 137. The committee recommend the striking out of the word "five" before "thousand," and inserting "fifteen;" so as to make the clause read:

Improving harbor at entrance of Saint Jerome's Creek, Maryland: Continuing operations, $15,000.

I move that amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HARRIS. I offer the following amendment, to be inserted at the end of line 704, on page 29:

For continuing the improvement of the Cumberland River at Smith's Shoals, Kentucky, $25,000.

Mr. McMILLAN. I shall have to object to that that it is not in order. There was no amendment referred to the Committee on Commerce for that purpose.

Mr. HARRIS. The Senator is in fact mistaken. The amendment was offered, regularly printed, and referred to the Committee on Commerce four or five days ago.

Mr. McMILLAN. I am not so advised. I am not aware that that is the fact.

Mr. HARRIS. Let the Secretary report when the amendment was offered and referred.

The ACTING SECRETARY. "June 26, 1882, referred to the Committee on Commerce and ordered to be printed."

Mr. BECK. The Senator from Minnesota will recollect that I appeared before the committee and argued it, and thought I had convinced them of the propriety of the amendment.

Mr. McMILLAN. I beg pardon.

Mr. BECK. I went away believing they were going to insert it.

Mr. McMILLAN. I mistook the amendment of the Senator from Tennessee. Let it be read again.

Mr. WILLIAMS. The Senator will recollect that the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. JACKSON] and myself appeared before the committee to advocate this amendment.

The Acting Secretary read the amendment of Mr. HARRIS.

Mr. McMILLAN. I misunderstood the amendment. I thought it was an entirely different proposition.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Tennessee, [Mr. HARRIS.]

Mr. McMILLAN. This matter was fully considered by the Committee on Commerce, and after that consideration the committee rejected the amendment instead of making the appropriation. There was a proposition pending before the committee involving a survey of this river, and the committee adopted an amendment to the bill providing for a survey of whatever portion of this river is necessary to perfect and complete the survey of the stream, including Smith's Shoals.

Mr. HARRIS. I desire to say to the Senator from Minnesota and to the Senate that this portion of this river was surveyed some time ago, and work was commenced at Smith's Shoals and has been prosecuted and appropriated for for some years, I do not remember how many. It is estimated that $25,000 will complete the work. It develops an immense coal field, with navigable waters above and navigable waters below, and with the expenditure of this $25,000 one of the richest coal-fields in all of that country, if not in America, will be developed and opened out to the commerce of the United States.

I see no economy or wisdom in withholding so small an appropriation where commercial results so important and so large will be produced by making the appropriation to complete a work already begun, and that is comparatively if not absolutely useless unless completed.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Smith's Shoals are upon the Cumberland River, just above where the Cumberland leaves the Kentucky line and flows into Tennessee. The river below the shoals is navigable for steamboats for hundreds of miles, and it is above Smith's Shoals for several hundred miles for coal-boats. The Cincinnati Southern Railroad crosses the Cumberland River at Smith's Shoals at a little town called Burnside. Smith's Shoals are upon the dividing line between the sandstone region of the west and the limestone region of the east, and just above Smith's Shoals, which are eight miles in length, commence the great coal-fields of the western country that extend into Virginia. There are now above Smith's Shoals some thirty-four coal mines already opened. There is one mine that has expended $600,000 in building a railroad from the head of the shoals across to the Cincinnati Southern road in order to carry its coal by rail.

Three years ago an appropriation was made to build dams to overcome the obstruction in this part of the river filled with rocks. That appropriation was not sufficient to complete the work. It was estimated at first that it would be; but the young engineer officer who undertook the work built his dams on the wrong side of the river and threw the current against the sand-bank side of the river. The chief engineer came along and ordered him to take up the works and put them on the other side. He erected a dam, but it is not high enough to throw the whole current in one chanuel of the river.

Last year, instead of making an additional appropriation to continue these dams, an appropriation was asked for a survey to be made to see if it would not be better to construct a canal around the shoals instead of continuing the dams.

Mr. ALLISON. What sized canal, may I ask the Senator from Kentucky; I hope not a little one. [Laughter.]

Mr. WILLIAMS. It was a little bigger than the Hennepin Canal, perhaps. [Laughter.] That survey was made, and the estimated cost was so great that in the report sent to us by the Secretary of War, and the chief engineer, they recommended that $25,000 be appropriated to continue and complete the work of building the dams instead of a million dollars to make the canal. That is all there is in it.

This place is the beginning of the coal-fields. It is the first coal on the river Cumberland above Nashville, and the geological survey of that country demonstrates that there is more coal in that region than in all the Pittsburgh region. The first bank opened there by the Cincinnati Company was in a bed of the finest coal in the country; and with the expenditure of $25,000 this coal will have access through the Cumberland River to Nashville and down the Ohio to the Mississippi.

The sum asked for is a very insignificant one. Some thought a canal would be better to allow steamboats to go up; but the engineers say that the commerce and the demands of the country will be fully met by appropriating $25,000 to complete the wing-dams the Government has already commenced. They are there, but they are not high enough.

Both the States of Kentucky and Tennessee are interested. Nashville and the people of Tennessee are more interested than the people of Kentucky are; but it is a matter of great importance. There are thirty-four coal-mines already opened above these shoals, and the estimate is that at least 20 per cent. of the barges loaded with coal have been lost and wrecked by these shoals in the last year. That is shown in a report which I have before me. The survey was made by Captain Crozer of the engineers, and sent in by General Wright. It is a very small matter in the way of appropriation, and I think the Senate ought to adopt the amendment of the Senator from Tennessee.

The Cumberland is a great river. It is several hundred miles from these shoals to the Ohio River. The Cumberland rises in Kentucky, flows on two or three hundred miles, and then turns around and runs three or four hundred miles through Tennessee, and back again into Kentucky, and so into the Ohio, just hugging in her elbow these two great States.

I feel, as a Kentuckian, equally interested with the people of the State of the Senator from Tennessee. The engineer says $25,000 will complete the dams, and it does seem to me that it is an amount that the Senate should not higgle about. There is no question of the importance and necessity of it.

Mr. CONGER. I have the report of the Chief Engineer in regard to this——

Mr. WILLIAMS. I would suggest that the report to which I refer is a supplemental report filed after that.

Mr. CONGER. I know it is.

Mr. WILLIAMS. He admits that he made a mistake in not originally recommending this appropriation in the original report.

Mr. McMILLAN. The committee made no mistake in regard to it.

Mr. CONGER. In this bill for the Cumberland River above Nashville $30,000 is already appropriated; below Nashville, $15,000; above the mouth of the Jellico, still further up the river, $5,000; and at the south fork of the Cumberland, still further up the river, an appropriation of $3,000 is made. These appropriations have been made in every instance in accordance with the recommendation of the engineers. Now I will read to the Senate what the engineers say in regard to Smith's Shoals:

Smith's Shoals, (eight miles long.)—This obstruction consists of four very shallow and rapid shoals, which at low water are almost dry but at high water become a torrent, and the project for improvement contemplates such deepening and smoothing of the rocky bed of the river as will enable coal-boats to descend at four and five foot stages of the river.

A change has been made during the last year in the channel on the lower part of Long Shoals, (the most serious of these obstructions,) and the result has proved highly satisfactory as far as experience has extended. The channel has been shifted to the north side of the river, and the dams and rock excavation have been so far completed as to justify the expectation that they will need no further appropriation at present.

That was the report upon which the committee had to act. The Engineer goes on:

A survey has been ordered for the purpose of ascertaining the practicability and cost of improving these shoals by locks and dams, and when this is reported on and the boatmen have had an opportunity of thoroughly testing the work already done there will be an opportunity for Congress to decide whether to undertake the more radical system of improvement.

The committee placed in this bill a provision for a resurvey of the Cumberland River through its whole extent, including also a special survey of Smith's Shoals with regard to the necessity and the cost of improving them by means of the locks and dams which are mentioned by the engineer in this report. That is the situation of it at present. The report of the engineer is that the money already expended seemed to accomplish the object desired; and the committee had before them a statement of the engineer in regard to improving this by locks and dams which would amount to perhaps $1,000,000; and the engineer, after saying that no further appropriation is necessary for the class of improvement which the Government has already done, recommends waiting until the boatmen can test the value of the improvement and until Congress shall have had further surveys made as to the amount of expenditure necessary for the slack-water navigation by locks and dams. I think under these circumstances it is apparent that the committee intended at least to do fairly by this Cumberland River and by Smith's Shoals.

Mr. DAWES. I should like to inquire for information whether it is contemplated to abandon the methods of improvement at this point of the Cumberland River under which the money has been heretofore expended?

Mr. WILLIAMS. I do not understand the Senator.

Mr. DAWES. The navigation of the Cumberland River is all that the Senator from Kentucky represents it, and this is a very serious obstruction to that navigation. Heretofore we have been expending considerable money upon that point, looking to an ultimate completion of the removal of those obstructions so as to have a continuous navigation of the river. But the debate to-day, especially the remarks of the Senator from Michigan, would lead to the idea that that expenditure had been a failure and that some other plan was contemplated. I should like to be informed, so that I may know more about it. I desire, so far as I am concerned, to vote for the expenditure of every dollar of money that can be laid out in a manner that will bring about the end; but if we go on for several years as we have done, and then find out that we have gone on the wrong plan and method, it is a waste of money, and I should like to have the Senator from Michigan tell us whether the engineers contemplate a change.

Mr. CONGER. I meant to say——

Mr. WILLIAMS. I can explain it. The Government has already appropriated money to build these dams, and the money appropriated has been expended. They are found not to be quite sufficient.

Mr. DAWES. Were they part of the original plan?

Mr. WILLIAMS. Certainly.

Mr. DAWES. That is what I wanted to know.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Last year there was a survey ordered. Some of the engineers thought that a canal around was the best plan, and they made that survey and found it would cost too much to build the canal, and the chief engineer recommends the continuance of the original work of throwing the water by dams into a channel, and $25,000 he says is quite sufficient to complete it.

Mr. DAWES. This discussion about the canal around led me to make the inquiry whether it was contemplated after all to abandon the work on the channel and try to go around it by a canal.

Mr. CONGER. I have sent for the report which the Senator from Kentucky has, and I meant to have shown that that was entirely consistent with the statement I have made here. This is a report made March 10, 1882, in regard to locks and dams such as I have spoken of, and the engineer says, among other things:

On the other hand it should be stated:

1. That even if Congress should make liberal appropriation for the work, say $300,000 for the first year—

And I may say that $875,000 is the estimate here for locks and dams making slack-water navigation—it would take at least four years to complete the work, during which time no advantage would result to navigation; while at the rate such appropriations are usually made, a much longer time would elapse before the improvement would become available.

2. That the present system of dams—

Referring to the wing-dams which are completed now—appears to give good satisfaction as far as tested, and it is probable that if the coal mines will make full use of the boating tides, and perhaps make some slight modifications in their temporary barges, they can now market all the coal they can mine not only safely, but profitably.

3. So far as rafts and loose saw-logs are concerned, it is quite likely that the present arrangement is as good if not better than the locks and dams would be.

4. From the head of Great Falls to the head of Smith's Shoals, the Cumberland River falls three hundred and twenty-four feet, and is so badly obstructed by bowlders that it can never be made navigable for steamboats at any reasonable cost; it is not therefore probable that the improvement, even if completed as herein estimated for, would ever be extended to the Upper Cumberland.

Major King, a very excellent engineer, says:

In view of these considerations, I would respectfully recommend that the present system of dams—

That is, wing-dams—

be tried for at least one year longer before undertaking the more radical system of improvement; and if this recommendation is approved a small additional sum could be advantageously expended in adding to and strengthening the dams already built, as suggested at the end of Assistant Engineer Crozer's report. If, however, Congress decides upon building the locks and dams, I would respectfully urge that at least one-fourth of the entire cost of the work be appropriated the first year, so that the necessary preparations can be made for a vigorous prosecution of the work.

The new work will not only be of no use, but will be liable to offer more or less obstruction to navigation until the entire work is completed.

Mr. BECK. Now read from the top of the last page and see the recommendation he makes of $25,000 for carrying out and completing the work.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I will state for the information of the Senator from Michigan, if he will allow me, that that report is upon the order to survey for a canal, and that argument is to show that the canal will cost too much, and he therefore recommends a continuation of the wing-dams that the Government had already erected there.

Mr. CONGER. He recommends $10,000 to be expended on the head of Smith's Shoals, as we have it in the bill; he recommends $5,000 to be expended in Rock Castle River, between the mouth and the Narrows.

Mr. HARRIS. The first line in that paragraph——

Mr. CONGER. I see that is the assistant engineer.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Yes, sir.

Mr. HARRIS. And transmitted by Major King, the chief engineer, with approval, and referred to as his recommendation.

Mr. CONGER. I do not find that.

Mr. HARRIS. If the Senator will look at page 4 he will see it.

Mr. CONGER. He says:

I would respectfully suggest that an appropriation of $25,000 to complete the present unfinished dams on Mill and Long Shoals, and to build two dams on Shadowen Shoals, and an appropriation of $10,000—

They are no part of the Smith's Shoals survey.

Mr. HARRIS. Mill and Long Shoals are part of Smith's Shoals, part of the same shoals.

Mr. CONGER. They did not appear to be so from any report before the committee. They are apparently other shoals, as all these recommendations are for other places.

Now, I desire to call the attention of the Senator from Tennessee to what the committee reported in regard to that. Among other things—

To make such survey and report as to the cost of placing locks and dams on the Cumberland River from Nashville, Tennessee, to the Cincinnati Southern Railroad, in Kentucky, as in the opinion of the Secretary of War is necessary to complete the examination and report of said river; said report to be—

First, as to the practicability of the work;
Second, its probable cost from Nashville to the Kentucky line;
Third, the cost from the Kentucky line to the Cincinnati Southern Railroad;
Fourth, the cost of locking and damming so as to improve Smith's Shoals.

This is put into this bill——

Mr. WILLIAMS. But let me ask the Senator right there what is the necessity of putting in a survey of Smith's Shoals with a view to a canal, when there is a report already and a survey, with the opinion of the Chief Engineer that it is too costly a work; and he says instead of doing this: I recommend that $25,000 be appropriated to continue the improvement on those shoals?

Mr. CONGER. I do not find any such recommendation. I do not want to quibble about it. I find from Mr. Crozer, assistant engineer, a recommendation for five places on the Cumberland River, not one of which, as I understand, relates to Smith's Shoals, because he distinctly says that the appropriation already made has improved those as far as they are capable of improvement by this mode of improvement, by wings and dams.

I do not think the committee would have been justified on the reports of the engineers in making this increase. The Senate can do as it chooses about it. Why should we have made this additional recommendation when all seemed to desire that there should be a more specific examination, including a resurvey of the whole series of previous examinations of the Cumberland River, with special reference to the propriety of putting locks and dams at Smith's Shoals, instead of trusting to wing-dams and the improvement of the river by deepening the channel?

Mr. HARRIS. I think, if I can have the attention of the Senator from Michigan, he and I will not differ very materially about this matter. There was, by Assistant Engineer Crozer, a careful survey of the four shoals composing what are known as Smith's Shoals, composed of Mill and Long Shoals and two other smaller shoals, as the Senator will find in the second paragraph of page 5 of the pamphlet report from which he was reading. Assistant Engineer Crozer, after a careful survey and estimate, reports that a canal around those shoals will cost $875,000. He recommends that the present system of wing-dams, as has been adopted and has been perfected to a considerable extent, be completed at an expense of $25,000 in lieu of entering upon the more expensive and extensive work of digging a canal around this number of shoals, known as Smith's Shoals.

On page 4, near the bottom, the Senate will find that Major King, major of Engineers, refers to this report of Crozer with approval, and the last paragraph in Crozer's report, on page 8, at the top of the page, reads as follows:

I would respectfully suggest that an appropriation of $25,000 to complete the present unfinished dams on Mill and Long Shoals, and to build two dams on Shadowen Shoals, and an appropriation of $10,000 to be expended between the head of Smith's Shoals and the falls of the Cumberland, and an appropriation of $5,000 to be expended in Rockcastle River between the mouth and the Narrows, would be more benefit to commerce than the locking and damming of the shoals.

Here are the four shoals composing what are known as Smith's Shoals, distinctly named, with a recommendation of the engineer that $25,000 be appropriated to complete dams already commenced and incomplete, which will remedy the evil at least for the present, if not finally, while the plan of canaling, of which there has already been a survey, and for which there is now no necessity for an additional survey, is estimated to cost $875,000. We ask simply for an appropriation of $25,000 to complete the system already entered upon, already prosecuted almost to completion, which it is believed will remedy the evil at that place at least for the present, if not forever. I hope the amendment will be adopted.

Mr. BECK. I only want to correct one statement of the Senator from Michigan. He is mistaken about the appropriation that is made for the South Fork of the Cumberland above the shoals. The South Fork of the Cumberland falls into the main Cumberland just below Point Burnside, and it is below Smith's Shoals and in no way connected with them. It is quite a large stream, but it is not as long a stream as the main river, and runs through Southern Kentucky and Tennessee, falling in below Smith's Shoals and below the point where the Cincinnati Southern Railroad crosses. The effort now being made by this appropriation of $25,000 is in a cheap way to endeavor to get such navigation as will enable the great coal-mines in the Upper Cumberland, in Kentucky and Tennessee, to get their coal to market without waiting until the work which will have to be done in locking and damming as proposed by the engineers is carried out.

They have spent some money there, and $25,000 will make it so that coal-boats can pass up and down. Without this the coal cannot get to market except by extensive railroad hauling and waiting the uncertainty of an expenditure of $875,000. I think the $25,000 ought to be given. There is a large number of mines in Kentucky and Tennessee, and the interest is very large, and the chance of getting $875,000 for such an internal improvement is so slight when $25,000 will make the river complete, on which $30,000 has already been expended, that we thought it very little to ask for this allowance.

Mr. McMILLAN. I will suggest the condition in which the committee found these recommendations of the engineers and the reasons why they thought no additional appropriation should be made. In the regular report of the engineers we find the reference to Smith's Shoals by the Chief of Engineers describing the improvement and giving the amount of money which has been appropriated and the amount available for this improvement. Referring to Smith's Shoals the Chief of Engineers says:

This obstruction consists of four very shallow and rapid shoals, which at low water are almost dry, but at high water become a torrent, and the project for improvement contemplates such deepening and smoothing of the rocky bed of the river as will enable coal-boats to descend at four and five foot stages of the river.

* * * * * * *

Amount expended to June 30, 1881, $92,929.06.

And according to the money statement appended to the report of the Chief of Engineers on the 1st of July, 1881, the amount available was $7,070.94.

Then a survey looking to the improvement of Smith's Shoals by a system of locks and dams or by a canal was referred to the Engineer Department of the Army. That improvement was considered and a survey of the falls made and a special report returned to the War Department by the engineer in charge of the district and by his assistant, and transmitted by the Secretary of War through the Chief of Engineers to Congress.

It appears from the report of the engineer in charge, Major King, of the Engineer Corps, that the improvement by a canal or by a system of locks and dams, using the bed of the stream as a canal, is impracticable and should not be undertaken at present. The engineer says that the improvement as it exists at present, if the proprietors of the coal mines will take advantage of proper stages of the water, can send to market all the coal they mine above this point. So there is no necessity for carrying forward this improvement in order to permit the coal mined above this point to be transported to market, and the engineer does not recommend that any new work be accomplished at that point.

The assistant engineer, that is the civilian, not one of the Engineer Corps of the Army, but the local engineer who makes a survey, recommends in his report—

That an appropriation of $25,000 to complete the present unfinished dams on Mill and Long Shoals and to build two dams on Shadowen Shoals, and an appropriation of $10,000 to be expended between the head of Smith's Shoals and the falls of the Cumberland, and an appropriation of $5,000 to be expended in Rockcastle River between the mouth and the Narrows would be more benefit to commerce than the locking and damming the shoals.

He does not make a recommendation that this amount be appropriated, but says that it would be better to do that than to undertake the appropriation to carry out and perfect the system of dams and locks in the river at the shoals. The Engineer of the Army, in referring to Mr. Crozer's report, uses this language:

If, however, Congress decides upon building the locks and dams, I would respectfully urge that at least one-fourth of the entire cost of the work be appropriated the first year.

And he says further in his report:

A small additional sum could be advantageously expended in adding to and strengthening the dams already built.

But he makes no definite estimate, he gives no data upon which we could make any recommendation to the Senate or insert this item in the appropriation bill. There appearing to be an unexpended balance on the 1st of July, 1881, the recommendation, giving it the most favorable construction, being that a small sum might be appropriated, we concluded that the matter was not such a one, that the necessities of commerce were not such as to require any appropriation to this particular locality at this time, and having embraced in the bill all the other items of appropriation for the Cumberland River, which have been mentioned by the Senator from Michigan, and which I need not now repeat, we thought that abundant provision had been made for the improvement of that river.

Mr. WILLIAMS. After work was commenced on these wing-dams in the channel, a project was started by digging a canal around these shoals, which are eight miles in length, and a survey was made under authority of the chief engineer with that view, and the officer employed as an engineer was W. C. Crozer, assistant engineer, who did the work, and upon his report to the chief engineer, Major King, of the Engineer Corps, after reviewing the cost of the canal, which would be nearly a million dollars, and showing that the interests of commerce above the shoals were not sufficient to bear so costly an improvement, says:

In view of these considerations, I would respectfully recommend that the present system of dams be tried for at least one year longer before undertaking the more radical system of improvement; and if this recommendation is approved a small additional sum could be advantageously expended in adding to and strengthening the dams already built, as suggested at the end of Assistant Engineer Crozer's report.

That is what we ask $25,000 for, to continue these dams already partially built. Now, here is the report to which Major King refers:

I would respectfully suggest that an appropriation of $25,000 to complete the present unfinished dams on Mill and Long Shoals, and to build two dams on Shadowen Shoals, and an appropriation of $10,000 to be expended between the head of Smith's Shoals and the falls of the Cumberland.

All we are asking now is the $25,000 to complete Mill and Long Shoals and build a dam on Shadowen Shoals. This is recommended. We do not ask the balance of the amount named in the report, between there and the falls, and for the Rockcastle River. We do not ask for any more surveys. There is an abundant survey, as shown by the map in my hand, accompanied by a map which is before the committee and is in the committee-room now, showing Smith's Shoals, embracing Mill and Long Shoals, and also the Shadowen Shoals. They are known as a group as Smith's Shoals, and in the amendment offered by the Senator from Tennessee nothing is asked for any portion of the river above these shoals nor for any portion above the falls in the Rockcastle River. If this is not recommended by the engineers as clearly as anything that is before us to-day I do not understand the force of the English language.

This system was commenced before the survey of the locks and dams commenced. The engineers made a survey for the locks and dams and they reported against that plan, and recommended in that report a continuation of the system begun the year before by erecting these wing-dams. That is all I have to say.

Mr. McMILLAN. I wish only to say in justice to the committee that we had every desire to make any appropriation that we felt would be justified for this purpose, but there is really no recommendation in this special report upon which Congress should act. It is not a recommendation of the Chief of Engineers. The only recommendation we act upon here in making these appropriations is the recommendation of the Chief of Engineers transmitted by the Secretary of War. Now, here comes a recommendation first from a civilian who is residing at this point, and of course desires to make as favorable a recommendation as he can, who makes a recommendation which is conditional in its character and quite indistinct, and when it comes to the assistant engineer, who is still a subordinate, he makes his recommendation quite indefinite and says a small amount might be appropriated to repair these dams.

Mr. WILLIAMS. And in that connection he refers to a report where the amount is specified.

Mr. McMILLAN. But the Chief of Engineers, who transmits this report through the Secretary of War to Congress, and who is the responsible officer to Congress, and upon whose reports we rely, makes no recommendation and fails entirely to mention the thing in his report. Under these circumstances the committee, after using all the effort they could to comply with the request of the Senators, were compelled to refuse it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Tennessee, [Mr. HARRIS.]

The amendment was agreed to—ayes 26, noes not counted.

DISTRICT WATER SUPPLY.

Mr. HARRIS. I ask leave to submit at this time a conference report.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It will be received.

The Acting Secretary read the report, as follows:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the House to the bill of the Senate No. 1723, to increase the water supply of the city of Washington, and for other purposes, having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the Senate agree to the amendment of the House numbered 1, providing for a fish-way at the Great Falls of the Potomac, &c., and they also agree to recommend the following as a substitute for amendment numbered 2 of the House to said bill:

"That one-half the cost of said improvement, excluding the fish-way, shall be annually computed and stated by the Treasurer of the United States and charged to a capital account on the books of the Treasury, and that interest at the rate of 7 per cent. per annum thereon shall be annually computed and charged to said account, and that any surplus of water rents over and above the expenses of maintaining the works and appendages and paying the charges for interest and sinking fund for the redemption of outstanding bonds heretofore issued for the extension of said water-works in the city of Washington shall be paid into the Treasury of the United States by the officer who may be charged with the collection of the same, and credited to the account thus created, until the same shall be finally extinguished; and the water rents shall be so regulated from time to time as to be at least sufficient to pay the expenses of maintaining the said works and appendages and the interest on the capital account created in accordance with this provision in addition to charges now imposed thereon by law. After the extinguishment of said account, and until further action by Congress, the surplus water rents shall be paid into the Treasury of the United States."

AMENDMENTS TO BILLS.

Mr. ROLLINS, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, reported two amendments intended to be proposed to the bill (H. R. No. 6616) making appropriations for the naval service for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1883, and for other purposes; which were referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. BECK and Mr. WILLIAMS submitted amendments intended to be proposed by them respectively to the bill (H. R. No. 5538) to reduce internal-revenue taxation; which were ordered to lie on the table and be printed.

Mr. VANCE. I have been absent all day on business of the Senate, and I ask unanimous consent to submit sundry amendments to the internal-revenue bill.

The amendments were received and ordered to lie on the table and be printed.

Mr. BUTLER submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the bill (H. R. No. 6716) making appropriations for sundry civil expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1883, and for other purposes; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

RIVER AND HARBOR BILL.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 6242) making appropriations for the construction, repair, and preservation of certain works on rivers and harbors, and for other purposes.

Mr. FARLEY. I move as a committee amendment, a majority of the Committee on Commerce authorizing me to offer it, to strike out "sixty" and insert "one hundred" in line 338; so as to read:

Improving Yaquina Bay, Oregon: Continuing improvement, $100,000.

This matter was before the committee upon an amendment offered by one of the Senators from Oregon, and it was rejected by the committee; but a majority of the committee have authorized me to offer this amendment at this time, so that it avoids the objection of coming in as the amendment of an individual Senator. It is an amendment authorized by a majority of the Committee on Commerce.

This improvement is a valuable one and necessary to the commerce of the State of Oregon. Large improvements are going on immediately connected with this harbor. A railroad is being built from this point up through a very rich country in that State. The amount named in the amendment is a very small addition to the amount which has already been given. Sixty thousand dollars has been appropriated by the House for this improvement. This simply asks as a matter of justice to those people in order to make this available that we make the sum $100,000 instead of $60,000. It adds $40,000.

I understand from very reliable authority that the amount of revenue that will be collected there during the present fiscal year if this harbor is improved will be not less than $168,000 upon materials now in the city of San Francisco ready to be shipped to that point to be laid down on a railroad leading out from Yaquina Bay to the interior of Oregon and through the richest portion of that State. Taking into consideration the appropriations that have been made here, I look upon this as being one of the most important and necessary appropriations that are contained in the bill. This improvement will accommodate a large commercial interest; it will protect a large wheat-growing interest throughout that State. It will open up to the interior of the State an outlet without having to go down the Columbia River at a cost of transportation involving a loss on the products raised in that region of the State.

It seems to me that under these circumstances, while one or two or three of the committee are opposed to this amendment, it ought to be adopted. Some may think that Oregon has already a sufficiently large proportion of the appropriations in the bill, but that should not enter into this discussion, in my judgment, because this is an important amendment. To keep this harbor unimproved strikes at the very producing and shipping interests of that portion of the State. I hope the amendment will be adopted.

Mr. McMILLAN. I think there was no amendment offered or referred to the committee in regard to this matter, and the amendment now, I suppose, is out of order.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator raise the point of order on the ground that no amendment was offered and submitted to the committee?

Mr. FARLEY. I draw the attention of the chairman of the committee to the fact that the amendment was voted down in committee.

Mr. McMILLAN. I do not understand that there was any amendment submitted in the Senate and referred to the committee, and I suppose the point of order is good that under those circumstances the amendment cannot be offered here.

Mr. SLATER. If the Senator will yield a moment, my colleague [Mr. GROVER] offered an amendment, some days prior to the sitting of the committee, on this question, providing that this item be increased to $150,000, and had it regularly referred to the committee.

Mr. McMILLAN. The amendment was not proposed formally and brought to the attention of the committee, but the matter was considered in committee.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. But the Senator from Oregon says the amendment was offered and referred.

Mr. McMILLAN. Then, of course, the point of order would not apply.

Mr. GROVER. I will state that I offered the amendment in due time, and it was referred to the committee.

Mr. McMILLAN. And we considered the matter of increasing this appropriation at the suggestion of the Senators, whether a formal amendment was offered or not. It was brought to the attention of the committee on two occasions during the course of the consideration of this river and harbor bill. We gave it very full consideration on both occasions, and on both occasions the committee refused to make the amendment. The report of the Chief of Engineers shows that the amount estimated as required for the completion of the existing project at Yaquina Bay is $415,000. The Chief of Engineers also states that the amount that can be profitably expended this year is $60,000. That is the statement in the volume of reports of the Chief of Engineers. The House committee inserted in this bill the whole amount which the Chief of Engineers states can be profitably expended this year at that point. That is an unusual circumstance. If the same course were pursued in regard to all the improvements recommended by the Chief of Engineers, this bill would be an amount which would be almost incredible. Already allowing as the average rate to each improvement 33⅓ per cent. of the recommendations of the Chief of Engineers, this bill amounts to over $19,000,000, and yet this amendment embraces the whole amount which can be profitably expended on this improvement.

Under these circumstances, the whole amount having been allowed in the House bill, the committee did not feel justified in increasing it, particularly in view of the fact that the improvements in the State of Oregon receive in this bill this year the amount of $518,500.

Mr. FARLEY. If the Senator will allow me a moment, out of that amount $300,000 is appropriated for cutting a canal around the Cascades.

Mr. McMILLAN. That is one of the principal improvements in Oregon, and we increased the appropriation made in the House bill for that improvement, because we regarded it as a very important improvement and thought the amount allowed had not been in due proportion. We increased another improvement in Oregon, that of the Columbia River between Portland and the sea, for the improvement of the mouth of the river, and under those circumstances——

Mr. COCKRELL. Do I understand the Senator to say that the appropriation already made to this object is just as much as the engineer officers have recommended?

Mr. McMILLIN. The engineers say that the amount which can be profitably expended this year is $60,000; and the House bill contains that whole amount. There is no railroad completed to this point yet. The next session of Congress is but a few months hence. An appropriation will be made at that time if the circumstances then require it. Certainly the Senate should take these things into consideration, and I do not think this amendment should be allowed.

Mr. SLATER. If I can have the attention of the Senate for a few moments I should like to say a word in connection with this amendment.

The conditions which surround this bay are exceptional in this, that until recently no appropriations have been made for it. Two years ago an appropriation of $50,000 was made; last year an additional appropriation of $10,000. Since these improvements have been commenced a line of railroad is projected and under construction. Already the mountains which intervene between this bay and the Willamette Valley are being penetrated by tunnels; 6,000 tons of steel rails of foreign make now lie in warehouse at San Francisco, the duties upon which will be paid within the next sixty days at the newly created customs district at Yaquina Bay. The company will lay these rails within the next few months.

Now, it is but a small amount to ask that the very money this company is paying into the Treasury of the United States may be used to improve a harbor that in a few years is to become the outlet of a transcontinental railway line. The capital which is constructing this road is not Oregon capital, but eastern capital. The construction of this work is important, is necessary, and the demand for it is pressing and immediate.

It is true as Senators say that the bill gives all that the estimate made a year ago asked for this bay; but since that time——

Mr. McMILLAN. The estimates on which all the appropriations in the bill are based.

Mr. SLATER. I understand; but it is very common to increase the estimates where subsequent information is gained, as in this case, from the Department, which is now in the possession of my colleague, which shows that $140,000 is recommended by the Chief of Engineers. This, then, is below the proper estimate. The conditions and circumstances that existed a year ago, and that probably influenced the engineers in saying that $60,000 would be all that could be economically used, have very much changed. What was then shadowy and uncertain has now become fixed and certain. The fact that a railroad would be constructed was then not so definitely fixed as it is to-day. Now thousands of men are at work upon this railroad line; several thousands of tons of iron are in San Francisco awaiting early delivery for use upon it, and the work is rapidly progressing. Improvements have been made in the bay in the way of wharves and warehouses to receive this freight and other freight which is to follow within a few months.

So it will be seen that the importance of this increase is urgent and the conditions which surround this case have very important bearings.

The Senator from Minnesota says that Oregon has already $518,000 in the bill. That perhaps is very true, but the Senator forgets that the larger proportion of that is expended upon the northern border of Oregon, and that Washington Territory, Idaho Territory, and Montana Territory are equally interested in its expenditure. The opening of the Columbia River is not a mere local concern, but a matter of national importance. Through the pass through which the Columbia finds its way to the ocean within the next few months are to come two continental lines of railway, and the bearing the improvement of this river will have on those great lines is very important. I submit to the Senator that it is not quite just to undertake to charge the State of Oregon with improvements which have so wide and general an importance and relate to such a large traffic as is growing up there.

Again, sir, it is sometimes said—I do not know that the Senator said it in his argument just now—that the bill gives us all that we ought to have in consequence of our limited population.

Mr. McMILLAN. Oh, no; I made no such remark as that.

Mr. SLATER. Whether the Senator said it or not, it is an argument often used against us. I wish to call the attention of the Senate to the fact that last year the foreign commerce that went out from the Columbia River amounted to $8,000,000, and the coastwise commerce to $8,000,000 more. These facts ought to be remembered. The development in the commercial matters of the United States on that coast is very great, and in the immediate future I believe it will be very much greater than at present.

I hope the amendment will be allowed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from California, [Mr. FARLEY.]

Mr. McMILLAN called for the yeas and nays, and they were ordered.

Mr. GROVER. As the question of estimates has been mentioned, I will say that I addressed a letter to the Secretary of War upon the subject of the estimates for these improvements, and through him I have a letter which I desire to have read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The letter will be read.

The Acting Secretary read as follows:

OFFICE OF THE CHIEF OF ENGINEERS, UNITED STATES ARMY,
Washington, D. C., March 11, 1882.

SIR: I have the honor to acknowledge the reference to this office on the 7th instant of the letter of that date from the Hon. L. F. GROVER, United States Senate, requesting certain information in regard to the improvement of Yaquina Bay, Oregon, and to return the same with the following copy of a telegram received from Captain Charles F. Powell, Corps of Engineers, in reply to inquiry from this office, in whose views I concur:

"If sufficient appropriation be made south jetty, Yaquina Bay, can be completed to projected outer end in two years; with adequate appropriation available before April, present length of five hundred feet, an addition of two hundred feet, could be finished before July, or addition of one thousand feet in present calendar year. One hundred and forty thousand dollars can be prudently expended in next fiscal year provided that the work is to be continued. Do not recommend any appropriation to the prejudice of Cascade locks; latter is not experimental and is for direct benefit of present large increasing commerce, and where all work is now stopped for want of funds. That work merits the first and largest appropriation in Oregon. Result of works at Coos and Yaquina Bays will fix advisability of applying same at several similar coast entrances. That is their principal merit."

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

H. G. WRIGHT,
Chief of Engineers, Brigadier and Brevet Major General.

Hon. ROBERT T. LINCOLN, Secretary of War.

Mr. McMILLAN. I understand that to be a private letter addressed to a Senator, not a recommendation to Congress by the Secretary of War or the Chief of Engineers.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I have no doubt this is a very important point; but when the committee have given it all that the engineer in the annual estimates has said could be profitably expended during the next year, I do not feel at liberty to vote for it. I have always been partial to the improvements in Oregon ever since I had an opportunity of being out there, and I would gladly vote for this appropriation if there had been a different statement by the engineers, but by the argument of the Senator from Oregon himself the importance of this matter is to aid the construction of a railroad, not to give transportation to commerce at present, but to aid the construction of a railroad which is hereafter to be used as an instrument of transportation. I would gladly vote for any proper appropriation for the improvement of the harbors of Oregon; but I cannot do it in the face of the recommendation of the engineer.

Mr. SLATER. I desire to correct one statement of my friend from Delaware. This appropriation is not to aid a railroad, but it is simply to assist in improving a harbor that railroad has chosen as an outlet for a great commerce which is to come from the interior of the State.

The question being taken by yeas and nays, resulted—yeas 35, nays 22; as follows:

Mr. BUTLER. I move to amend on page 7, line 144, by striking out "three" and inserting "five;" so as to read:

Improving harbor at Charleston, (including Sullivan's Island,) South Carolina: Continuing improvement, $500,000.

In this connection I ask the Secretary to read a letter from General Gillmore, which I send to the desk.

The Acting Secretary read as follows:

WASHINGTON, D. C., March 23, 1882.

DEAR SIR: I regret very much that in consequence of there having been no session of the House Committee on Commerce this morning I am obliged to leave the city without doing any special service for the Charleston Harbor improvements. I leave this brief letter with you, hoping that it will be of some use before that committee.

The Charleston jetties have now reached a critical stage in the progress of their construction. The north jetty has been carried out to a length of 14,350 feet, with its full width, and with heights ranging from four feet to thirteen feet. The south jetty has a length of 9,500 feet, with heights of from three to four feet and in some places five feet.

Enough work has been put down to obstruct the flow and disturb the equilibrium in the channels without doing any good whatever. Indeed, the efforts thus far have been injurious, as was of course expected, because the outward scour which is beginning to take place between the jetties is too feeble to carry the sand beyond the crest of the bar into the deep water outside, for the simple reason that there is no concentration of water there, the south jetty not having reached that point by at least one mile. This condition of things will not change for the better, but will constantly get worse and worse until the south jetty has been extended about 6,000 feet and both jetties are built higher throughout their entire length.

In the mean time the south jetty, which now reaches entirely across the main ship channel, will obstruct and diminish the flow through the Pumpkin Hill Channel—the one used by all large vessels—and the navigation of that channel will be temporarily impaired.

It is of the greatest importance that this impending period of bad navigation should be made as short as possible, and the only way to secure this end is to push the work with the utmost vigor. I greatly fear that unless the whole amount of my last annual estimate, $750,000, is appropriated during the present session of Congress, there will be impaired navigation for a long period.

I sincerely trust that you will succeed in impressing the minds of the committee with the peculiar character of this case, and that the necessity for voting the entire amount, as asked for by the engineer in charge, will be apparent to all.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

Q. A. GILLMORE,
Lieutenant-Colonel Engineers, Brevet Major-General.

Hon. SAMUEL DIBBLE.

Mr. BUTLER. Now I ask the Secretary to read a brief extract from the annual report of Captain B. D. Greene, United States engineer in charge of the work.

The Acting Secretary read as follows:

The shores of Sullivan's Island are going away rapidly, and each year the sea is encroaching upon portions of the island that were once at a safe distance from the extreme high-water mark. The removal of the Bowman's jetty in part accounts for this, no doubt, and it is very probable that the north jetty on the bar may have increased the current of the tide in storms, and caused it to work with greater violence upon the shore.

Morris Island has been cut away on its eastern side some 500 feet, and in a short time the sea will undoubtedly break through the narrow strip of sand and marsh that remains. This action of the sea and currents is now going on more rapidly than ever, and should receive immediate attention.

The sand removed from these shores is deposited further up the harbor and shifts about, requiring constant provisions against the formation of shoals in the vicinity of exposed landings, as at Fort Sumter, and perhaps finally may work out toward the mouth of the harbor and have to be removed at considerable cost. It is true, here as on a river, that the preservation of the shores is an important step.

Mr. BUTLER. It will be seen, Mr. President, by the letter of General Gillmore written on the 25th of March last that the work so far has really been an injury to Charleston Harbor.

He says "enough work has been put down to obstruct the flow and disturb the equilibrium in the channels without doing any good whatever," and he urges this large appropriation in order that the work may be prosecuted with vigor, so that the south jetty may be extended 6,000 feet, as it will be if it is placed quite across what is known as ship channel, through which the vessels go in and come out. He has urged with very much more vigor than I can attempt to do the importance of having the whole of the estimate of $750,000. General Gillmore is very well known in the Senate as one of the most distinguished engineers of the United States Army, and I think his opinion is entitled to very great weight. In addition to that Captain Greene, another very distinguished officer of the Army, urges again and again that $750,000 should be appropriated.

Mr. ALLISON. May I ask the Senator how much has been expended on these two works?

Mr. BUTLER. The first appropriation was $250,000, and I think there has been two subsequent ones of $175,000 each.

Mr. ALLISON. Making in all about $600,000.

Mr. BUTLER. Making about $600,000. The north jetty is 14,000 feet long and the south jetty 9,600 feet.

Mr. ALLISON. I should like to ask the Senator about what the probable cost of this improvement will be?

Mr. BUTLER. My recollection is that General Gillmore's first estimate was $1,800,000.

Mr. ALLISON. The reason why I ask is because there have been about $700,000 appropriated already, and General Gillmore says there ought to be expended this year $750,000 more. Of course I feel favorable to this improvement, but I should like to ascertain, not with absolute accuracy but as nearly as may be, the total cost for the completion of the work.

Mr. BUTLER. That would make about $1,600,000. How much more it would take I really am not able to say, but I think the original estimate was $1,800,000.

Mr. ALLISON. I have ascertained in rather an indirect way that this harbor, when completed, will cost $2,750,000.

Mr. BUTLER. Perhaps the Senator has information which I have not been able to procure. I have not inquired on the subject lately and I do not know, but I only give what General Gillmore says of the importance of this appropriation. Of course it is for the Senate to say whether they will agree to it. General Gillmore says that he can use $750,000 advantageously during this fiscal year.

Mr. CONGER. I think perhaps the time has come when the Senate had better adopt some rule in regard to appropriations which they can rely upon with some safety in an appropriation like this. I denounce here on the floor of the Senate, as I have for years past, an officer of this Government sending letters to private individuals without the review of his chief, General Wright, without the review of the Secretary of War, writing to anybody what his estimate was and what he would like to have done, and asking Congress to act upon his recommendation.

We have a system of public improvements carried on with some kind of guard, with some kind of accuracy of report, with the review of some officers whom we know and in whom we have confidence. General Gillmore's report has been presented to the Chief Engineer, General Wright. It is through that medium, and that medium only, that General Gillmore has any business whatever to present a matter relating to the improvements of rivers and harbors to Congress or to the Senate.

Everybody knows that General Gillmore makes the largest recommendation of any officer in the engineer service. Liberality is no name for it. His ideas are grand, expansive. If there is a shoal out in the Atlantic Ocean fifty miles from land that he thinks he can get an appropriation for, he recommends an appropriation for it. He seeks the position, and he is rapidly attaining it, of expending more money than any other engineer in the corps. If any of his recommendations fails to receive the approval of his chief, if it fails to be recommended by the Secretary of War, then he is prepared with private letters to members of Congress to be read here without the approval of the chief of that Department. I do not believe it is any business of an engineer to send a communication in regard to the necessity and importance of a work in any other way than through the recognized channels of communication between Congress and the engineers scattered all over the country.

I make these remarks not because this has been used here, but because there is a continual attempt of subordinate officers, and even civil engineers, primed for the occasion, to commend themselves to those among whom they live by writing and sending communications unauthorized, improper, on subjects upon which they have no right to communicate to the Senate. If it was done in the regular Army about regular Army affairs, an officer doing it thus without passing it through the hands of his chief would be cashiered. If that will act as a warning in any way to the gentlemen who flood the Senate and who oppress the committees with their left-handed reports, I shall be very glad.

The recommendations of the engineers are sufficient without bringing in this private left-handed one. The harbor of Charleston, a harbor which, it has been said from time immemorial, was the most magnificient harbor on this continent, which has admitted the approach of the deepest draught vessels on the ocean, is all at once found to be inadequate to the commerce of that State, and what is done? There are shoals off into the ocean, almost to the Gulf stream, and the proposition here is, and it may be a just one, I do not say, for it never has been tried before, to build two lines of breakwater along these shoals out into the ocean, eight miles one of them; to confine the waters of the ocean itself and compel the stream to flow back and forth through the shoals. When was the necessity of that discovered? Not when there were the deep-draught war vessels going out and in and all over that region; not when the commerce of the country required access to Charleston Harbor, but now in these latter days to keep a sand island, Sullivan's Island, a sand-bar, from washing across the channel to prevent access to Charleston.

The experiment is a new one; the result an uncertain one. The engineers admit that. They are trying to see what the effect of two great dikes running in from the head of the island toward the ocean will be upon scouring out a deeper channel. It is a very good project. I myself was in favor of this when it was inaugurated in the House; I am in favor of carrying it out now. Three hundred thousand dollars is enough, with the $450,000 which has been expended on that harbor heretofore to test this experiment. All the work that can be done before Congress must pass another appropriation bill for rivers and harbors in the next session, if they do it at all, which is before the 4th of March, is there ready for use. It is a very liberal ratio of appropriation, far exceeding, I will venture to say, any other appropriation for any other work in these United States. Yet it is proposed now to increase it two-fifths, to make it $500,000.

Mr. BECK. What does General Wright recommend?

Mr. BUTLER. He recommends $750,000.

Mr. CONGER. General Wright says $750,000 will be necessary to complete the work. I can take the report of General Wright, and by putting in on the same strength of recommendation for this what he recommends for the other harbors in the United States it will make the bill over $73,000,000.

Mr. BUTLER. If it does not interrupt the Senator, I should like to ask him a question just at this particular juncture.

Mr. CONGER. I am here in favor of the Charleston Harbor, but opposed to the increase.

Mr. BUTLER. I was afraid the Senator would move to strike out the $300,000 before he got through, he has complained so much of General Gillmore writing private letters; but I do not know any law against an Army officer writing private letters to members of the House or the Senate; I do not know any violation of military discipline; I do not know any violation of propriety.

Mr. CONGER. I withdraw that suggestion; I do not wish to discuss it.

Mr. BUTLER. I think a gentleman has a perfect right to answer a letter if a Senator or Representative writes to him asking him for information.

Mr. CONGER. The Senator did not do that.

Mr. BUTLER. But my colleague in the House did. This letter is evidently in reply to an inquiry on the part of Mr. DIBBLE. However, I am not here to defend General Gillmore; he can take care of himself. But I see on page 11 of the bill, line 238, "improving harbor at Black Lake, Michigan, continuing operations," the appropriation is increased from $4,000 to $10,000. I see a little lower down an appropriation for "improving harbor at Frankfort, Michigan, continuing improvement," increased from $10,000 to $15,000. I see the appropriation for "improving harbors at Manistee, Michigan, continuing improvement," increased from $10,000 to $15,000. I see the following amendment, beginning in line 270:

Improving mouth and harbor of Cedar River, Michigan: Continuing improvement, $15,000.

That is an entirely new appropriation. Following that, the appropriation for "harbor of refuge at Portage Lake, Michigan, continuing improvement," is increased from $20,000 to $25,000; and the appropriation for "improving harbor at Saugatuck, Michigan, continuing improvement," is increased from $5,000 to $8,000. I should like the Senator to inform the Senate upon what data he procured the increase of appropriations to that large extent so far as Michigan is concerned.

Mr. CONGER. That is the argument ad hominem——

Mr. BUTLER. No, it is not an argument ad hominem; it is a direct point of inquiry to the Senator.

Mr. CONGER. I should have thought that the Senator from South Carolina would have felt a little mortification to rise here and compare the little appropriations of $2,000 and $3,000 to harbors which have nearly as much business to-day as Charleston.

Mr. BUTLER. Some of these appropriations are $15,000.

Mr. CONGER. They have nearly as much business as Charleston, which comes in here with $300,000, and an increase of $200,000 more is now proposed for that harbor. Let the Senator read the reports of the engineers, of the Secretary of War, and the engineer in charge of any of those improvements, and he will find that with the increase less than one-third of the recommendation has been provided here.

Mr. BUTLER. I think the Senator will find the same if he will put himself to the trouble of reading the report of the engineers as to Charleston Harbor.

Mr. CONGER. No, you do not find it. There is given to Charleston Harbor almost one-half of the estimate for completing the work. That is the difference. The appropriations that the Senator refers to are so small that I am almost ashamed that they were put in.

Mr. BUTLER. I am surprised that the Senator is not ashamed.

Mr. CONGER. It shows a small, weak kind of mind that will make up a little rise of from $5,000 to $7,000 in a great work, and I confess to a dereliction of duty in favor of the economy of this bill in making these little trifling appropriations in their increase.

Mr. BUTLER. The Senator is then surprised at his own moderation.

Mr. CONGER. I am.

Mr. BUTLER. I supposed so.

Mr. CONGER. Many and many a time when I have heard other Senators express their views about appropriations at home I have wondered what I was made of to ask so small an appropriation for such a State as Michigan, and I have thought sometimes that that feeling of contempt which we have for a man who peddles around with small things was gathering over me in the minds of my fellow Senators here because I asked these little things. It is better to be grand, to be magnificent, and to come down with hundreds of thousands and the half million dollars and be a man among men! I admit it.

Mr. BUTLER. The difference between the Senator and myself is that he not only takes up the hundred thousand but he comes in and gets the driblets besides. He is grand and insignificant at the same time.

Mr. CONGER. The gentleman will express his opinion of me by such an insignificant opinion as that?

Mr. BUTLER. I was only using the language of the Senator.

Mr. CONGER. I admire myself that kind of fortitude and bravery which will come in before the Senate in that way when a Senator knows that to increase all the appropriations on the very same kind of recommendation which he insists upon would swell this bill to $73,000,000 or $75,000,000. I must say I have admired and respected the hardihood of a Senator that would come in and ask for the millions at a time. It is worthy of the gentleman from South Carolina.

A small thing would be unworthy of him, like the $2,000, or $3,000, or $15,000, or $25,000 which some Senators propose, having a little regard to the expenditure of the public money, having a little regard for the safety of the bill, that ark in which is freighted the hope of all the navigators on all our waters, which may be wrecked by this careless extravagant mode of appropriation. It is well for the Senator to do it, but if the committee dared make the recommendations for increase on exactly the same recommendations of the engineers and of the Secretary of War, it would have swelled this bill not to seventy-three millions, as I have estimated it by a careful computation, but to $100,000,000.

I thank the Senator for calling the attention of the country to the little appropriations which the committee without a word of comment, from reading the reports of the engineers, thought in justice to the Government would be sufficient to be of some avail for those harbors on the coast of Michigan, and which they have seen fit almost without any argument to put into the bill.

For thirteen years in the House and here in the Senate I find that if anybody wants to justify himself in making the most extravagant demands of the Committee on Commerce for an increase of appropriations, and there is one word said by as humble a member of that committee as I am, he has ready written out, he has ready the pages and the lines in the reports of the engineers, and he shelters himself behind the action in regard to Michigan. Sir, the call of the people of Michigan in their pressure here for appropriations for the great national highways of the mighty lakes that run around that coast is moderate, is reasonable, is judicious; if I may say it without offense, it is sensible. There is nothing personal in the remark, but it is sensible. Michigan has 1,596 miles of navigable sea-coast.

Through Michigan runs that great channel of interstate commerce from Duluth to the Saint Lawrence. It has had large appropriations; it has them in this bill. Why? Because up and down that channel of commerce floats nearly one-half of the entire commerce of the United States. Over a million dollars was expended on the Saint Clair flats in Michigan, along the edge of the Canada line, in a far-off sunken region of the delta of the Saint Clair, with no inhabitants living in that neighborhood, unless the fisherman with his cabin upon piles in the marshes.

What is that to Michigan? Through that channel pass every day of the eight months of navigation between 275 and 300 vessels of an average tonnage of 500 tons. There are 48,000 passages of vessels in the course of a single season of eight months. Look on your map, gather your statistics; where else in this world is such an accumulation of vessels of that tonnage passing back and forth, with the freightage of half a continent? Nowhere, sir; in no river of Europe, in no harbor of the United States. Not one-third the number of vessels enter into and depart out of the harbor of New York, the greatest in this country. The Saint Clair flats improvement was built on Michigan marshes.

Take another instance. There is the Sault Sainte Marie Canal. It has had an appropriation of over a million dollars, and Hay Lake Channel $200,000, connecting the great lakes Superior and Michigan, connecting the great States of Wisconsin, Minnesota, Northern Iowa, the Territory of Dakota, and all through the Rocky Mountains in their commerce to the East and their supplies from the East. That was built on Michigan soil, on the Michigan side of the dividing waters of the Saint Mary's River, around its falls. It has cost a million and a quarter of dollars. What benefit was it to Michigan? There is a little hamlet there. It is no benefit to that immediate vicinity. It is a world-wide project, through which the products of the Old World reach to the New, developing the mighty regions of the West.

I say, and I say it now because there are so many of these taunts about Michigan appropriations from some of my friends here, that I think there should be some time when they should look at the East and see whether these are works for Michigan or whether they are works for the world and its commerce to travel upon through the soil of Michigan. Since we commenced the specific appropriation in 1869 until this time, strike out those works which are of great national importance and have no more immediate concern with the State of Michigan than with any other State bordering upon the great lakes or their waters flowing from them, and the State of Michigan, with almost sixteen hundred miles of sea-coast, with its harbors all around that coast for the benefit of all the rest of the States, sinks into insignificance in comparison with the appropriations that have been made for that worthy State which the Senator represents.

The zeal of the new convert is proverbial. "The zeal of thine house hath eaten me up." It was but within a few years that South Carolina utterly refused an appropriation for the improvement of her rivers and harbors, and that, if I mistake not, by the act of her own Legislature. While the Northern States were getting little appropriations, while they believed in internal improvements of rivers and harbors by the General Government, the State of South Carolina (and I say it not invidiously) and many of the other Southern States, through their representatives here, denied from day to day and from year to year the right of the Government to appropriate anything for their great harbors.

It was not until 1869, when a bill was passed making specific appropriations for the rivers and harbors of the United States, and when the Committee on Commerce of the House notified members from States and notified members who believed that there was no constitutional right to make internal improvements that they must wait until the voice of their State was heard, through themselves or through other representatives, admitting both the constitutionality and the propriety of carrying on these works, that appropriations were made at all.

That conversion I have noticed from year to year. The conversion of the State-rights men, the conversion of those men who clung to the old reading of the Constitution, their conversion from believing and asserting and voting that the General Government had no right and no power to improve their harbors, to this brief time in ten years when they come, and, like the daughters of the horse-leech, cry continually "Give, give!" is wonderful. I am glad that it is so. I believe that this great Government should open the channels of communication, open its water-ways, and open its harbors and build its light-houses and establish its life-saving stations and send out its revenue-marine vessels to relieve the shipwrecked mariner and save the ship where possible. I think that is the duty of this Government. It has come to be considered so now, but it is only within a very few years.

Mr. JONES, of Florida. Will the Senator permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. CONGER. Yes; but you are interrupting some very nice remarks.

Mr. JONES, of Florida. I ask the Senator if some of the most important appropriations for public improvements in Michigan were not obtained under the auspices of General Cass?

Mr. CONGER. General Cass was a strict constructionist. His political friends who recollect the invitation sent to him at the Chicago convention to take part in a plan for improving the great waterways of navigable waters in the United States cannot fail to remember that his friends besought him to take that opportunity to link himself with the internal improvements of the country, and they cannot have forgotten, for it has been stamped upon their memory, and reiterated in their ears, and shown to their eyes thousands and thousands of times since then, that he sent a little two-by-four note saying that business engagements prevented his being present at that convention.

Mr. JONES, of Florida. Were there not very liberal appropriations made in the river and harbor bills when he was here?

Mr. CONGER. No, there were not. There were a few paltry appropriations got through in spite of General Cass and in spite of that little two-by-four Chicago letter of his. General Cass went down on that letter. It was too weak to support him. It had not surface enough to float the magnificent gentleman he was. He went down as other men have gone down and as other men will go down whenever they place themselves in opposition to the theoretical and constitutional power of this Government to take charge of its navigable waters and its harbors and its light-houses and its life-saving stations. They may go down for their opposition; they may go down for their extravagant demands.

I do not know that I care what the Senate does with this appropriation bill if the process be continued of increasing by a vote and a sudden appeal to the body one and another and another of these appropriations beyond what both the committee of the House and the committee of the Senate have thought to be a safe, prudent disposition of the whole amount which ought to be appropriated, distributing it with a care and an anxiety, I might say, for justice, and for right, and for proper regard of the interests of all the States without regard to any sectional feeling.

I am more liberal, as I believe, and assert the fact to be within the last ten years, than those converted brethren who opposed formerly any appropriation at all and have now changed their constitutional views and run in the front of all these demands for appropriation; but there comes a time when if the House and the Senate cannot trust a Committee of Commerce to take the report of the engineers, in three great volumes equal to three great family Bibles, and examine every single report of the Secretary of War, the Chief of Engineers, the engineer in charge of the works, and every civil engineer, running through the appendices of three volumes—if they cannot trust those whom they have selected in the two Houses to do justice and fairness to all parts of the country, they had better discharge that committee and get a new one; and the new committee will have the same trouble.

There must be some judicious division of the amount necessary to complete a work and the amount suitable to be appropriated in any given year.

I wish this Government had the means and the power—it may have the power—that Senators and Representatives might feel that they could appropriate larger appropriations for these works; but there has been no such bill as this passed through Congress from the beginning of the Government until now. Mr. Polk vetoed a bill giving $1,900,000 for all these objects because it was an extravagant appropriation. At that time the feeling was so strong for the improvement of rivers and harbors that both the Senate and the House passed the bill over the veto of the President. It appropriated $1,900,000.

Two or three Senators can combine here now and demand $1,900,000; $300,000 here and $500,000 there. How it would shock the old constructionists if they could rise up from their graves and see their successors stand up here and instead of defining the construction of the Constitution as their old leaders did, rushing with headlong haste to gather into an appropriation bill by hundreds of thousands for States whose Legislatures utterly ignored and refused to recognize any right in the General Government to make any appropriation at all, even for the greatest of the navigable waters of the United States.

We might give a very serious and fair consideration of this bill without doing wrong to any one or violating the rights of any State. I say that those three great volumes of reports of the engineers, with a minute, carefully-guarded estimate, first made by the local engineer in charge, a survey and estimate reviewed by the engineer of that department, then reviewed by General Wright, a careful, prudent man, and sent with the recommendation of the Secretary of War, ought to be some guide to Senators and Representatives in Congress when a committee of the two Houses have given an examination.

I think it will be said no man not a member of that committee has given to this work, either in part or in whole, the same attention. They have divided up the appropriations which it is thought proper to embrace in a bill, in such a way as to endeavor at least—for I believe that has been the object of the committee in the House, and I know with what scrupulous diligence the members of the Committee on Commerce in the Senate have gone through this bill and turned to every page, and read aloud for the information of the committee every word that bore upon every appropriation made here—I say I may safely say that the committee of the Senate have endeavored, ay, they have succeeded in giving to this subject such careful, minute, accurate consideration that I do not believe it is in the power of men as a body to understand from their occasional perusal of works in which they are interested alone how difficult it has been to do justice to all the great interests of commerce in the United States, and to do it any better—I will not say do it as well—than the two committees which have had charge of this matter in the House and in the Senate.

If the opinion of the committee and its action has no weight here, if we are to come in here and frame a bill by amendment and by motion, if it is to be log-rolled through, if one might say so, because one desires an appropriation and another desires another appropriation, (and I say that in no invidious sense, but as such things generally strike Senators,) we should have a bill five times the magnitude of the one now before the Senate.

Sir, if this bill becomes a law there are in many parts of the country but three or four months of working time before either they will be locked with ice or for other reasons the work must be discontinued until another season. Before that time another appropriation bill must be passed, if passed at all, for the rivers and harbors, before the 4th of March next. Before the season opens for work upon a large portion of these rivers and these harbors there must necessarily, if there is any appropriation at all, be an appropriation bill passed, and in this river and harbor bill the appropriations take effect immediately upon the passage of the bill. There is no fiscal year known in the bill; the moment the bill passes here the money becomes liable to be drawn and used for any of these works.

I submit to the Senate in all candor, (and I say it on this question because it is as good a subject to speak about it upon as any of the hundreds of others that may be coming,) is it not better to trust to the judgment of a Committee on Commerce, although they may not have been wise, although they may not have been entirely discreet, than the side reports, the left-handed reports, of engineers who have no business to report except through their chiefs, and whose reports have in all other cases the review of the Chief of Engineers and the Secretary of War?

I desire that this appropriation, or a sufficient appropriation to complete Charleston Harbor shall be made by Congress from time to time as the size of the bill and the demands of the rest of the country shall warrant. If there is any place within our domain where I would desire the fostering hand of this Government to be extended to the relief of its citizens and its commerce and to build them up and make them love the land to which they belong, and let them feel that this Union and this Government is a fostering and a protecting Government, it is to the Senator's own fallen State of South Carolina.

Without referring to the past unkindly, who does not know that but for the opposition of that State even to the internal improvement bill, who does not know that but for the opposition of that State to the paternal Government to which it belonged, who does not know that if the Senators from South Carolina and their Representatives in years that are past had joined their fortunes with their brethren throughout all this land in developing its vast natural resources, it would have been the pride of the world to-day, as it was in former years? So, for that and for any other region of the South, if by my vote, by my effort, by my labor here, I can help them in any manner to build up their waste places, if I can help them to take the rank which they deserve as States overflowing with mineral wealth, overflowing with forest wealth, overflowing with agricultural productions, and make them a part of this grand, glorious country of ours, the equal in progress, in enterprise, in commerce, I would do it as much for any Southern State as for my own beautiful State that sleeps serenely among the great lakes of the North. I am actuated by no opposition to this improvement; my purpose is to call the attention of the Senate to the fact that there must be some limit to the size of this appropriation bill, and that when we have done liberally by any public work, and when we have given $300,000 for this work, with the $500,000 already on hand or expended there, we have done far better by it than by a great many of the works in other States.

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. President, I was not aware, when I very unostentatiously, and as I thought very properly, offered an amendment to the river and harbor bill to increase an appropriation, that I was going to bring down on my head and on the heads of the people I represent the maledictions of the Senator from Michigan. An amendment had just been adopted by the Senate increasing an appropriation for the State of Oregon, and I thought I had a right, under the rules of the Senate, to move an amendment to increase the appropriation for Charleston Harbor. That was all; and when the Senator came at me so furiously and violently, and constituted himself into such a complete scold, sneering, gnashing his teeth as he did, I began to ask myself if I had not committed some great crime, either against him or the State of Michigan, or the Committee on Commerce.

I have very great respect for the Committee on Commerce, but I must say, after this last manifestation by one of its members, if the other members of that committee are as reckless in their statements, as incorrect in their geographies, as erroneous in their facts, as wild in their propositions, I rather agree with the Senator that they had better be discharged; I think he is entirely right. While I have great respect for that committee, I do not know any law which requires me to subordinate my own judgment to theirs absolutely.

The Senator has criticised General Gillmore very severely. He says that of all the officers of the Engineer Corps he is the most exaggerated in his demands upon the Treasury, and that he has concocted a scheme for the improvement of Charleston Harbor which will not succeed. That is the idea of the Senator. He says that Sullivan's Island is a sand bar; that this thing is only intended to scour out a sand bar; and that in former years vessels of the heaviest draught got into that harbor without trouble, and now it has been discovered that there ought to be a great improvement.

I will leave that matter between the Senator and General Gillmore. I had nothing whatever to do with the suggestion of the scheme for the improvement of that harbor, and I believe I prefer to take the judgment of General Gillmore on that subject to that of the Senator from Michigan.

As to General Gillmore writing private letters to a member of Congress, as I stated a while ago, I do not know that there is any crime in that. I say this much for him, that in all of his efforts to improve not only Charleston Harbor but all the other harbors and rivers within the jurisdiction that has been assigned to him, I have discovered the most disinterested, honest purpose, not only to expend the money of the Government economically and prudently, but in a way which would be for the best interests of this whole country. I think the strictures of the Senator from Michigan are especially undeserved. As to whether this scheme for the improvement of Charleston Harbor will be a success, I leave that to the judgment of General Gillmore and to the judgment of General Wright. General Gillmore suggested it to the Chief of Engineers, and he concurred in it. He recommends $750,000, and General Wright concurs in it.

I shall not notice the harangue of the Senator, for it was nothing but an harangue, a speech made for home consumption, which everybody understands perfectly well, and I am rather glad I have given the Senator an opportunity to make a speech which he can send home to his constituents, in which he lauds his own State and abuses every other. I shall not reply, because I do not think that style of debate is at all fit for this body. I have simply exercised a right which I thought I had.

When I propounded an inquiry as to how it happened that the increase for Michigan was so striking, it seemed to have offended the Senator in the grossest possible manner, and he adopted a sort of cuttle-fish argument and rushed off to discuss something else instead of answering my question.

I made no complaint about the increase for Michigan. I have no doubt it is a very great State and I have no doubt it deserves every dollar it has got in this appropriation bill; but I simply wanted to know how the coincidence was; how it happened that he, being a member of the committee, should have increased almost every appropriation for the State of Michigan, in one case from $50,000 to $75,000, when the estimates of the engineer were only $100,000. I simply asked how that was, not with a view of complaining of it.

I think perhaps it is perfectly natural that Michigan, North Carolina, Texas, Missouri, and those States represented on that committee should be better taken care of than the rest of us, but I do not understand that it should be a cause of such grave offense and that the Senator should get up and scold and sneer at everybody else, simply because a civil and polite inquiry is propounded to him.

As I said awhile ago, I do not intend to be betrayed into a discussion about the various matters the Senator has injected into his remarks, because they have nothing to do with the question before the Senate. Whether the Southern States were opposed to appropriations for internal improvements is one thing; but the Senator is wrong there. If I have read the history of this country correctly, the first appropriation was made in 1824, and it has been continued from year to year and year to year. There is no doubt about the fact that Senators and Representatives did oppose appropriations for internal improvements, and I think it is a fact that my predecessor and namesake on this floor did vote against an appropriation for Charleston harbor.

I will correct the Senator in another particular. He says that in 1869 these appropriations were first begun. The Senator certainly is not well informed, although I believe he has been in the lower House of Congress for a long while.

Mr. CONGER. I said the appropriations for specific purposes. Before that time large appropriations were made in bulk and allotted by the Secretary of War to the different rivers and harbors. I spoke of the present system.

Mr. BUTLER. The first appropriation made for Charleston Harbor was made in 1877, after I came into the Senate. But that is on a par with most of the statements made by the Senator with reference to Charleston and Charleston Harbor, and the appropriations for that part of the country. I shall not, as I said, engage in a debate with him upon the subject. If the Senate sees fit to vote down this amendment, I shall be perfectly content. I have not complained that Charleston Harbor has not procured her share of this appropriation, if that is to be the guide, if it is to be shared out. I have not complained. I simply ask that the appropriation be increased from $400,000 to $500,000, and I had a letter from General Gillmore read and an extract from Captain Green's letter, the officer immediately in charge.

If the Senate choose to vote down the amendment I shall be perfectly content.

I wish to say finally that I have not the slightest objection to the increases made for the State of Michigan, and I am sorry the Senator could not answer me and give the reasons why they were made when I propounded the inquiry to him.

Mr. CONGER. If the Senator will allow me, I did state the reasons. I said that each of those appropriations made by the House was less than one-fourth the amount recommended by the engineers, and as they are now arranged they come to about one-third. That is why the increase was made.

Mr. BUTLER. I see in the bill at line 251, "Harbor of refuge at Lake Huron, Michigan; continuing operations, $50,000," as it came from the House. That is increased by the Senate Committee on Commerce to "$75,000," of which "$25,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, may be used in dredging the bar in the middle of the harbor." If I am not mistaken the engineer recommends in his report the sum of $100,000, and yet the Senator says that only one-fourth of the estimates has been given to Michigan.

Mr. CONGER. The Senator is mistaken. The report of General Weitzel, who has charge of that work, recommended $25,000 to be appropriated for dredging the bar in the middle of the harbor, and the committee put it in.

Mr. BUTLER. He recommends $100,000, and yet $75,000, and $25,000 by the amendment of the Senator from Michigan in the Committee on Commerce is given for dredging the bar in the middle of the harbor, which is the full amount he asks.

Mr. CONGER. Because the necessity for this larger improvement is that large steamers went aground and damaged themselves.

Mr. BUTLER. That is neither here nor there. I do not care about reasons for it; I am only stating a fact which the Senator has not denied, and which he cannot deny, according to the record. I shall be perfectly content, as I said a while ago, with a vote of the Senate upon my amendment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from South Carolina, [Mr. BUTLER.]

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. HARRISON. I am instructed by the Committee on Transportation Routes to the Seaboard to propose an amendment which was referred to the Committee on Commerce several days ago. I ask that it be read.

The ACTING SECRETARY. After line 139 of the bill it is proposed to insert:

That the sum of $20,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, be, and the same is hereby, appropriated, to be expended under the direction of the Secretary of War, in completing the surveys of a ship-canal to connect the Chesapeake and Delaware Bays; and the Secretary of War is hereby directed to report to Congress which of the various routes surveyed will afford the greatest protection in case of war and the greatest facilities to commerce by cheapening the cost of transportation from the city of Baltimore to the Atlantic Ocean, together with the cost of said improvement and its approaches, and the annual cost of maintaining and operating said canal when constructed.

Mr. HARRISON. The reading of the amendment perhaps conveys all the information necessary to members of the Senate. A proposal for the construction of a ship-canal to connect the Delaware and Chesapeake Bays was presented to the Committee on Transportation Routes to the Seaboard, and was very strongly urged by a delegation of the commercial bodies of Baltimore during this session. The committee did not feel ready to report either of the bills that were submitted at the present session. As one member of that committee, I have no doubt that the work proposed is one of great importance. It proposes to save a distance of about two hundred miles in the coastwise traffic from Baltimore eastward, and also in the passage of European vessels from that port.

It is proposed to take the canal across the isthmus coming into the Delaware Bay just inside the Delaware Breakwater, to make it a tide-water canal capable of passing ocean-going vessels.

As I was saying, the committee did not feel ready, with the information they had with reference to it and for other reasons, one of which was influential in my mind, to recommend the construction of the canal now. The revenues of the country are not yet settled. We are in a transition period, as every one seems to recognize, in relation to our public revenues. It is not unlikely that a large reduction will be made by legislation now before Congress at this session, and it is more than probable that at the next session a still larger reduction will be made, and, for one, I was not willing to be fully committed to the construction of such works as this until our revenues were settled upon a basis that we might intelligently calculate as to what surplus we were to have for such improvements as this. But the committee have felt that there was additional information needed with reference to the choice between the routes. There are several routes proposed, ranging from perhaps sixteen miles, the shortest in length, to fifty, and while there have been reports and surveys upon them, yet the Engineer Department has not expressed a decided preference or choice between these routes.

We have therefore recommended this appropriation for completing the necessary surveys and enabling the Engineer Department to report at the next session of Congress which, in the opinion of the engineers, is the best route to be selected if Congress shall undertake to build this canal. I therefore propose this amendment, and hope it will be adopted.

Mr. MCMILLAN. I suggest to the Senator from Maryland whether the amount named is necessary or not for the work.

Mr. GORMAN. I will state that, in my judgment, it will not probably require $20,000. I think the report can be made and all the information gathered together for a less amount than $20,000; but as I understand——

Mr. McMILLAN. I do not know of any point of order.

Mr. JONES, of Florida. I suggest to the Senator to insert "or so much thereof as may be necessary."

Mr. RANSOM. It reads so.

Mr. McMILLAN. If I could raise any point of order I should be compelled to do so.

The PRESIEDNT pro tempore. The question is on the adoption of the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MORGAN. I wish to reserve a vote in the Senate on the amendment just adopted.

Mr. HARRISON. I offer the following amendment:

On page 33, line 800, strike out all after the word "river" down to and including line 852, on page 36, and insert:

"Continuing observations and surveys for reservoirs at the headwaters of the Mississippi River and its upper tributaries, under the direction of the Secretary of War, $50,000."

Mr. PLATT. What is stricken out?

Mr. HOAR. I reserve the right to make any point of order.

Mr. HARRISON. The appropriation of $300,000. I desire to say a few words upon the amendment. In this connection I wish to bring to the attention of the Senate the reports of some engineers on this question. As it will perhaps occupy fifteen or twenty minutes to do it, I make this announcement at the beginning, so that I may learn whether it is the pleasure of the Senate that they shall sit so long. ["Oh, yes!"] When the Mississippi River commission was constituted it was made part of its duty——

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. Would the Senator prefer to go on to-morrow morning?

Mr. HARRISON. I would just as soon do so.

Mr. McMILLAN. I think we had better finish the bill to-night. We ought to have this bill disposed of; it has been under consideration now four days. It is only five o'clock.

Mr. HARRISON. I think the Senate had probably as well understand that this discussion will very likely occupy an hour.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. Probably more than an hour.

Mr. INGALLS. It is important that there should be an executive session.

Mr. McMILLAN. I move to take a recess until eight o'clock. ["No!" "No!"]

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The motion to go into executive session is first in order.

Mr. HOAR. It is the 10th of July. I do not think there has been such absolute apathy and indifference toward finishing important business on the part of gentlemen having charge of bills as is exhibited now.

Mr. ALLISON. I do not think that apathy has been manifested on this bill.

Mr. McMILLAN. I submitted a motion that we take a recess until eight o'clock. ["No!" "No!"]

Mr. CAMERON, of Pennsylvania. I move to adjourn.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Kansas has moved an executive session.

Mr. CAMERON, of Pennsylvania. I move that the Senate adjourn.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. A motion to adjourn is made, which has precedence.

Mr. McMILLAN. I wish to amend that motion.

Several SENATORS. You cannot.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. A motion to adjourn takes precedence to everything.

Mr. McMILLAN. I want the yeas and nays on that. ["Division!"] We are here now in midsummer; this bill has been under discussion for four days, and if we are going to remain here all summer we had better know it.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. The members of the Committee on Commerce have occupied a great portion of the time in discussing the bill.

Mr. McMILLAN. So far as I am concerned, I have occupied no time of the Senate that could possibly have been avoided.

Mr. MORGAN. I object to debate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The motion is not debatable.

Mr. McMILLAN. I call for the yeas and nays.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The yeas and nays are called for on the motion to adjourn.

The yeas and nays were ordered; and being taken, resulted—yeas 33, nays 35; as follows:

YEAS—33.

Bayard,	Cockrell,	Johnston,	Pugh,
Beck,	Davis of West Va.,	Jonas,	Saulsbury,
Blair,	Gorman,	Jones of Florida,	Slater,
Brown,	Grover,	Jones of Nevada,	Voorhees,
Butler,	Hampton,	Lamar,	Williams,
Call,	Harrison,	Lapham,	Windom.
Camden,	Hawley,	Miller of Cal.,
Cameron of Pa.,	Ingalls,	Morgan,
Cameron of Wis.,	Jackson,	Pendleton,

NAYS—35.

Aldrich,	Ferry,	McDill,	Ransom,
Allison,	Frye,	McMillan,	Rollins,
Anthony,	Garland,	Mahone,	Saunders,
Chilcott,	George,	Maxey,	Sherman,
Coke,	Groome,	Miller of N. Y.,	Vance,
Conger,	Harris,	Mitchell,	Van Wyck,
Davis of Illinois,	Hill of Colorado,	Morrill,	Vest,
Dawes,	Hoar,	Platt,	Walker.
Farley,	Kellogg,	Plumb,

ABSENT—8.

Edmunds,	Hale,	Logan,	Sawyer,
Fair,	Hill of Georgia,	McPherson,	Sewell.

So the Senate refused to adjourn.

Mr. INGALLS. I move to proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. McMILLAN. I move to take a recess until eight o'clock.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The motion for a recess takes precedence.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. I suggest that we go on with the bill.

Mr. McMILLAN. I am willing to go on. I prefer to go on if that suits the Senate. Let us go till six o'clock anyhow.

Mr. ANTHONY. I hope we shall go on until we finish the bill. Of all the contrivances of wasteful economy, this taking a recess is the worst. We go away, stay about an hour and a half or two hours, and then come back and transact in some hours business that we could do in a few minutes if we kept right at it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The motion is not subject to debate.

Mr. McMILLAN. If the Senate will proceed with the bill, I withdraw the motion for a recess.

Mr. VOORHEES. I suggest to the Senator from Rhode Island that this is the hottest day known to Washington for years. I think it would be more conducive to health and pleasure for us not to come back here until nine o'clock to-night. [Laughter.]

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the motion to take a recess until 8 o'clock.

Mr. McMILLAN. I have withdrawn that motion.

Mr. INGALLS. That motion being withdrawn, I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. SAUNDERS. Will the Senator from Kansas allow me——

Mr. McMILLAN. I object. Let this motion be disposed of.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is moved that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. McMILLAN. I ask for the yeas and nays on that motion.

Mr. HARRIS. I suggest that we take a division.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Will not the Senator from Minnesota be satisfied with a division?

Mr. McMILLAN. Let us have the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. ALLISON. Before the yeas and nays are taken, may I make a suggestion with reference to this bill to the Senator from Minnesota?

Mr. McMILLAN. Yes, sir.

Mr. ALLISON. It is perfectly manifest that we cannot finish this bill to-night. The Senator from Indiana [Mr. HARRISON] wants twenty minutes on some amendment, and some other gentleman may want twenty minutes or some time longer in reply. Now I suggest that to-morrow morning we go on with this bill, and after one hour we confine debate on the bill to five minutes by each Senator.

Mr. McMILLAN. And take the vote.

Mr. ALLISON. And complete the bill to-morrow.

Mr. INGALLS. Why not meet at eleven o'clock to-morrow? ["No!" "No!"]

Mr. WINDOM. I only want to add to the suggestion of the Senator from Iowa that the Senate adjourn to meet at eleven o'clock to-morrow, and we can do more in one hour then than we shall in three to-night.

Mr. COCKRELL. We have our committee meetings in the morning. There is no earthly necessity for pressing this bill. There is no other appropriation bill ready, and there cannot be one for two or three days—not one ready to report, and no more have been passed by the House yet.

Mr. SHERMAN. The revenue bill is ready.

Mr. COCKRELL. We can meet at twelve o'clock and dispose of this bill to-morrow.

Mr. ALLISON. I ask unanimous consent that we meet to-morrow morning at eleven o'clock, and after one hour's general debate the debate on this bill and the amendments to it shall be confined to five minutes.

Mr. VOORHEES. What is the hurry of meeting at eleven o'clock to-morrow?

Mr. ALLISON. Very well; I will waive that part of the suggestion.

Mr. VOORHEES. There is no appropriation bill ready.

Mr. ALLISON. I withdraw that part of the suggestion. I suggest that we meet at twelve o'clock to-morrow and proceed with this bill immediately after the ordinary morning business, and that after one hour all debate on this bill and amendments to it shall be confined to five minutes under what is known as the five-minute rule.

Mr. JONES, of Florida. Why limit it to an hour?

Mr. ALLISON. Because the Senator from Indiana has the floor and wants twenty minutes and somebody may want to reply to him.

Mr. JONES, of Florida. And you cut everybody else off to five minutes.

Mr. ALLISON. No.

Mr. HARRISON. I want to consent to any arrangement that will facilitate the progress of this bill, and I certainly do not want to make a long speech myself. If it is important to present this question at all, it is important to present it so that the Senate may understand it properly.

Several Senators addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Massachusetts reserved the right to make a point of order upon the amendment offered by the Senator from Indiana.

Mr. BROWN. I offer an amendment to the river and harbor bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. There is an amendment pending.

Mr. BROWN. My amendment is to line 1015 and I ask that it may be referred to the Committee on Commerce.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It will be received and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. INGALLS. What has become of my motion?

Mr. HARRISON. The Senator from Massachusetts reserved the point of order; but I have the floor upon the amendment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. But he can raise the point of order at any time. It is moved that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business, on which the yeas and nays have been ordered.

Mr. ALLISON. Before that motion is put, I ask unanimous consent that we have some understanding about this bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair has been receiving this talk by way of class meeting more than anything else.

Mr. ALLISON. I suggest to the Senator from Minnesota that to-morrow morning we begin this bill immediately after the morning routine business, and finish it to-morrow under the five-minute rule, after one hour of unlimited debate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does any Senator object to that?

Mr. MORGAN. I object.

Mr. BECK. I object.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. You cannot in this meeting do anything that anybody objects to.

Mr. INGALLS. I ask for a vote on my motion.

Mr. McMILLAN. I hope the Senate will proceed with the bill this evening.

Mr. INGALLS. I ask for a vote on my motion.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The yeas and nays have been ordered upon the motion of the Senator from Kansas that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. HALE. Pending that, I move that the Senate adjourn.

Mr. McMILLAN. Upon that I ask for the yeas and nays.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the motion to adjourn.

Mr. McMILLAN. There has been no motion submitted to the Senate since the Senate decided not to adjourn.

Mr. INGALLS. Certainly there has.

Mr. HARRIS. I should like to know who has the floor.

Mr. JONES, of Florida. A motion to adjourn is always in order.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. There has been business transacted since the last motion to adjourn.

Mr. HALE. I understand there is business in executive session that needs attention, and I withdraw my motion to adjourn.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is moved that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business, on which the yeas and yeas have been ordered.

The question being taken by yeas and nays, resulted—yeas 37, nays 29; as follows:

Mr. McMILLAN. Now, I desire to give notice to the Senate that I will ask the Senate to-morrow to sit until this bill is disposed of, and I hope they will co-operate in that. I move that the Senate adjourn.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Will the Senator wait until some House bills are referred?

Mr. McMILLAN. Certainly.

HOUSE BILLS REFERRED.

The bill (H. R. No. 2402) to quiet title to certain land in Washington, District of Columbia, and the bill (H. R. No. 6702) to authorize the transfer of the property of the National Soldiers' and Sailors' Orphan Home to the Garfield Memorial Hospital, were severally read twice by their titles, and referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

TERRITORY OF PEMBINA.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Minnesota moves that the Senate adjourn.

Mr. SAUNDERS. Before that motion is put I ask the Chair to lay before the Senate the unfinished business.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will lay before the Senate the unfinished business, which is the bill (S. No. 2114) establishing the Territory of Pembina and providing a temporary government therefor. It is moved that the Senate adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and (at five o'clock and forty minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

MONDAY, July 10, 1882.

The House met at eleven o'clock a. m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. F. D. POWER.

The Journal of Saturday's proceedings was read and approved.

Mr. HISCOCK. I call for the regular order.

NATIONAL BANKING ASSOCIATIONS.

Mr. CRAPO. I ask for the consideration of a privileged report; the report of the committee of conference on the bill (H. R. No. 4167) to enable national banking associations to extend their corporate existence.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Massachusetts calls up the report of the conference committee on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the bill to enable national banking associations to extend their corporate existence. The report has been printed in the RECORD, and also the bill with the amendments as reported by the committee of conference. The gentleman from Massachusetts now submits a statement accompanying the report, which the Clerk will read.

The report of the committee of conference is as follows:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. No. 4167) to enable national banking associations to extend their corporate existence, having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend, and do recommend, to their respective Houses, as follows:

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendments of the Senate numbered 10, 15, 16, 17, 18, 22, and 23, and agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 7, and agree to the same, with an amendment, as follows: Page 6, strike out all after "provided," in line 24, down to and including "by," in line 25, and insert after "provided," in line 24, "herein;" and insert after "notes," in line 25, "shall be issued as provided by this act."

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 14, and agree to the same, with an amendment as follows: Page 7, strike out section 8, and insert:

"SEC. 8. That national banks now organized, or hereafter organized, having a capital of $150,000 or less, shall not be required to keep on deposit or deposit with the Treasurer of the United States United States bonds in excess of one-fourth of their capital stock as security for their circulating notes; but such banks shall keep on deposit or deposit with the Treasurer of the United States the amount of bonds as herein required. And such of those banks having on deposit bonds in excess of that amount are authorized to reduce their circulation by the deposit of lawful money as provided by law: Provided, That the amount of such circulating notes shall not in any case exceed 90 per cent. of the par value of the bonds deposited as herein provided: Provided further, That all national banks which shall hereafter make deposits of lawful money for the retirement in full of their circulation shall at the time of their deposit be assessed for the cost of transporting and redeeming their notes then outstanding, a sum equal to the average cost of the redemption of national-bank notes during the preceding year, and shall thereupon pay such assessment. And all national banks which have heretofore made or shall hereafter make deposits of lawful money for the reduction of their circulation shall be assessed and shall pay an assessment in the manner specified in section 3 of the act approved June 20, 1874, for the cost of transporting and redeeming their notes redeemed from such deposits subsequent to June 30, 1881."

And the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 19, and agree to the same, with an amendment as follows: Page 9, strike out all after "purpose," in line 13, down to and including line 19, and insert: "And provided further, That the provisions of this section shall not apply to bonds called for redemption by the Secretary of the Treasury, nor to the withdrawal of circulating notes in consequence thereof;" and the Senate agree to the same.

WM. W. CRAPO,
NELSON DINGLEY, JR.,
A. H. BUCKNER,
Managers on the part of the House.

WM. B. ALLISON,
JUSTIN S. MORRILL,
JAMES B. BECK,
Managers on the part of the Senate.

The Clerk read the statement accompanying the report, as follows:

Statement in explanation of the report of the conferees on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to House bill No. 4167, to enable national banking associations to extend their corporate existence.

There were ten amendments before the conference. They recommend that the House recede from seven wholly, and from three with amendments.

The effect, in detail, upon the amendments, if the report is adopted, will be as follows:

On amendment numbered 7: It provides that at the end of three years from the date of the extension of a bank charter, the bank having deposited with the Treasurer lawful money sufficient to redeem the remainder of its circulation then outstanding, new circulating notes shall be issued.

On amendment numbered 10: It strikes out the provision respecting the costs incident to the substitution of new circulating notes in place of the old notes.

On amendment numbered 14: It enables national banks having a capital of $150,000 or less to deposit as security for circulating notes United States bonds not less in amount than one-fourth of their capital stock and requires this minimum amount of Government bonds to be held by the banks. It provides that the amount of bank notes shall not in any case exceed 90 per cent. of the par value of the bonds deposited, and provides for the payment by the banks retiring their circulation of the cost of redeeming and transporting their notes.

On amendment numbered 15: It inserts the word "entitled" in order to perfect the phraseology.

On amendment numbered 16: It strikes out the notice of ninety days of the bank's intention to deposit lawful money and withdraw its circulation.

On amendment numbered 17: It provides that a national bank making deposit of lawful money in order to withdraw its circulation shall not be entitled to receive any increase of circulation for the period of six months from the time of such deposit.

On amendment numbered 18: It provides that not more than $3,000,000 instead of $5,000,000 of lawful money shall be deposited during any calendar month for the purpose of withdrawing bonds which secure circulation.

On amendment numbered 19: It provides that the $3,000,000 per month for the retirement of circulation shall not apply to bonds called for redemption by the Secretary of the Treasury; nor to the withdrawal of circulating notes in consequence thereof.

On amendment numbered 22: It directs the Secretary of the Treasury to receive deposits of gold coin, and to issue certificates therefor in denominations of not less than $20 each. It provides that said certificates shall be receivable for customs taxes and public dues, and when so received may be reissued; that such gold certificates, as also silver certificates, held by national banks shall be counted as part of its lawful reserve; and that no national bank shall be a member of a clearing-house in which such certificates shall not be receivable in the settlement of clearing-house balances. It provides further that the Secretary of the Treasury shall suspend the issue of these gold certificates whenever the amount of gold coin and bullion in the Treasury reserved for the redemption of United States notes falls below $100,000,000.

On amendment numbered 23: It provides a penalty for the officers of national banks who willfully violate the provisions of section 5208 of the Revised Statutes in reference to the certification of checks.

Mr. CRAPO. I move that the House adopt the conference report, and on that I move the previous question.

The previous question was ordered.

Mr. CRAPO moved to reconsider the vote by which the previous question was ordered; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

Mr. RANDALL. I desire to ask the gentleman from Massachusetts whether in his judgment the provision authorizing and directing the issuance of gold certificates on coin deposited in the Treasury interferes with the discretion given to the Secretary of the Treasury in the two hundred and fifty-fourth section of the Revised Statutes permitting him, if in his judgment it is necessary, to issue certificates upon gold bullion.

Mr. CRAPO. I do not understand that it interferes with that provision at all; but the section in this bill goes further, in that it not only authorizes, which is the existing law, but directs the Secretary of the Treasury to issue the certificates upon gold coin.

Mr. RANDALL. As to gold coin it does, but it does not as to gold bullion of standard fineness.

Mr. CRAPO. I understand that the authorization of the old section still exists; but the compulsory direction applies to the coin, and not to the bullion.

Mr. RANDALL. Then, in the opinion of the gentleman from Massachusetts and of the conferees, this bill in that particular section directing the issuance of gold certificates on gold coin does not interfere with the discretion given to the Secretary of the Treasury in section 254 of the Revised Statutes to issue certificates on gold bullion?

Mr. CRAPO. In my judgment it does not interfere with that authority.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. I did not understand from the reading of the report what was finally done with the provision forbidding national banks to become members of a clearing-house which refuses to receive silver as legal tender.

Mr. CRAPO. The clause of the section adopted by the Senate remains. It is that no national bank shall be a member of any clearing-house in which these certificates—that is, silver certificates and gold certificates—shall not be receivable in the settlement of balances. If any clearing-house refuses to receive either gold or silver certificates in the settlement of their balances, then the national bank cannot be a member of that clearing-house organization.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. And that provision is preserved in the bill?

Mr. BUCKNER. It is a Senate amendment and is preserved in the bill.

Mr. HOLMAN. There has been no explanation of the fact that this report concurring in the amendment made by the Senate virtually throws the expense of a substitution of the new currency for the old upon the public Treasury; and it is even doubtful upon the interpretation of its language whether the comparatively small charge of substituting new plates for the old will not be reimbursed out of the taxes now paid by national banks. For there is no provision that this reimbursement shall be in addition to the tax now paid by law.

Mr. BUCKNER. I desire to say to the gentleman from Indiana on that point that the object of this provision, as I understand, is to make each of the national banks organizing under this act pay for the plates, whatever may be the law heretofore. But it does not exclude the idea, the conferees did not agree to the proposition that they should pay the expense of printing the notes and the paper. Why? For the reason that if a bank organizes now under the law, without reference to this, the Government pays that expense. If on the other hand, they organize as they may reorganize the Government now pays. But there is a still better reason why we did not think it was necessary to insert that. We found the whole amount will not exceed for all the banks that may be organized the rate of $10 or $15 a bank; and that would require a separate account to be kept by the Comptroller of the Currency for each one of these banks, if the amount per annum should not exceed $10,000 a year; and therefore this places them on the same footing as new banks that may be organized, or banks that may not be organized under the provisions of this law.

Mr. HOLMAN. Let me understand my friend.

Mr. BUCKNER. I will not say that it costs more, but it is a small sum.

Mr. HOLMAN. Does the gentleman say that it costs only ten or fifteen dollars for each bank?

Mr. BUCKNER. That is what the Comptroller of the Currency reported to us.

Mr. HOLMAN. I am confident that is a mistake.

Mr. BUCKNER. We get our information from one who ought to know about this matter.

Mr. HOLMAN. I would like the gentleman to say, according to his opinion, how much it would require to substitute the new currency for the old currency of the banks which get the benefit of this bill.

Mr. CRAPO. I think I can satisfy the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] that he is wrong in his figures in regard to the expense of substituting the new circulation for the old. It was stated by the gentleman some days ago that it would cost millions of dollars.

Mr. HOLMAN. The gentleman will excuse me; I said the other day that when a proposition was pending some years ago to call in all the national-bank paper, and prepare new plates and substitute new currency for the old, it was then stated to the House that the whole cost would be in the neighborhood of a million dollars.

Mr. CRAPO. Let me remind the gentleman of these simple figures, from which it must be apparent to him that he is mistaken. The present amount of national-bank notes outstanding, without reference to banks in liquidation and banks which have failed, is about $320,000,000. If every bill of that $320,000,000 is substituted by new currency in consequence of the banks availing of this extension, the whole amount will be substituted in the course of twenty years; that is at the average rate, we will say, of $16,000,000 per annum. The substitution of $16,000,000 per annum for the present national-bank note circulation will in twenty years change the present circulation from the old to the new, and change every national-bank note now in circulation. This supposes that every national bank avails itself of the provisions of this act, and extends its charter under it.

Now, we know that the cost of printing and of paper for all the bank notes is less than $100,000 per annum after deducting the cost of plates, &c., paid by the banks. And when that amount is divided among all the banks, in the opinion of the Treasurer of the United State and of the Comptroller of Currency, the cost for this substitution of notes will be from twenty to twenty-five thousand dollars per year. That is to be divided among 2,300 or 2,400 banks, and, as the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BUCKNER] says, it will amount to some ten or eleven dollars per annum per bank. That is the whole amount of it.

One word more before the gentleman from Indiana replies. Let me read from the statement of the Comptroller in reference to the machinery necessary to carry out the view of my friend from Indiana:

If the banks are to reimburse this amount it will be necessary for us to keep separate accounts with each of these banks and charge the expense of printing with each shipment. The amount of saving is not large, but the annoyance created by making these assessments will be great. In the case of assessing the cost of redemption of circulating notes, the Treasurer charges the cost immediately to the redemption fund which he always has on hand, but there is no fund to which this assessment can be charged, and it will be necessary to draw upon the banks for each shipment made to them.

* * * * * * *

If, however, it shall be deemed advisable to require the banks to reimburse the Government for this expense, then an appropriation is necessary for the salaries of a sufficient number of bookkeepers to keep eighteen ledgers, containing the names of the banks; and this work cannot be performed by less than three good bookkeepers, in addition to the present force, who should not receive less than $1,800 each.

Mr. HOLMAN. That is the statement of the Comptroller.

Mr. CRAPO. Also concurred in by the Treasurer.

Mr. HOLMAN. It is, however, an argument which I think should not have force upon the action of Congress.

Mr. CRAPO. It was the unanimous judgment of the conferees, considering the inconvenience, annoyance, and increased cost in the clerical force of the Department, the Comptroller's Office, and the Treasurer's Office, that this clause which was put on by the House should be stricken out.

Mr. HOLMAN. My friend must see that the increased expense in the Bureau of Engraving and Printing, the increased clerical force in the Treasury Department, and especially in the Comptroller's Office, is not taken into account in this estimate; and I should be very much astonished if, all the elements being taken into consideration, the result of this change of currency would not amount to a much larger sum than that mentioned. I am aware, however, that when a conference report has been agreed upon it is hardly worth while even to ask any explanation of it, for at this stage of the session those reports are generally concurred in. I think it is as little as these banks could do, receiving the great advantage given them by this bill of continuing their operations unembarrassed, that they should meet the entire expense and relieve the Government from that expense.

Mr. BUCKNER. There is no absolute requirement under this bill that the banks shall avail themselves of its provisions. If they should choose to reorganize, as they now have the right to do, and as some thirty or forty of them have done within the last six months, the Government, under the law as it is now, would pay all the expense. Therefore we did not think it necessary to make this distinction.

Mr. HOLMAN. Another question. In the eleventh section the language used is the following:

Provided, That the bonds herein authorized shall not be called in and paid so long as any bonds of the United States heretofore issued bearing a higher rate of interest than 3 per cent., and which shall be redeemable at the pleasure of the United States, shall be outstanding and uncalled.

Is the gentleman from Massachusetts certain that the terms here made use of, "which shall be redeemable," refer to the 3½ per cent. bonds or do they refer to the bonds which shall hereafter become due? Does the language refer to 3½ percents at all? If the interpretation should be that it refers to the 4 percents, it inevitably follows that these new bonds will remain outstanding without being within the control of the Government until after the 4 per cent. bonds shall become due. I submit that the language used, "which shall be redeemable," is very equivocal, and does not necessarily refer to those bonds now due. Had the language been "which are now redeemable," there could be no doubt as to the interpretation of the language, but I insist that the phrase "which shall be redeemable" is an ambiguous expression, which could be relieved by simply referring to the bonds now redeemable, referring, of course, alone to the 3½ percents.

Mr. CRAPO. It seems to me the language is sufficiently plain. The section simply provides for the substitution of 3 percents for 3½ percents, or that the 3½ percents which have not been converted into threes shall first be paid, and then the 3 percents shall be payable at the option of the Government, unless there are some bonds drawing a higher rate of interest than 3 per cent. which the Government has the option to call.

In my judgment, if the 3 per cent. bonds have not all been called before the 4½ percents mature, then the Secretary of the Treasury, instead of calling in the then outstanding 3 percents, may, under this section, call in the 4½ percents; that is, he must call those bonds bearing the highest rate of interest and which are subject to call.

Mr. HOLMAN. The 4½ per cent. bonds first become due, then the 4 percents. Now, I understand the meaning of this language is, that if in the mean time the Government should not redeem the 3½ per cent. bonds until the 4½ percents become due, then the payment of these 3 percents shall be postponed until after the 4½ percents have been paid.

Mr. CRAPO. The 3 per cent. bonds must be called unless there are bonds outstanding bearing a higher rate of interest which the Govment has the option of calling.

Mr. HOLMAN. Certainly the 3½ percents, but not the 3 percents.

Mr. CRAPO. On the 3 percents the Government retains the option of calling at any time after the payment of all outstanding 3½ per cent. bonds. All the 3½ per cent. bonds may be exchanged, say, on the 1st day of August, and on the 2d day of August the Secretary of the Treasury may make his call for the redemption of some of these 3 per cent. bonds.

Mr. HOLMAN. I would have been very glad if the language of the provision had been that the payment of the 3 percents should be simply postponed until after the 3½ percents had been paid; for it is quite manifest that the language used here, looking at it with the explanation of my friend from Massachusetts, means that by possibility, perhaps by probability, the 4½ percents will intervene for payment before the 3 percents are redeemed.

Mr. DINGLEY. The section to which the gentleman refers was concurred in by the House, and is not involved in the conference report.

Mr. RANDALL. I wish to call the attention of the gentleman in charge of this bill [Mr. CRAPO] to the proviso of section 12. It is as follows:

Provided, That the Secretary of the Treasury shall suspend the issue of such gold certificates whenever the amount of gold coin and gold bullion in the Treasury reserved for the redemption of United States notes falls below $100,000,000; and the provisions of section 5207 of the Revised Statutes shall be applicable to the certificates herein authorized and directed to be issued.

So far as I now remember, there is no existing law specifying what amount of gold coin or bullion or both shall be held in the Treasury as a fund for the redemption of the United States notes known as legal-tenders; and in fact this bill, if enacted, will be the first requirement by law that any gold coin or bullion shall be so held. There may be a moral obligation on the part of the United States Government to provide a redemption fund; but the only legislation so far as I recollect bearing on this subject provides that whenever it shall be necessary to maintain specie payments the Secretary of the Treasury shall be authorized to issue 5 per cent. bonds for the purchase of gold.

The language of this bill would seem to require in direct language, certainly by inference, that in future there shall be held in the Treasury $100,000,000 of gold coin and bullion as a redemption fund for the payment of the United States notes known as legal-tenders.

It seems to me, if my surmise or perhaps my apprehension is correct, this provision is foreign to the bill and ought not to have been inserted. I believe that nobody in the United States desires at this time the redemption of any of those United States notes bearing no interest. In due time their payment will be amply provided for if public policy so demand. There is no occasion at this time and in this bill to provide for an enormous accumulation of gold coin and bullion in the Treasury. Rather let this gold coin or a part of it be used, at any time it may be desirable, in the redemption of obligations of the Government which do bear interest.

Mr. CRAPO. The purpose of that clause of the section was this: it was to remove the danger which was apprehended by the former Secretary of the Treasury of the withdrawal of the gold from the Treasury and tying it up by gold certificates, holding it in the Treasury for the redemption specially of the gold certificates, leaving no gold whatever in the Treasury for the redemption of the greenback notes.

Mr. RANDALL. If I understand the language of the proviso, it provides that the Secretary shall not permit the gold coin and bullion to go below $100,000,000 in the Treasury, which the Government owns in its own right, and directs such amount shall be held for redemption of United States notes. As to the gold coin likely to be deposited under this section, and the certificates issued therefor, the effect will be to increase and not to decrease the aggregate amount of gold coin and bullion in the Treasury on deposit and in the ownership of the Government.

Mr. CRAPO. But the gentleman will see if greenbacks are taken to the Treasury for the purpose of drawing out gold, and this gold is then taken and deposited in the Treasury and gold certificates received for the same, the free gold in the Treasury will be thereby reduced materially, and the fund for the safety and redemption of the greenback may thereby be destroyed. If all the gold in the Treasury be held as a special fund for the redemption of the gold certificates, then none will be left for the three hundred and fifty millions of greenback notes.

Mr. RANDALL. I only want to say that this section may be nugatory, for it is not intended or desired that it should apply to the gold coin in the Treasury actually owned by the Government, except as to minimum of gold coin and bullion to be held for redemption purposes. It, however, directs the issuance of certificates for the gold which may be placed there now, perhaps in large amounts. The people who deposit that gold coin there have, if they wish to, the right at any time to surrender the gold certificate and withdraw the gold coin. It is not wise to let it have relation to the aggregate amount of gold coin and bullion in the Treasury in the ownership of the Government.

I wish to ask the further question whether it is designed in this $100,000,000 proviso, which provides for the redemption of United States notes, to say those notes shall not be reissued?

Mr. CRAPO. No, sir; I do not see how this clause possibly influences or controls the reissue of legal-tender notes. This clause does not change the law in this regard.

Mr. RANDALL. Under the proviso, it is not quite clear; but I will take the gentleman's interpretation as satisfactory.

Mr. CRAPO. I ask the question——

Mr. RANDALL. It is suggested that I ask the question of the gentleman from Massachusetts. Why the language is used in the proviso in reference to the redemption of the United States notes that they shall be redeemed in gold coin instead of using the single word coin, as comprehending and embracing gold and silver coin. [Mr. BUCKNER rose.] The gentleman from Missouri, one of the conferees on the part of the House, will perhaps answer, as he has uniformly been a friend of silver coinage.

Mr. BUCKNER. If I had the making of this section, and it did not come from the Senate, and the question is what we shall do with it, I should object to it in the main, but not on the ground the gentleman states, but on the ground that it is an apparent discrimination against the silver dollar.

Mr. RANDALL. Does it not go further and provide for or look to a redemption of United States notes in gold coin only?

Mr. BUCKNER. That does not give a fair construction. This act merely provides for the issue of certificates upon gold coin. Now, in order to limit that general power of issuing gold coin it recognizes the fact that there is gold and silver bullion now in the Treasury held for the redemption of United States notes. That is all there is of it. If it went beyond that I should have been in favor of changing it so as not to make an apparent discrimination against the power of the Government to redeem United States notes in coin. I do not think the gentleman's interpretation is a fair one.

Mr. RANDALL. The language used implies that a redemption of United States notes shall hereafter be from a "reserved" fund of $100,000,000 gold coin and bullion, and hence shall be in gold coin and bullion and not in coin as embracing the silver dollar, the Government now having such option. That is a common-sense construction, perhaps the legal construction which can be placed on that proviso, and the construction which I fear may be hereafter given by the Treasury Department.

There is an old maxim that a burnt child dreads the fire. I recollect very well, for I was a member of the House at the time when silver was demonetized upon a mint bill by the use of language neither clear nor understood. I fear a like mishap in this instance; therefore I desire the language now used may be made clear and direct. It was a long time before we got back to the remonetization of silver. During the period when silver was demonetized there was a large issue of bonds, which to-day are held by people who say they are entitled to receive both interest and principal in gold coin, and refuse the silver dollar. We ought to understand this proviso before we pass it. If it does in fact discriminate against silver, as mentioned in the Constitution as coin, then it should be amended so that on presentation of United States notes for redemption the Government shall not part with its present option to pay or redeem either in gold and silver coin that is legal tender.

It is not, to my comprehension, entirely clear what that provision contemplates; whether it does not mean a discrimination in effect to the extent of $100,000,000 in the redemption of the notes of the United States by gold coin instead of by coin, as required by the law which embraces the silver dollar.

Mr. BRUMM. I would like to ask the gentleman from Massachusetts a single question, if he will permit me, and that is whether it is not true that you intend that the greenbacks shall be redeemable in silver as well as gold?

Mr. CRAPO. There is nothing, as I understand it, in this act that makes any change in the present law with reference to the redemption of the greenbacks.

Mr. BRUMM. Then I would like to inquire further, and I should be glad to have, if the gentleman will permit me to ask him, a more direct answer to the question whether it is not true that the conference committee intended that the greenbacks shall be redeemable in silver as well as in gold?

Mr. CRAPO. The conference committee did not pass upon that question at all. It was not——

Mr. RANDALL. We would like to hear what is being said with reference to this matter. There is so much confusion that it is impossible to hear the question and the response of the gentleman from Massachusetts.

Mr. BRUMM. I will repeat the question. I asked the gentleman from Massachusetts whether it is not true that the conference committee intended that the greenbacks should be redeemed, as they have always been redemed, in silver as well as in gold?

Mr. RANDALL. This fails to say so positively; and that is the point to which I have called the gentleman's attention, because I fear it makes a discrimination against silver, or, at least, might be so construed.

Mr. CRAPO. In response to the gentleman from Pennsylvania, I will repeat that the conference committee had nothing before them on which to base a provision of law changing the method of the redemption of the greenbacks from what is now provided by law.

Mr. BRUMM. Then the gentleman from Pennsylvania recognizes the fact that the greenbacks shall be redeemable in silver as well as in gold. Now, if that be true, what, permit me to ask, is the necessity for providing or for incorporating a measure that does provide for the retention in the Treasury of gold specially to redeem the greenbacks?

Mr. CRAPO. That question has already been answered; but I will repeat what I have said before in substance, and will say that the reason is this: the banks, for instance, of New York should not have the power to take all of the gold which has accumulated in the Treasury, and hold it in their grasp—the Treasury having custody of it—the banks simply holding the gold certificates. The purpose of this clause is that a certain amount of gold shall belong to the Government and shall be under its control as a part of the redemption fund protecting the greenback circulation.

Mr. RANDALL. This provision of the bill is unsatisfactory, and I do not regard the explanation given of it as removing the objections which have been urged against it.

Mr. SPRINGER. The bill now pending on the report of the conference committee has at least one merit. But for that meritorious provision we are not indebted to the Committee on Banking and Currency, nor to the Republican majority in this Congress. I refer to section 11, which is as follows:

SEC. 11. That the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized to receive at the Treasury any bonds of the United States bearing 3½ per cent. interest, and to issue in exchange therfor an equal amount of registered bonds of the United States of the denominations of fifty, one hundred, five hundred, one thousand, and ten thousand dollars, of such form as he may prescribe, bearing interest at the rate of 3 per cent. per annum, payable quarterly at the Treasury of the United States. Such bonds shall be exempt from all taxation by or under State authority, and be payable at the pleasure of the United States: Provided, That the bonds herein authorized shall not be called in and paid so long as any bonds of the United States heretofore issued bearing a higher rate of interest than 3 per cent. and which shall be redeemable at the pleasure of the United States shall be outstanding and uncalled. The last of the said bonds originally issued under this act, and their substitutes, shall be first called in, and this order of payment shall be followed until all shall have been paid.

This is in harmony with the funding bill passed by the last Congress, and which was vetoed by a Republican President. But the necessity and importance of such a provision did not occur to the Republican friends of this bill until after the remarks of the honorable gentleman from New York [Mr. FLOWER] in this House on May 14, when the bill was pending and under discussion in the first instance. That distinguished Democrat, who is intimately acquainted with the financial affairs of the country, foresaw and pointed out the necessity for a provision of this kind. In his remarks on the bill at the time I have stated he said:

Even if this bill is passed, other legislation will be necessary or we will find ourselves curtailed of forty-one millions of national-bank currency by the last call of bonds, expiring August 1. I call upon the other side of the House to present some report besides this, in order to meet the difficulty that will be upon us by the 1st day of August next. Otherwise, when September and October and November come, you will find a money panic, and I do not want you to charge that upon this side of the House.

I believe that a 3 per cent. funding bill should be passed by which the Secretary of the Treasury would be allowed to fund all the bonds of the United States now due at 3 per cent., giving to the one who secures the first new bond the right to the longest bond. I think that is the way out of this difficulty and the only way to prevent a large contraction of the currency.

Of the 3½ per cent. extended bonds, thirteen and a half millions have been taken as a basis of circulation by the national banks that have been chartered within the last year or year and a half. Of the circulation of this country two hundred and forty millions is dependent upon bonds payable at the option of the Secretary of the Treasury. Now, that is no way in which to leave the currency of the country; and I call upon gentlemen on the other side of the House, while we are willing to vote for this bill with proper restrictions, to present us a funding bill which will place our currency and the business interests of the country upon a firm and satisfactory basis.

The Republican majority in this House did not heed the warning which was given by my friend from New York and passed the bill without the eleventh section. But the Senate thought more gravely and seriously on the matter and took the advice given by this side of the House, in the remark I have just quoted, and promptly amended the bill. I had hoped to hear some gentleman on the other side acknowledge the appropriation of the suggestions of the gentleman from New York [Mr. FLOWER] and give him due credit therefor. But in this I am doomed to disappointment. What there is of good in this bill has originated on this side of the House. The proposition in reference to gold certificates originated with the honorable gentleman from Texas [Mr. MILLS] and the distinguished gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. RANDALL.] But, notwithstanding Democrats have succeeded in getting some good provisions in the measure, these are not sufficient to overcome in my mind the many objections I have to the bill, and I cannot give it my support. As the adoption of the conference report finally passes the whole bill, I shall vote in the negative.

The SPEAKER. The time allowed for debate has expired.

Mr. CRAPO. I call for the question upon the adoption of the report.

Mr. HOLMAN. I desire to make a parliamentary inquiry: whether it would be in order to move to recommit this report to the same committee from which it originated?

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks not, although that is a new question to the Chair.

Mr. HOLMAN. Is it not in order to move to lay the report upon the table?

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks not. The Chair does not remember any precedents that would allow such a motion at this time. This is a conference report.

Mr. RANDALL. Would the gentleman from Massachusetts not permit a motion by consent to recommit this to the conference committee with the view to make plain that proviso? For we do not know with exactness and certainty what is meant, or whether this $100,000,000 in gold coin and bullion is not a change of existing law. There is really no law that I remember which now requires a "reserve" of $100,000,000 in gold coin and bullion to redeem the $346,000,000 of United States notes as this disputed proviso makes necessary.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state that debate is exhausted.

Mr. HOLMAN. I wish to ask a further parliamentary question. If the House shall refuse to concur in this report cannot the subject be recommitted to the same committee or another conference asked for?

The SPEAKER. The practice is very clear in that respect. If the House does not concur it will go back to another conference committee if desired.

Mr. HOLMAN. Then I demand the yeas and nays on the adoption of the report.

Mr. RANDALL. If this report is not agreed to, I desire to know if it would not be competent to ask a further conference with a view to making plain the discrimination, if it really exists, to which attention has been called?

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks the rule is very plain, as the gentleman from Pennsylvania understands, that if the conference report is not agreed to another conference may be demanded.

Mr. RANDALL. I only wanted to state the question plainly to the House before the vote is taken.

Mr. McLANE. I desire to ask if the time of the gentleman from Massachusetts in charge of this report has expired?

The SPEAKER. It has.

Mr. McLANE. I only wanted to know, because I desired to ask a question.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the demand of the gentleman from Indiana for the yeas and nays on the adoption of the report of the committee of conference.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 110, nays 79, not voting 101; as follows:

Mr. MURCH. I am paired with my colleague, [Mr. LINDSEY,] who is sick. If he were present, I should vote "no."

The result of the vote was then announced as above stated.

Mr. CRAPO moved to reconsider the vote just taken; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

Mr. CRAPO. I ask unanimous consent to make a verbal amendment to perfect the text.

The SPEAKER. That is not in order except by unanimous consent.

Mr. CRAPO. I ask unanimous consent. It is simply a change of phraseology. I ask that, in line 27, page 7 of the printed bill, in section 10, the word "hereinafter" before the word "provided" be stricken out and that the words "by law" be inserted after the word "provided;" so that it will read:

Shall be entitled to receive from the Comptroller of the Currency circulating notes of different denominations, in blank, registered, and countersigned, as provided by law, &c.

This report goes to the Senate for their concurrence, and I presume it will be in order to make that correction now.

Mr. RANDALL. Let the proposed amendment be read by the Clerk, the right to object being reserved.

The Clerk read as follows:

In line 27, on page 7, strike out the word "hereinafter" before the word "provided" and insert the words "by law" after the word "provided."

Mr. RANDALL. Can we change a conference report?

The SPEAKER. The Chair understands a conference report cannot be changed. But this correction in the bill may be made by unanimous consent.

Mr. CRAPO. It does not form part of the report. The proposed correction is in a part of the bill which was not amended.

The SPEAKER. If there be no objection the verbal amendment will be considered as adopted. The Chair hears none.

ENROLLED JOINT RESOLUTION SIGNED.

Mr. ALDRICH, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that the committee had examined and found duly enrolled a joint resolution of the following title; when the Speaker signed the same:

Joint resolution (H. R. No. 69) authorizing the Public Printer to pay the employés of the Government Printing Office the pay deducted from them during the obsequies of the late President Garfield, and for other purposes.

SIGNAL-SERVICE REPORT.

The SPEAKER laid before the House the following Senate concurrent resolution; which was read, and referred to the Committee on Printing:

Resolved by the Senate, (the House of Representatives concurring,) That there be printed and bound for the use of the Signal Office and the Department of War 2,500 copies of the annual report of the Chief Signal Officer for 1881.

SUEZ CANAL REPORT.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House the following Senate concurrent resolution; which was read, and referred to the Committee on Printing:

Resolved by the Senate, (the House of Representatives concurring,) That the report of Professor Nourse on the Suez Canal be printed, and that there be printed 5,000 additional copies, of which 1,500 copies shall be for the use of the Senate, 3,000 for the use of the House, and 500 for the Navy Department.

INTEROCEANIC COMMUNICATION.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House the following Senate concurrent resolution; which was read, and referred to the Committee on Printing:

Resolved by the Senate, (the House of Representatives concurring,) That the report by Lieutenant John T. Sullivan, United States Navy, on the problem of interoceanic communication by way of the American Isthmus, be printed, with 5,000 additional copies, of which 1,500 shall be for the use of the Senate, 3,000 for the use of the House, and 500 for the use of the Navy Department.

CRUISE OF THE TICONDEROGA.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House the following Senate concurrent resolution; which was read, and referred to the Committee on Printing:

Resolved by the Senate, (the House of Representatives concurring,) That the report by Commodore R. W. Shufeldt, United States Navy, of his cruise around the world in the United States steamer Ticonderoga be printed, with 5,000 additional copies, of which 1,500 shall be for the use of the Senate, 3,000 for the use of the House, and 500 for the use of the Navy Department.

WATER SUPPLY OF WASHINGTON CITY.

Mr. NEAL. I present the report of the committee of conference on Senate bill No. 1723.

The Clerk read the report, as follows:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the House to the bill of the Senate No. 1723, to increase the water supply in the city of Washington, and for other purposes, having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend, and do recommend, to their respective Houses, as follows:

That the Senate agree to the amendment of the House numbered 1, providing for a fish-way at the Great Falls of the Potomac, and they also agree to recommend the following as a substitute for the amendment numbered 2 of the said bill:

"That one-half the cost of said improvement, excluding the fish-way, shall be annually computed and stated by the Treasurer of the United States and charged to a capital account on the books of the Treasury, and that interest at the rate of 3 per cent. per annum thereon shall be annually computed and charged to said account, and that any surplus of water rents over and above the expenses of maintaining the works and appendages and paying the charges for interest and sinking fund for the redemption of outstanding bonds heretofore issued for the extension of said water-works in the city of Washington shall be paid into the Treasury of the United States by the officer who may be charged with the collection of the same, and credited to the account thus created until the same shall be finally extinguished, and the water rents shall be so regulated from time to time as to be at least sufficient to pay the expense of maintaining the said works and appendages and the interest on the capital account created in accordance with this provision in addition to charges now imposed thereon by law. After the extinguishment of said account, and until further action by Congress, the surplus water rents shall be paid into the Treasury of the United States."

HENRY S. NEAL,
MILTON G. URNER,
ABRAM S. HEWITT,
Conferees on the part of the House.
ISHAM G. HARRIS,
A. P. GORMAN,
Conferees on the part of the Senate.

Mr. BLOUNT. This is quite an important matter, and I ask that half an hour's debate on each side be allowed.

Mr. NEAL. I move the previous question on the adoption of the report.

Mr. SPRINGER. I rise to make a parliamentary inquiry. If the previous question be seconded, will we be entitled to an hour's debate?

The SPEAKER. If the previous question is seconded half an hour's debate will be allowed.

Mr. BLOUNT. I ask that half an hour be allowed on each side.

The SPEAKER. Under the rule, of the time allowed for debate some gentleman would be entitled to have one-half in opposition to the report.

Mr. BLOUNT. Which would be fifteen minutes. In that time it would be impossible to state the objections to the report.

Mr. NEAL. The gentleman from Georgia has had more than that time already.

The question being taken on ordering the previous question, there were—ayes 102, noes 9.

Mr. BLOUNT. No quorum.

Tellers were ordered, and Mr. NEAL and Mr. BLOUNT were appointed.

The House again divided; and the tellers reported that there were—ayes 125, noes 21.

So the previous question was ordered.

Mr. NEAL moved to reconsider the vote by which the previous question was ordered; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

Mr. NEAL. If the House will give me its attention I will explain in a very few minutes just what this report proposes. The House made two amendments to the Senate bill. One was an amendment providing for a fish-way at the Great Falls and making an appropriation of $50,000 for that purpose.

It will be recollected by the House that at what is called Great Falls there is built a dam for the purpose of turning the water from the river into the Aqueduct to supply the city. The Commissioner of Fish and Fisheries, Professor Baird, has been anxious that some way should be provided by which the shad and other fish of the Potomac could get over the Falls for the purpose of spawning in the upper waters of the Potomac. The House provided by that amendment for the establishment of a fish-way.

The other amendment put on the bill by the House provided that the expense of building this extension of the water-works should be charged to a capital account, to bear interest at the rate of 3.65 per cent. per annum, the water rents collected to be applied to the payment of this account, with the interest thereon. The Senate insisted that this amendment should not be adopted. The House conferees, in obedience to the action of the House, insisted that the amendment should be adopted.

The committee of conference finally agreed upon this compromise, that the Government should furnish the money to pay the entire expense of doing this work, and that one-half of the expense should be charged to a capital account by the Treasurer of the United States, with interest at the rate of 3 per cent. per annum, and that the water rents, which are fixed by Congress and which are collected by a Federal officer, should be paid into the Treasury of the United States and applied first to the payment of the charges now resting upon them, and the remainder to be applied to the extinguishment of this account. In other words, one-half of the expense of this work is to be paid by the people of the District of Columbia, and in the mean time interest at the rate of 3 per cent. per annum is to be charged upon it.

The net receipts from the water rents were about $75,000 last year. There are charges upon that fund for a loan made by the District of Columbia to lay down the mains for distributing the water throughout the city. That charge is about $40,000 a year, and is being diminished annually. The water rents will increase annually, and at the present rate of using the water more money will be received than is necessary to pay the interest upon this loan, which will be applied to the extinguishment of the principal.

In addition to that we provide that these water rents shall always be sufficient to pay the interest on the account as well as the principal, and after the account is finally extinguished the water rents will still be paid into the Treasury of the United States, to be appropriated as Congress may hereafter determine. In other words, this whole matter is left in the hands of Congress, to do with it as it may see fit. I trust the report will be adopted.

Mr. WILLITS. I desire to ask the gentleman a question. What is the amount of bonds issued?

Mr. NEAL. Now?

Mr. WILLITS. To be issued under this bill?

Mr. NEAL. There are none at all to be issued under the bill.

Mr. WILLITS. What is the amount of indebtedness to be incurred?

Mr. NEAL. As near as I can tell the whole amount will be about $1,400,000, of which $700,000 will be charged against the District with interest at 3 per cent.

Mr. WILLITS. Have you provided in this report how the principal of the indebtedness is to be paid?

Mr. NEAL. The water rents are to be all appropriated to the payment of the interest and the principal.

Mr. WILLITS. Suppose that the water rents shall not more than pay the interest?

Mr. NEAL. Congress can raise the rates whenever it chooses; it can double the water rents if it wants to.

Mr. WILLITS. What is the provision in regard to the share which the United States shall pay?

Mr. NEAL. The Government of the United States advances all the money for the payment of this work.

Mr. WILLITS. Then you charge the District with $700,000 of the amount?

Mr. NEAL. With $700,000.

Mr. WILLITS. Have you provided a sinking fund?

Mr. NEAL. The water rents are all to be paid into the Treasury, to be applied first to the payment of the interest and then to the extinguishment of the principal. The amount derived from these water rates will increase annually, while the account will decrease. Consequently there will be every year a larger and larger amount for the extinguishment of the principal.

Mr. DAVIS, of Illinois. How do you provide for the extension of the system?

Mr. NEAL. The system does not need any extension.

Mr. ROBINSON, of Massachusetts. What is the amount from water rates now?

Mr. NEAL. After paying the expenses of keeping up the Aqueduct and paying the salaries of officers the amount from the water rents last year was about $74,000.

Mr. WILLITS. In the Forty-fifth Congress we settled upon the principle that the United States should pay one-half of the current expenses of the District of Columbia. I am willing to stand by the arrangement which was made then. And in this extension of the water-works I am perfectly willing that the United States should incur one-half of the expense. I do, however, desire this bill to show specifically and clearly that the United States shall be liable for only one-half. If a provision be made in the bill that by water rents enough shall be raised to pay the interest of this indebtedness and provide a sinking fund, this will satisfy the objection which I had in the first place to the bill as I understood it.

Ever since I have been in Congress there has been a question with regard to the payment of the principal of the 3.65 bonds. In the act authorizing the issue of those bonds provision was made for the payment of the interest; and in the Forty-fifth Congress we assumed the payment of one-half the interest on those bonds. We have annually appropriated the money for that purpose. But it is still an unsettled question what shall be done with the bonds when they shall mature.

I desire this bill shall be so framed—and I hope it is so framed—that this question cannot arise in the future. If there is in the bill a provision of that kind, I have no objection to the measure.

Mr. BLOUNT. Mr. Chairman, I ask the attention of the House in presenting briefly my objections to the adoption of this report. The gentleman in charge of the report, who all the way through has been utterly opposed to requiring anybody except those outside of the District of Columbia to contribute to this fund, has cut me off from the opportunity of elaborating my views as I would have been glad to do.

The first fact to which I call attention is that under the law as it now stands the District authorities are obliged to assess at least $15,000 a year for the old water debt represented now by bonds. They have never raised more than $15,000 for this purpose in any year. It has not been done this year; and for several years it was not provided for at all. The amount of these bonds now outstanding is $423,000; and at the rate of $15,000 a year it will take more than thirty years to extinguish the present bonded indebtedness before one dollar can possibly be contributed to the extinction of the debt which this bill proposes to create.

The objection I have to this conference report is that it requires only enough water tax to be assessed to provide for the interest. Will the District authorities do more? Our experience in reference to the bonded indebtedness of this District discloses the fact that District authorities will never raise more money for the extinction of this indebtedness than they are compelled to raise. It is the duty of Congress to require the assessment of a tax not only sufficient to pay this interest but to provide for the gradual extinction of this debt. That is not done in this report. I am not objecting to the amendment of the Senate requiring that one-half of this interest be paid by the general public outside of the District of Columbia; I am simply asking that a provision be adopted requiring absolutely the raising annually of a given sum to provide gradually for the extinction of this debt.

The gentleman from Michigan [Mr. WILLITS] asked the gentleman from Ohio whether the bill makes any such provision, and the gentleman from Ohio replied that the water rents are increasing all the time, and will be sufficient to take care of that.

I deny it; and the gentleman from Ohio, if he has any information going to show that there is such provision, has withheld it from the House. Not a dollar beyond the $15,000 required by law has ever been raised to provide for the extinction of the present indebtedness; not a dollar additional is required to be raised for that purpose by this bill; and experience shows that there will be no funds collected for that purpose.

Mr. WILLITS. Will the gentleman tell us what the present indebtedness is?

Mr. BLOUNT. The present indebtedness—I speak from the latest information I have upon the subject, a report upon this very bill presented by Mr. HARRIS from the Committee on the District of Columbia—is $423,000.

Mr. WILLITS. Are the water rents as now adjusted any more than enough to pay the interest?

Mr. BLOUNT. Not a dollar more; and no additional provision is made in the bill; it does not look anywhere to the raising of any increased amount. I have been seeking an opportunity to present the facts to this House, and I ask that this report be voted down as an act of justice to people living outside this district.

I wish to call attention to the quantity of water used here. The report to which I have just referred shows that the rate of water consumption in the District has been 25,000,000 gallons daily, only 2,600,000 being used by the General Government; yet under the law (and I am not complaining of it) the Government is required to pay one-half of this debt. All I ask is that there shall be in this bill a provision compelling the District commissioners to assess a given sum each year looking toward the payment not only of the interest of this debt, but the principal also. There is no compulsory provision of that sort.

The District now owes over $22,000,000. This bill proposes additional expenditures to the amount of $1,400,000. I simply ask that the people of this District bear their fair share of the expenditure, nothing more. There is now pending at the other end of the Capitol, and we have had before us here, a bill involving an expenditure of possibly six to ten million dollars for another improvement of this District. The precedent you now set will be the law hereafter; it will be constantly cited, and I beg Representatives while dealing liberally with the District (and no man will gainsay that we are doing so) to deal fairly by the people who do not live here. When we are legislating upon District matters I want some regard paid to the people who pay the taxes of this country. I am willing to indulge the sentiment which regards this as a great national capital, and therefore contributes out of the Federal Treasury one-half the amount necessary to sustain its magnificence; but I am not willing, when we have made these liberal contributions session after session, that there shall be urged upon us a proposition to pay vast additional sums out of the Treasury for the benefit of people here who pay nothing toward this expenditure in the way of taxation.

This is the principle to which I wish to enforce adherence. It is not the water bill I am struggling about, but to preserve the adjustment between the Federal and District governments. I trust gentlemen will see that this is done. We are told that the people need water very much. No doubt of it, and I am willing to provide for it. But it is strange, when the law required this matter should be submitted through the commissioners, and that an estimate should be made through the Secretary of the Treasury, that requirement of the law should be entirely disregarded, although there is such an exigency upon the District of Columbia. They do need water in this District, but why should the requirement of the law be omitted and nothing done about it until now, when it has been thrust in upon us under the cry of water famine, and the expenditure provided for in its original conception did not anticipate the contribution of one nickel from the people who consume the water.

I wish to call the attention of the House, in addition to what I have already stated, as to the amount of water used in this District and to the extravagant waste of water by the people here in the cities of Washington and Georgetown. I have before me the report of the chairman of the Committee on the District of Columbia of the Senate, in which he cites twenty cities, and shows the amount of water used per capita in each one of those twenty cities. In this District the consumption of water is 155½ gallons per capita per day. In twenty other cities, including the manufacturing towns of Fall River, Lowell, Lynn, &c., the consumption of water per capita ranges from 25 gallons to 119 gallons. At Lowell it is 33 gallons per capita; at Lynn, 34 gallons; at Milwaukee, 53 gallons; at Cleveland, 56 gallons; at Cincinnati, 57; at Toronto, 75, and in this city, 155½ gallons, a city where there is no manufacturing. The average consumption of water in these twenty other cities which are named in this report is a little more than one-third of the consumption by each person in the cities of Washington and Georgetown.

Think of it, Mr. Speaker, that the average consumption of water per capita in these twenty cities is only one-third of what it is in Washington and Georgetown! There is enormous waste and extravagance, undoubtedly, as I am informed, by people in this District.

The rate of taxation is so much to the house. The amount consumed does not regulate the tax. There is no economy, therefore, in the use of water in this District.

While I have no disposition to complain unnecessarily, I do wish to put this restraint upon the use of water in this District, if possible to do away with this extravagant waste, and, in order to do that, the people here should be compelled to pay one-half of the sum expended. They should not be let off with the interest of 3.65 per cent. on the water bonds, but should be taxed to make a sinking fund sure and certain from which they cannot escape.

When you have done this you will have placed a conservative principle in operation, so that on every question of appropriation the people here will find it to their advantage to consider whether or not this, that, or the other thing shall be done in Washington when it is proposed, and they will not altogether regard Congress as the place where they may come for donations from the Federal Treasury, at the expense of other people. [Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. NEAL. I will now take the floor, Mr. Speaker, and yield five minutes of my time to the gentleman from Maryland.

Mr. McLANE. Mr. Speaker, I wish for a moment the attention of the gentleman from Georgia, who concerns himself principally in this debate about the division of expenses between the Government and the people of this District. Now, it is accepted that that division is to be made. That is the adjustment of the controversy of more or less length of time as to the relative charge for the expenses of government in the District. If I understand the gentleman from Georgia, [Mr. BLOUNT,] he is perfectly willing to abide by that adjustment. He is not anxious to-day to raise any question in reference to that matter.

Understanding him thus, I think he is in error when he undertakes to argue to this House this bill does not guarantee that adjustment.

I wish the attention of the House to the question of water rent. There is not to-day a well-governed city in the Union that does not provide for the interest of its water debt and for the extinction of the debt by water rents. On this question of taxation, whatever may be said of the expenses of this city, the gentleman from Georgia and this House will find that the property of this District is taxed, notwithstanding the fact the Government pays one-half of its expenses, about the same as the great city within forty miles of it. The property of this city pays a tax of $1.50 in the $100. The city of Baltimore—I may say one of the best-governed and best-administered cities in this country, and with one of the best water privileges—pays about the same water tax, about $1.50 in the $100. There is therefore nothing extraordinary in the relation of taxation to property in this city.

Mr. BLOUNT. As the gentleman from Maryland has referred to me, will he permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. McLANE. Let me take my five minutes first, and then I will answer any question the gentleman may wish to put to me. The point I make is not in dispute, that the private property holder in this city pays about the same amount of tax on his real and personal property as in the neighboring city of Baltimore, and there is about the same rule of assessment.

That city of Baltimore has its water power and water debt, and out of its water rent it pays the interest of its water debt and provides a sinking fund, and the gentleman from Georgia is absolutely in error when he says the water rents cannot be sufficient. Now, I raise no question with him as to whether they paid the interest in the past or not.

This Congress has the power to require proper rents to be paid for the water, and a sum sufficient to be thus collected to pay the interest, and in that manner also to extinguish the principal of the debt; it is conceded that that should be done. The water rents paid by the property holders ought to be sufficient to pay one-half of the interest upon the total amount, and to extinguish the debt at the same time.

Mr. WILLITS. Can the gentleman state what amount of sinking fund has been provided for the bonds already in existence?

Mr. McLANE. The past I do not deal with, but with the bill now before us, and the argument of the gentleman from Georgia, who seemed to fear that the water rents would not be sufficient to meet the demands which I have stated. Now, they will not only be sufficient for that purpose, but they could be made sufficient to pay the interest on four millions of debt, instead of on one million and a half. The whole amount of the debt provided for by this bill is one and one-half millions, one half of which—that is to say, $750,000—being the sum chargeable to the city, and it is the easiest thing in the world for the water rents paid by the property-holders to be so regulated as to do this, and to provide a sinking fund for the payment of the principal.

Mr. BLOUNT. If my friend will permit me. I agree with him fully, but the conference report does not provide for anything of the kind.

Mr. McLANE. The conference report does not provide for a sinking fund eo nomine; but it does provide that the water rents shall be raised to a point sufficient to pay the interest and to provide for the extinguishment of the debt.

Mr. BLOUNT. Not at all, if my friend will permit me.

Mr. McLANE. Then let Congress provide for such extinction of the principal debt, and the only issue between the gentleman from Georgia and myself must be one of detail. Now, as has been well said by the gentleman from Ohio, the chairman of the Committee on the District of Columbia, it is in the power of Congress to regulate the water rents to meet the demands which will be made upon that fund, and if the gentleman from Georgia has any apprehension upon that subject, all that is necessary is that these rents shall be made sufficient in amount to meet the expenditures and the interest on the debt as well as to provide for the retirement of these bonds.

Mr. BLOUNT. That is what I want to do.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Maryland has expired.

Mr. NEAL. I now yield three minutes to the gentleman from Maryland, my colleague on the committee, [Mr. URNER.]

Mr. URNER. Mr. Speaker, if there is any error whatever in this report it is not in the direction suggested by the gentleman from Georgia, but it lies rather in the fact that we are burdening the District beyond what it really ought to be burdened in this connection.

Now, gentlemen do not seem to remember that the improvement and extension of the water-works contemplated by this bill is simply an addition which is being made to Government work and to property already belonging to the Government. It provides for the enlargement or reconstruction, if necessary, of the dam at the Great Falls, which is Government property. It provides for the extension of the reservoir on the heights at the end of Sixteenth street, which is also to be Government property; and it provides also for the extension of the Aqueduct, which belongs to the Government of the United States. In other words, all of the work that is contemplated to be done by this bill is Government work; and it is without a parallel in legislation, so far as my investigations have gone on this subject, that the District of Columbia or any State in this Union has ever been required to assist in the payments of expenses connected with a work that is purely and simply Government work.

Mr. WILLITS. I do not desire to interrupt the gentleman from Maryland, but I would like to know if the figures here quoted in this report are correct, where it shows that the Government uses only 2,626,188 gallons, whereas the citizens of Washington and Georgetown use over 23,000,000 of gallons? In other words, the Government itself only uses about one-ninth of the total of water furnished, and yet it is required to pay one-half of the expense.

Mr. URNER. I am not able to answer exactly, but I doubt if the figures are accurate in that respect.

Mr. BLOUNT. They are the report of the Government engineer, after a careful measurement and investigation.

Mr. WILLITS. As for myself, I desire to say that I am willing to stand by the old arrangement, made in the Forty-fifth Congress, that the Government shall pay one-half of the expenditures of the government of the District of Columbia, but I do not see any reason why in this case, where the citizens themselves are the consumers and beneficiaries, the Government should bear the burden of the tax, while they escape taxation in a matter of this kind.

Mr. URNER. But, Mr. Speaker, it does not matter whether the figures here given are entirely correct or not. One thing is true, and that is that the citizens of the District of Columbia pay for all of the water they use. It is proposed by this bill that the water rent shall be so regulated that the revenues derived shall be sufficient to pay all of the expenses attending this work; pay the interest upon the sinking fund and provide for the redemption of the bonds. It provides for paying the interest upon one-half of the cost of the improvement, while the balance is to be applied to the extinguishment of the $700,000 of the debt that is to be wiped out from that source. I do not see, therefore, how it could be made more explicit than that the authorities are required by this bill to apply the water rents to the payment of the interest and the liquidation of the principal until it is all paid up.

Mr. BLOUNT. I would like to have that part of the bill read which provides that.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Maryland has expired.

Mr. URNER. A considerable part of my time was consumed by other gentlemen.

Mr. NEAL. Mr. Speaker, I only desire to say a word in reply to the gentleman from Georgia, who I understand charges me with suppressing some of the facts in connection with this matter.

Mr. BLOUNT. I want to say to my friend——

Mr. NEAL. I cannot be interrupted. If I am mistaken I will have the statement corrected as it appears in the RECORD.

I will say the whole receipts of the water-works last year were over $140,000. The net receipts, after the payment of the extensions that were made and after the payment of the salaries of officers and of everything of that sort, were between $74,000 and $75,000. I have the report here, but I cannot at this moment turn to the table, as the report is not indexed; but with the consent of the House I will make it a part of my remarks.

The statement is as follows:

RECEIPTS.

Water tax	$26,809 53
Water rent	109,679 57
Water taps	1,851 00
Water permits	1,908 22
Total	140,248 33

EXPENDITURES.

Office rolls	10,830 00
Contingent expenses	1,141 10
Material, &c	29,080 69
Laborers' rolls	23,692 55
Refunded	200 24
Erection of stand-pipe	1,580 39
Interest and sinking fund	74,123 77

There is a charge on that of interest on something over $300,000 of bonds at 7 per cent., and a sinking fund of $15,000; amounting at most to only $40,000, and leaving, according to the net receipts of last year, $35,000 for the payment of interest and sinking fund on this debt. And the water rents will be increasing all the time, because when these works are completed there will be a large increase in the use of water, while the rents will be diminishing. Consequently there will be more and more every year to be paid in. But this matter is altogether in the hands of Congress, and next year, if we see fit, we can double the water rents and provide any sinking fund we choose. It is for us to say what it shall be. Therefore it seems to me to be only right and just, or, if anything, more than just—I mean just to the Government, not to the people—that the people of this District should pay only the amount that is charged to them.

In regard to the use of the water I do not believe that report is correct. In every house that I have been in during the last five years I have not seen any such extraordinary use of water as would make me believe that for every man, woman, and child one hundred and fifty gallons are used. There must be something wrong in the measurement, or the aqueduct leaks; at any rate it will appear by the examination of these public buildings that there is an extraordinary use of water in all of them far exceeding the amount set apart by the engineers.

The SPEAKER. The time allowed for debate is exhausted.

Mr. BLOUNT. I hope I may be allowed to say that I do not mean any reflection on my friend from Ohio, whom I esteem highly.

Mr. NEAL. I am glad to believe the gentleman does not.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the report of the committee of conference.

The question being taken, there were—ayes 77, noes 24.

Mr. BLOUNT. I call for the yeas and nays.

The question being taken on ordering the yeas and nays, there were ayes 20.

The SPEAKER. In the opinion of the Chair a sufficient number have not voted to order the yeas and nays.

Mr. RANDALL. Count the other side.

The negative vote was counted and there were ayes 92; the affirmative not being one-fifth of the entire vote.

Mr. REAGAN. I desire to have tellers on the yeas and nays.

On the question of ordering tellers on the yeas and nays there were ayes 19; not one-fifth of a quorum.

So tellers on the yeas and nays were refused, the yeas and nays were not ordered, and the report of the committee of conference was concurred in.

Mr. NEAL moved to reconsider the vote by which the report of the committee of conference was concurred in; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. NEAL and Mr. HISCOCK called for the regular order.

The SPEAKER. The regular order is the calling of States and Territories for the introduction of bills, joint resolutions, and resolutions of inquiry.

Mr. HISCOCK. I ask that the call of States and Territories for the introduction of bills, &c., be dispensed with.

The SPEAKER. It may be dispensed with by unanimous consent. Is there objection? The Chair hears none.

Mr. NEAL. I move to take from the Speaker's table the bill (H. R. No. 5535) for the purpose of moving concurrence in the Senate amendments.

Mr ATKINS. Does the gentleman obtain the floor for that purpose by a previous order of the House?

The SPEAKER. By a special order of the House the second and fourth Mondays of each month after the call of States and Territories for bills and joint resolutions are set apart for the consideration of such business as may be presented by the Committee on the District of Columbia.

Mr. ATKINS. I ask the gentleman from New York [Mr. HISCOCK] to raise the question of consideration. The District of Columbia Committee has had an unusual share of the time of this session.

Mr. HISCOCK. The gentleman from Tennessee will understand if I raise the question of consideration I would have to raise it on every measure presented by the District of Columbia Committee.

Mr. ATKINS. Well, raise it on every measure.

Mr. HISCOCK. I will say to the gentleman from Tennessee that we have agreed that the District Committee shall present three or four little matters merely, that will take less time to dispose of than would be occupied in raising the question of consideration.

Mr. ATKINS. If the gentleman from New York [Mr. HISCOCK] yields further he will not get the sundry civil bill out of this House during this week.

Mr. HISCOCK. I think we can reach that bill sooner by allowing these matters to be presented by the District Committee to be disposed of than we would by fighting over the question of consideration.

INTEREST ON TAX ARREARAGES.

Mr. NEAL. I move to take from the Speaker's table the bill (H. R. No. 5535) fixing the rate of interest upon arrearages of taxes due July 1, 1879, and on all special taxes due the District of Columbia and which may be paid by July 1, 1882, and for other purposes, with Senate amendments.

The amendments of the Senate were read, as follows:

On page 1, line 7, strike out "July" and insert "November."

Amend the title so as to read: "An act fixing the rate of interest upon arrearages of taxes due July 1, 1879, and on all special assessments due the District of Columbia and which may be paid by November 1, 1882, and for other purposes."

The SPEAKER. The question is first on concurring in the amendment to the body of the bill.

The amendment of the Senate was concurred in.

Mr. NEAL moved to reconsider the vote by which the amendment was concurred in; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. If there be no objection, the title of the bill will be amended as indicated.

There was no objection.

PUNISHMENT OF HOUSE-BREAKING IN THE DISTRICT.

Mr. URNER. I am instructed by the Committee on the District of Columbia to call up from the Speaker's table the bill (H. R. No. 6676) to more effectually punish house-breaking in the District of Columbia, and for other purposes. The bill has been returned from the Senate with amendments, and I am instructed to move that the amendments of the Senate be concurred in.

The SPEAKER. The amendments of the Senate will be read.

The amendments were read, as follows:

In line 8 strike out the words "less than one year nor;" in lines 21 and 22 strike out the words "less than one year nor;" and add to the bill the following:

"This act shall not affect any offense committed or indictment found before its passage."

The amendments of the Senate were concurred in.

Mr. URNER moved to reconsider the vote by which the amendments were concurred in; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

SOLDIERS' AND SAILORS' ORPHAN HOME—GARFIELD HOSPITAL.

Mr. NEAL. I am instructed by the Committee on the District of Columbia to report back with a favorable recommendation the bill (H. R. No. 6702) to authorize the transfer of the property of the National Soldiers' and Sailors' Orphan Home to the Garfield Memorial Hospital, and to ask for its consideration at this time.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the board of trustees of the National Soldiers and Sailors' Orphan Home of the District of Columbia are hereby empowered to transfer and convey all the property, real, personal, and mixed, of the said National Soldiers' and Sailors' Orphan Home to the Garfield Memorial Hospital, located in said District; and the said Garfield Memorial Hospital is hereby empowered to sell and convey the same and apply the proceeds to the object for which it was incorporated.

The question was upon ordering the bill to be engrossed and read a third time.

Mr. NEAL. Some years ago, shortly after the war, or perhaps during the war, there was a board of trustees incorporated as the National Soldiers' and Sailors' Orphan Home of the District of Columbia, of which Judge Cartter, of this District, is now the president.

That institution became the owners, partly by donation and partly by appropriation, of certain property in the District. That property has now ceased to be valuable for the uses for which it was acquired. It remains in the hands of these trustees, and they have unanimously passed a resolution asking Congress to give them authority to transfer this property to the Garfield Memorial Hospital. The property will be sold and the proceeds used for the purchase of other property for the benefit of the Memorial Hospital. As it now is the property is utterly useless for any purpose. If this bill shall pass the property will be used for the great purposes of humanity.

Mr. CAMERON. What interest has the Government in this property?

Mr. NEAL. The Government has no interest whatever in it; but Judge Cartter, who is a very good lawyer, has some doubts whether without an act of this sort the trustees have authority to make conveyance. At any rate the passage of the bill will do no harm, but will confer upon the trustees the authority which Judge Cartter thinks they ought to have. It is possible that the authority they now have is ample. But in order that a good title may be given, so as to realize the largest possible sum for the property, the trustees ask that this enabling act may be passed.

Mr. MCMILLIN. How is it that the board needs an enabling act if the Government has no interest in the property? Are we called upon to go through the farce of giving authority when we have no interest at all?

Mr. ROBINSON, of Massachusetts. Perhaps it is because it is an incorporation which was created by Congress.

Mr. MCMILLIN. That is what I want to have explained.

Mr. ROBINSON, of Massachusetts. I say perhaps that is the reason.

Mr. MCMILLIN. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. NEAL] said that it was created in part by appropriations by Congress. How did we part with our interest in it?

Mr. NEAL. The Government never had any interest in it, more than it has in Providence Hospital or in Howard University. The Government appropriated the money from year to year for it.

Mr. MCMILLIN. Did it appropriate money originally.

Mr. NEAL. Possibly it did. A portion of the money by which this institution was maintained was donated to it, and a portion appropriated by Congress. Of course when the appropriation was made and passed into the hands of the trustees the Government ceased to have any interest in it.

Mr. MCMILLIN. Is there any report accompanying this bill?

Mr. NEAL. We had no time to prepare a report.

Mr. MCMILLIN. I think we ought to have a report, and if I am in time I want to make the point of order that there is no report accompanying the bill.

Mr. NEAL. That point of order is too late; though I can write one in a few minutes.

The SPEAKER. Under the standing order of the House the Committee on the District of Columbia has the right to call up such matters as it may choose.

Mr. MCMILLIN. Matters not reported according to the rules?

The SPEAKER. There is no limitation in the authority given by the order of the House to the committee. But the gentleman's point of order would be too late any way, after the consideration of the bill is entered upon.

Mr. NEAL. This institution, the Soldiers' and Sailors' Orphan Home, was incorporated by act of Congress.

Mr. CANNON. I suppose, as the gentleman says, and I have no doubt he is correct, this institution was incorporated by act of Congress. If it has an existence some one has certain rights which Congress has no power to take away.

We are asked by this bill to authorize the transfer of this property, and we do not save anybody's rights. If we can affect their rights at all by virtue of the passage of this bill, do we not thereby pledge ourselves, in the event of the transfer, to make parties whole whose rights may be affected? If it does not have that effect, can it have any other effect; and if not, is there any use whatever for this legislation?

Mr. NEAL. As I have already stated, the trustees themselves have unanimously requested that this bill be passed—the incorporators, in other words.

Mr. CANNON. How about the stockholders?

Mr. NEAL. There are no stockholders in an eleemosynary institution.

Mr. CANNON. Is this purely an eleemosynary institution?

Mr. NEAL. Purely so.

Mr. CANNON. Has the gentleman examined the charter?

Mr. NEAL. I have examined the charter. It is purely a charitable institution.

Mr. MCMILLIN. Can the gentleman tell us what proportion of the money for the establishment of this institution was paid by the Government?

Mr. NEAL. I cannot. Appropriations were made, and also donations. I have never examined into that question.

Mr. McMILLIN. Before the District Committee call upon us to pass this enabling act I think, with all deference, they ought to be able to show the House what interest the Government has in the institution and what has become of the funds already appropriated.

Mr. NEAL. The Government has no interest in it. The Government appropriated $60,000 to build Providence Hospital, but it has no more interest in it than the gentleman from Tennessee has.

Mr. COBB. I think I can explain this matter.

Mr. NEAL. Very well; I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. COBB. I do not know that my recollection is absolutely accurate; but I at one time examined into this matter, and, according to my understanding, this institution was based upon a desire made for the education of orphan children of soldiers and sailors of the late war—orphan children under the age of fifteen years. The institution was organized with a board of trustees, at the head of which was Judge Cartter. Without aid, as I understand, from the Government, but by means of donations and by money derived from festivals, fairs, &c., the trustees raised sufficient funds to obtain the property which they now own and to carry on the institution until there ceased to be any cestui que trust, because of the children who were to be educated attaining the age of fifteen years. The property is now left upon the hands of the trustees without any use for it whatever. It is true they are paying a janitor to take care of it, for it is valuable property, estimated to be worth about $42,000. It stands just beyond the new State Department building.

Mr. BLOUNT. If my friend from Indiana will allow me a question, I desire to ask him, as a lawyer, to whom this property now belongs?

Mr. COBB. Why, it is in the hands of the trustees.

Mr. BLOUNT. I am not asking whose hands it is in, but in whom is the title?

Mr. COBB. It belongs in legal contemplation to the trustees. They own it, though perhaps they cannot convey it without some additional legislation.

Judge Cartter, one of the judges of the supreme court of the District, with whom I had a conference and to whom I put the very question which the distinguished gentleman from Georgia has put to me, is of opinion that if an enabling act be passed authorizing the board of trustees to make conveyance of this property for any purpose (and he suggested this particular purpose to me two years ago) the trustees would take the risk of conveying it. As it is, there is no claimant to the property; it belongs to the trustees in legal contemplation. The trustees, as Judge Cartter informs me, have written to Europe and elsewhere where the testator who made the bequest formerly lived, and they can find no one capable of taking this property even by descent. But the property belongs to these trustees by devise. If the object of this bill is to devote the property to a purpose which is proper in itself, I confess I see no reason for declining to give to the board of trustees the right to make the conveyance, if we are satisfied the Government incurs no risk or responsibility in the future by such an act.

Mr. ROBINSON, of Massachusetts. Has the original property which came to this orphans' home by devise for a certain purpose been all expended?

Mr. COBB. No, sir; I understand there is a portion of it——

Mr. NEAL. It has all been expended. Judge Cartter, with whom I had an interview a few days ago, so stated.

Mr. COBB. Then I am mistaken in my recollection.

Mr. NEAL. He told me it had all been expended.

Mr. ROBINSON, of Massachusetts. Is the gentleman informed whether the property now remaining in the possession of the trustees under the devise is real estate?

Mr. COBB. No, sir. According to my recollection—I am not certain about it, for I did not charge my memory with the facts—the devise consisted of money, and the real estate was purchased by the trustees.

Mr. ROBINSON, of Massachusetts. And I understand from year to year Congress has appropriated money which has served to keep up this institution.

Mr. COBB. I presume Congress has, although it has not for the last four or five years.

Mr. ROBINSON, of Massachusetts. If the original investment has been expended, and its support has come from appropriations of Congress, it might be in the power of Congress to give some direction or authority as that here proposed; but if the original property remains in the trustees, I submit whether Congress has the power and whether it is not in a court of equity.

Mr. COBB. The property yet belongs, of course, to the trustees.

Mr. BLOUNT. I wish the gentleman to yield to me.

Mr. COBB. It belongs to the trustees for this object.

Mr. ROBINSON, of Massachusetts. If devised in trust on terms specifically stated in the law, I submit Congress could not change the character of that trust and its purpose, but that would belong to a court of equity in case that trust should fail.

Mr. COBB. I discussed that question with Judge Cartter, and he was confident this bill or something like it would give them the power they desired.

Mr. ROBINSON, of Massachusetts. I have great confidence in his opinion about it, but we are not informed as to the facts.

Mr. NEAL. A few days ago Judge Cartter informed me this bequest had been exhausted and that the property remaining was such as had been derived as the gentleman from Indiana has stated.

Mr. COBB. A small portion of it is on hand.

Mr. NEAL. Yes; but a small portion.

Mr. McMILLIN. I wish to offer an amendment, which I think will be acceptable to the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. NEAL. Let me see it; and in the mean time I will yield to the gentleman from Georgia for ten minutes.

Mr. BLOUNT. Mr. Speaker, this matter has come to this House for consideration unaccompanied by any report of an explanatory character. But this debate has disclosed certain facts about it in reference to which there is no dispute. This property was conveyed to certain trustees for the education of the orphan children of the soldiers of the late war under fifteen years of age. The time has arrived when that fund can no longer be used for the purpose designed by the donor. Therefore the property would revert to the heirs of the donor.

It is said the title rests in the trustees. That is true. They hold the property; but the trustees are willing to convey this property to the Garfield Hospital Association if Congress will authorize them to do it.

Mr. NEAL. I wish to ask the gentleman——

Mr. BLOUNT. Not now.

Mr. NEAL. If we put in a provision that this shall not bind the Government will the gentleman be satisfied? I am willing to amend it.

Mr. BLOUNT. I do not wish Congress to touch this property in any shape or form. Pass this bill and the question will go to the courts and the courts will rule against the Government, and then the plea will be made that the Government is in honor bound to see this conveyance is made good to this association.

Now, Mr. Speaker, this is but an effort to commit the Government to this Garfield Hospital. This is just the beginning. No man can gainsay without an amendment in there that Congress may say to-morrow it will commit itself to it. The best way for us, as I believe, is not to touch it at all. We do not need any such association, and I will send to the Clerk's desk to be read the opinion of eminent physicians of this city as to that fact.

The Clerk read as follows:

A publication bearing the signatures of a number of medical gentlemen has recently appeared in the daily press of this city. Certain statements therein made are calculated to mislead, and are disproved by the following facts:

First. "The sick poor of all classes, creeds, and nationalities" residing in the District of Columbia now have provided ample hospital accommodations where they can gratuitously receive kind attention and skillful treatment.

Second. For the "large floating population which is domiciled in the hotels, boarding houses, and apartments," existing hospitals provide accommodations, meeting every want, at a reasonable cost.

Third. Any "deserving poor white man or woman" in the District of Columbia can secure proper hospital accommodations and treatment without being subjected to conditions that should not be imposed upon them.

The hospitals affording the above-mentioned accommodations indicate by their names their wide field of usefulness. The Columbia Hospital for women provides all that is necessary for the treatment of the special diseases of female pay or pauper patients. The children's hospital is an institution exclusively devoted to the medical and surgical treatment of children, and provides all needed accommodations for such patients. St. Ann's Infant Asylum accommodates all destitute infants left to its care. The Freedman's Hospital is "mainly a hospital for the sick of the African race," but is open to white patients and is satisfactorily fulfilling its mission. The alms house hospital accommodates a class that drifts into such institutions. The Emergency Hospital, located near the center of the city, is prepared to attend accidents and emergencies. Providence Hospital, under the charge of the Sisters of Charity, has public wards to which free patients are admitted, and private wards and rooms for pay patients at rates ranging from $6 to $20 per week. It receives an appropriation from Congress for the maintenance of transient sick paupers admitted upon the order of the Surgeon-General United States Army. Resident pauper patients are admitted at the request of the sanitary officer Metropolitan police, a request that is never refused.

It is thus seen that Providence Hospital cares for all the sick poor, transient and resident, who apply for treatment, "and there is no distinction made on account of creed, nationality, or color."

The above statement and the additional fact that the capacity of the hospitals heretofore mentioned has always exceeded the demand must make it plain to the observant that the hospital accommodations of the District of Columbia more than meet all present requirements, and that while separately performing their allotted duties the combined work of these institutions creates a general hospital in its best form, a condition of separation which accords with the approved laws of hygiene.

Should the future demand increased accommodations, it will be wiser by donations and appropriations to enlarge the powers of existing organized institutions than by too ambitious and hasty action run the risk of creating a standing bid for pauperism. For it is to be feared that a superabundance of hospitals here might entice a class not desired by our citizens or legislators.

Mr. BLOUNT. A single word more, and I am done. My friend from Ohio asked me a few moments since if I would be satisfied to authorize this conveyance provided we were to add to the bill a provision declaring that the United States Government should not be committed by its action here taken; in other words, that the Government would not make itself responsible. Did I understand that to be the question?

Mr. NEAL. The gentleman from Tennessee has an amendment which he will offer which covers that ground.

Mr. BLOUNT. But was that the question that the gentleman asked me?

Mr. NEAL. Substantially that; it will be found in the amendment which the gentleman from Tennessee is about to offer.

Mr. BLOUNT. Before that amendment is offered I desire to say to my friend from Tennessee and to the gentleman from Ohio a single word. What is the proposition that is made here? Here is a piece of property which it seems to me no lawyer of any reputation would say the Government had any title to or any control over, and yet we are asked to authorize the disposition of that piece of property as contemplated by this bill and convert it to a different purpose from which its donors originally intended, and then after doing that declare that the Government shall not be committed thereby. That in substance is the position that we are sought to be placed in.

Now, Mr. Speaker, it seems to me that it would be an immoral thing for the Government to authorize the conveyance, or make this interference, this unlawful interference, with vested rights, and then assert that it was not responsible. That is just what is proposed to be done here; that and nothing more.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

Mr. McMILLIN. I have an amendment which the gentleman from Ohio yields to me to offer, providing that this shall not be construed to make the United States liable.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will send the amendment to the desk to be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Provided, That this act shall not be construed to make the United States liable in any way on account of said transfer or the change of the direction of the trust.

Mr. McMILLIN. It has been suggested, Mr. Speaker, that possibly the Government would be held liable to the cestui que trust in this instance, and this is intended to fortify against that.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. NEAL. I yield three minutes to the gentleman from Georgia, [Mr. BUCHANAN.]

Mr. BUCHANAN. Mr. Speaker, I have no objection to the object this bill seeks to accomplish. The objection I have to it is that I do not believe it can effect the purpose which the gentleman in charge of the bill seems to believe that it can accomplish.

If these trustees have title, then they need no enabling act to authorize them to convey this property. If they have no title, no enabling act can put a title in them and no enabling act can enable them to convey the title if they have no title in themselves. Consequently I can see no good this bill is going to accomplish. If these men have title, they do not need the act. If they have no title, this bill cannot confer title upon them; and if they have no title they can convey none. That I apprehend is clear and ought to be sufficient to everybody to establish the fact that no fruit can result from the passage of this bill and bring it into an act.

It is admitted here, Mr Speaker, that this property was a trust, and that the persons that now have the control of the property and the management of it took it as trustees. It is admitted, on the other hand, that the trust has been executed, that it is an executed trust, and whenever a trust is executed it is the duty of the trustees to convey that property to whoever has the legal right and title to it.

If this property was a donation by a private individual, then, if that private individual is in life, the property will revert to him upon the execution of the trust; but if he is not in life, then it will go to his heirs or legatees if he made provision by will for it to go there. So I say that this will be useless legislation. We cannot effect anything by it, for if there is no title in these trustees, as I have before stated, you cannot give them a title by any such legislation, while if they have a title they do not need this law.

Mr. NEAL. I wish to say but a single word in response to the remarks of the gentleman from Georgia. This property does not come by devise, but it is, as has been already stated, a bequest of money for a specific purpose.

Mr. BUCHANAN. It does not matter; the same principle will apply if this property was the result of a money bequest.

Mr. NEAL. This property was purchased, and Judge Cartter, who is one of the ablest lawyers in the District, deems it essential that these trustees should have such an act as this passed in order to enable them to transfer the property as proposed. There can be no objection whatever to it with the amendment which has been incorporated on motion of the gentleman from Tennessee.

Mr. BUCHANAN. But the gentleman from Ohio will see that if this was money or land which was bequeathed it makes no difference; if it was a trust, the court of equity will treat it in accordance with the facts as they exist; if it was a bequest of land, it will be treated as land; or if it was money which was invested in lands, it will be treated in the same way.

Mr. NEAL. But this bequest had been accepted, and the money for which the property was purchased came from other sources.

Mr. BUCHANAN. That does not matter.

Mr. NEAL. And now a word in answer to the gentleman from Georgia in reference to the paper which he has had read, and which is signed by various physicians of the city. I desire to say to him that almost every respectable physician here asks, and has asked time and again, for the establishment of this hospital. They want a hospital where they can take their patients, not a hospital that is under the charge of any religious denomination.

Mr. BLOUNT. Does the gentleman question the respectability of those physicians whose names are signed to that paper?

Mr. NEAL. No, sir; I do not. I did not say all, but nearly all the respectable physicians——

Mr. BLOUNT. There are many whose names are there who will be recognized as being at the head of their profession.

Mr. NEAL. And if there be one such there, there are ten on the other side.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the passage of the bill.

The question being taken, there were—ayes 69, noes 22.

So (further count not being called for) the bill was passed.

Mr. NEAL moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

QUIETING OF TITLE.

Mr. URNER. I am instructed by the Committee on the District of Columbia to call up from the House Calendar the bill (H. R. No. 2402) to quiet the title to certain land in Washington, District of Columbia, and to ask the House to pass it.

The bill was read as proposed to be amended by the committee, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to quitclaim and release unto the heirs, devisees, and assigns of Joseph Pearson, deceased, their heirs and assigns, all the right, title, and interest of the United States of America in and to all of squares 670, 671, 672, 710, and 711 in the city of Washington and District of Columbia, as the same are laid down on the original plat or plan of said city: Provided, That this act shall not render the United States liable for any costs, expenses, or damages in relation to the land hereby directed to be quitclaimed and released.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the passage of the bill.

Mr. CONVERSE. I desire some explanation should be made. This relates to a very large and valuable tract of land.

Mr. URNER. The explanation of the bill is this: this land has been in possession of Joseph Pearson and those claiming under him for sixty years. They have had it in undisputed possession, claiming title to it and paying taxes on it. The party mainly in possession now is the widow of the late Carlile P. Patterson. Since Mr. Patterson's death it has been discovered there is a cloud upon the title.

The property originally belonged to one Robert Brent, who was a paymaster-general of the United States Army. Brent was indebted to the United States and made a conveyance to three trustees, and also made a will in which he named the same parties as trustees for the same purpose. After the death of Robert Brent there was a bill filed in equity under which the same trustees were appointed and a decree in chancery was obtained for the purpose of selling the property under the deed of trust. The property was sold. These lots were purchased by one Pleasanton, Fifth Auditor of the Treasury at that time, for Joseph Pearson, who was one of the trustees and could not buy in his own name; but the testimony in the case is clear that the property was bought for him. He exercised acts of ownership over it in his lifetime, and those claiming under him have had undisputed possession ever since; and the United States have not lost one cent so far as these squares are concerned. It is only a question as to the removal of a cloud on the title of these lands.

Mr. CONVERSE. Was the indebtedness of Brent finally paid to the Government?

Mr. URNER. So far as these lots are concerned, the property was purchased in the name of Pleasanton. But as the memorandum of the auctioneer shows, as the deed from the surviving trustee, Robert Y. Brent, shows, as the certificate of the Solicitor of the Treasury shows, and as the letter from the attorney of the District, Colonel Corkhill, shows, there was no loss to the Government so far as these lots are concerned.

Mr. CONVERSE. I do not understand what the gentleman means by saying "so far as these lots are concerned." Was the purchase price of these lots paid into the Treasury to pay Brent's debt?

Mr. URNER. Yes, sir.

The bill was passed.

Mr. URNER moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. HISCOCK. I rise to move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the purpose of resuming the consideration of the sundry civil appropriation bill. And before that, I move to dispense with the morning hour.

Mr. BROWNE. I ask unanimous consent to introduce two bills which I have had in my desk for three weeks.

There was no objection.

OFFICERS OF VOLUNTEERS NOW IN THE ARMY.

Mr. BROWNE, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 6730) to fix the date of entry into the military service and to correct the record of officers now in the regular Army who served as officers of volunteers and the regular Army; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

WILLIAM H. MILAM.

Mr. BROWNE also, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 6731) granting a pension to William H. Milam; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions, and ordered to be printed.

WOMAN SUFFRAGE.

Mr. WHITE, by unanimous consent, introduced a joint resolution (H. R. No. 255) proposing an amendment to the Constitution of the United States; which was read a first and second time.

Mr. RANDALL. Let the joint resolution be read at length.

Mr. WHITE. It relates to woman suffrage.

The joint resolution was read, as follows:

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, (two-thirds of each House concurring therein,) That the following article be proposed to the Legislatures of the several States as an amendment to the Constitution of the United States, which when ratified by three-fourths of the said Legislatures shall be valid as part of said Constitution, namely:

"ARTICLE —.

"SECTION 1. The right of citizens of the United States to vote shall not be denied or abridged by the United States or by any State on account of sex.

"SEC. 2. The Congress shall have power by appropriate legislation to enforce the provisions of this article."

The SPEAKER. The joint resolution will be referred to the Select Committee on Woman Suffrage.

Mr. ATKINS. It should go, I think, to the Committee on the Judiciary. It involves a great legal question.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state to the gentleman from Tennessee that the House adopted a resolution requiring the appointment of a Select Committee on Woman Suffrage, to which committee all matters relating to that subject were required by the very terms of the resolution to be referred.

Mr. ATKINS. I did not suppose that committee would have jurisdiction of amendments to the Constitution.

The SPEAKER. It has jurisdiction of all matters relating to that subject; and this is the only way in which the subject could be reached.

The joint resolution was referred to the Select Committee on Woman Suffrage, and ordered to be printed.

GEORGE JUENEMAN.

Mr. BUCK, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 6732) to authorize the Court of Claims of the United States to ascertain the amount of special damages sustained by George Jueneman by the change of grade of a certain square in the city of Washington; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia, and ordered to be printed.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. HISCOCK. What is the regular order?

The SPEAKER. The regular order is the motion of the gentleman from New York [Mr. HISCOCK] to dispense with the morning hour for the call of committees for reports.

Mr. HISCOCK. Then I call for the regular order.

The SPEAKER. Two or three gentlemen desire to introduce bills for reference; but if the gentleman insists upon the regular order——

Mr. HISCOCK. At least a dozen gentlemen have asked me to yield to them and in every instance I said I would not. They said they would be satisfied if I did not make fish of one and flesh of the other. They have gone away satisfied and I propose to live up to the engagement I made with them.

The SPEAKER. The regular order being insisted upon the question is upon the motion to dispense with the morning hour for the call of committees for reports.

The motion was agreed to, two-thirds voting in favor thereof.

SUNDRY CIVIL APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. HISCOCK. I now move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the sundry civil appropriation bill.

The motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, Mr. KASSON in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is now in Committee of the Whole for the further consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 6716) making appropriations for the sundry civil expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1883, and for other purposes.

The pending paragraph was as follows:

For the publication of the Official Records of the War of the Rebellion, both of the Union and confederate armies, as follows:

For continuing the publication of the Official Records, and printing and binding, under direction of the Secretary of War, of 10,000 copies of a compilation of the Official Records, Union and confederate, of the war of the rebellion, so far as the same may be ready for publication during the fiscal year, to be distributed as provided in the act approved June 16, 1880, $33,000.

Mr. HISCOCK. I have consented that this paragraph be passed over for the present, and until the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. SPRINGER,] who wishes to offer an amendment, shall be here. I ask, therefore, that the paragraph be passed over now, to be returned to when the gentleman comes in.

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the following:

For artificial limbs: For furnishing artificial limbs and appliances, or commutation therefor, and transportation, to be disbursed under the direction of the Surgeon-General of the Army, $150,000.

Mr. BROWNE. I move to strike out the paragraph just read, and to insert in lieu thereof what I send to the Clerk's desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

For artificial limbs: For furnishing artificial limbs and appliances, or commutation therefor, and transportation, $150,000; Provided, That hereafter all appropriations for furnishing artificial limbs and appliances, or commutation therefor, transportation, and surgical appliances for persons disabled in the military or naval service, including the unexpended appropriations made by the act of March 3, 1881, shall be expended and disbursed in the manner prescribed in section 4789 of the Revised Statutes.

Mr. BROWNE. I do not desire to discuss the proposed amendment. It is made at the suggestion of Judge Lawrence, the Comptroller of the Treasury, and is approved by the Pension Bureau, and I believe by the Surgeon-General's Office.

Mr. ATKINS. Would it not be well enough to insert after the words "military or naval service" the words "of the United States?"

Mr. BROWNE. I consent to that modification. This amendment will restore the law to what it was in 1876, and as is provided by the Revised Statutes. I have here the letter of the Comptroller on the subject; but I do not deem it necessary to encumber the RECORD with it. I understand there will be no objection to the favorable consideration of the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will ask the gentleman whether he wishes to insert the word "therefor" after the word "appropriations," so that it will read "including unexpended appropriations therefor made by the act of March 2, 1881?"

Mr. BROWNE. I will insert that word.

The amendment as modified was then agreed to.

The Clerk read the following:

That from and after the passage of this act the board of managers of the National Home for Disabled Volunteer Soldiers shall apply the excess above $5 monthly of the pensions of all inmates of the National Home for Disabled Volunteer Soldiers to the support and the objects and purposes of said home: Provided, however, That the above provision shall not apply to any inmate of said home who, having wife, at the time of his admission to said home, minor child, or parent dependent upon him for support, shall apply the excess of his pension above said $5 each month to said support. The said board of managers shall annually report the amount of pension money received by them under the above provision.

Mr. SHULTZ. I desire to move——

Mr. CONVERSE. I make a point of order on that paragraph.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order will be reserved until the gentleman on the left of the Chair [Mr. SHULTZ] shall have stated his object in rising.

Mr. RANDALL. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. CONVERSE] makes a point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. That the Chair understands is reserved.

Mr. CONVERSE. My point of order is that this clause is new legislation, changing the present law.

Mr. SHULTZ. I move to strike out the paragraph beginning at line 1192——

Mr. CONVERSE. I make that point of order on this clause, and I shall also make it on the next clause.

The CHAIRMAN. The next clause has not yet been read.

Mr. RANDALL. No amendment is in order pending a point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair recognizes the colleague [Mr. SHULTZ] of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. CONVERSE] on the left of the Chair for some purpose. He has not yet stated that purpose.

Mr. ATKINS. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. CONVERSE] has not made his point of order under the rule.

The CHAIRMAN. He has not had an opportunity to do so, owing to the interruptions of other gentlemen.

Mr. ATKINS. He simply says that it is new legislation. If it retrenches expenditures it is in order under the rule.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair begs the gentleman from Ohio on the left [Mr. SHULTZ] to state his object in rising.

Mr. RANDALL. The gentleman has stated it; it was to amend.

Mr. SHULTZ. I move to strike out the paragraph.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman does not make any point of order on the paragraph?

Mr. SHULTZ. I do not.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. CONVERSE] insist upon his point of order?

Mr. CONVERSE. I do; but I am willing to hear the gentleman upon his motion.

Mr. HISCOCK. We may as well have the point of order disposed of, without listening to any argument upon an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will listen to gentlemen on the point of order. The Chair understands that the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. CONVERSE] yields to the gentleman from Ohio on the left [Mr. SHULTZ] if he desires to argue the point of order.

Mr. RANDALL. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. CONVERSE] yields to me. The point of order is based upon the third paragraph of Rule XXI, which provides:

Nor shall any provision in any such bill or amendment thereto changing existing law be in order, except such as, being germane to the subject-matter of the bill, shall retrench expenditures by the reduction of the number and salary of the officers of the United States, by the reduction of the compensation of any person paid out of the Treasury of the United States, or by the reduction of amounts of money covered by the bill.

The pending provision of this bill does not show on its face, so far as I can see, that it retrenches expenditures.

Mr. HISCOCK. The point of order, as I understand, is aimed at the provision that all the pensions of inmates of soldiers' homes, less the sum of $5 per month to each pensioner, shall be turned in to the support of the home of which the pensioner is an inmate. If this is not in the direction of economy to the Government and is not a reduction of expenditures on the part of the Government—turning into the soldiers' home a fund which does not belong to the Government for the support of the home—I certainly am unable to conceive what provision would retrench expenditures or be in the direction of economy. The annual appropriation for the support of these institutions must be reduced to an amount corresponding with the sum turned in from these pensions.

The CHAIRMAN. Unless some gentleman desires to argue the point, the Chair is of the opinion that the direct inference——

Mr. McCOOK. Before the Chair makes his decision I wish to call attention to the fact that my colleague, [Mr. HISCOCK,] in arguing the point of order, admitted distinctly and in so many words that the money which the Government proposes to take from these crippled soldiers does not belong to the Government. While I would have no objection to seeing the provision go out on a point of order, I would prefer to see it struck out by a vote of the Committee of the Whole.

Mr. HISCOCK. It seems to me there can be no doubt on the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is of opinion that from the language of the provision there is a direct inference that it would retrench expenditures by the Government for this object. The point of order is overruled. The Chair entertains the motion of the gentleman from Ohio on the left [Mr. SHULTZ] to strike out the paragraph.

Mr. SHULTZ. I move to amend by striking out, on pages 49 and 50 of the bill, lines 1192 to 1218, inclusive.

The CHAIRMAN. The motion must be confined to the paragraph under consideration, which concludes with line 1204. The gentleman from Ohio moves to strike out the paragraph from line 1192 to line 1204.

Mr. SHULTZ. Mr. Chairman, I make this motion as a matter of simple justice to the wounded soldiers who are now inmates of the various soldiers' homes throughout the country. I hope the motion will prevail. I desire to present and have read as a part of my remarks the petition of 1,108 inmates of the National Home near Dayton, Ohio, respectfully protesting "against the passage of the bill now pending before Congress known as the 'board of managers bill.'"

The Clerk read the petition, as follows:

To the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States in Congress assembled:

The undersigned beneficiaries of the Central Branch National Home for Disabled Volunteer Soldiers respectfully protest against the passage of the bill pending before Congress known as the "board of managers bill," providing that the board of managers of the National Home for Disabled Volunteer Soldiers shall apply the excess above $5 per month of the pensions of all inmates of the home to the support and objects and purposes of said home, &c. Your petitioners object to such act for the following reasons:

1. It is not necessary. Ample provision has already been made by Congress for all honest purposes, and a sequestration of pensions for the purposes of the home or for its support and objects is not required.

2. The people do not ask for such legislation, and so far as we are informed no citizen of the United States has ever objected to the usual appropriations for such purposes.

3. It is unjust. There are about 4,500 inmates at or belonging to the central branch of said home, and of these about 1,500 are pensioners. Of the 3,000 non-pensioners a very large proportion are not even claimants for pension, their disabilities not having been contracted in the service. This bill would take the money of the maimed and disabled and appropriate it to the support and maintenance of those not entitled to it under the law granting pensions.

4. Another objectionable feature of the bill is that those disabled most must make the largest contributions to the support of those least disabled. Under existing regulations the benefits accruing to the pensioner in excess of $5 per month consists of food and shelter only. He is required to purchase his own clothing, and pay all other expenses, while the non-pensioner is provided with clothing, tobacco, stationery, postage, &c., free of cost, and we respectfully submit that this discrimination against blind and limbless men by the managers of the home should be sufficient to satisfy even an enemy.

5. That clause of said bill confiscating arrears of pension, would, in many cases take from men large amounts of money that was due them before the National Home existed, and in most cases it would take money that was their due for years before they became inmates of the home, or were the recipients of any benefits therefrom. The injustice of such a measure must be evident to every member of Congress who will give the matter a single thought. While remonstrating against this unjust measure your petitioners would also earnestly protest against statements persistently made by interested parties to the effect that we are profligate and worthless, and should not be intrusted with the expenditure of money accruing from our pensions. We aver and maintain that in morals, manners, and intelligence we will compare favorably with any equal number of men taken promiscuously from this country, or from any other country on the face of the globe, and that this indiscriminate slander and condemnation of a large body of men, because some of them may be the victims of vice, should not receive any consideration from Congress, or in any way influence their action in the premises. If we are bad men the managers have the power to turn us out of the home, as they have turned out other bad men; but we protest that they should not be authorized to confiscate our pensions because other men are bad. We therefore earnestly remonstrate against the passage of said bill, and pray that the old and honest policy of the Government, which protects the pension for the individual use of the men who earned it, may not be departed from, and as in duty bound we will ever pray, &c.

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. Mr. Chairman, this provision of the bill was inserted by the Committee on Appropriations upon the unanimous request of the managers of the soldiers' homes, but, I must believe, under a misapprehension on their part. It will be observed that the clause as it now stands limits this deduction to the pensions of those who have no families or relatives depending upon them. Hence, the number of those who would be deprived of their pensions under this provision is not large. The provision was suggested, as intimated in the memorial which has been read, upon the ground that some of the recipients of these pensions were inclined to be dissipated, and to abuse the money which they received in this way. But it is conceived that the number of those who are reckless and profligate is very small; and while undertaking to correct an abuse of this kind great injustice would be done to a large number of maimed and crippled men who are inmates of the soldiers' homes.

An investigation by my honored colleague, [Mr. SHULTZ,] who possesses rare advantages for ascertaining the facts in this behalf, and by other gentlemen, discloses the fact that great injustice would be done by withholding this pittance from men who have suffered greatly in the service so that they are compelled to go to these soldiers' homes. The amount which would be deducted is not large so far as the Government is concerned, but it is considerable to these pensioners in the way of securing for them comforts, not to say luxuries, which they cannot otherwise obtain. The amount which the Government would save, if anything, is very inconsiderable.

I hope, therefore, that the amendment offered by my colleague to the pending paragraph, as well as that which he has suggested to the succeeding paragraph, will be adopted as a simple matter of justice to these maimed men who I am sure the managers of these institutions did not intend to injure in any wise, but whose interests they desired to protect. While the measure recommended might operate as a protection to a few, I am apprehensive it would be injurious and unjust to a very great many.

Mr. RANDALL. I wish to ask the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. BUTTERWORTH] whether the existing law requires that where a pensioner has a wife or a minor child or a parent or any one else dependent upon him, the excess of the pension above $5 per month shall go to such dependent.

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. I will say to my honorable friend from Pennsylvania, my understanding is they receive now the whole amount. I do not think it provides for paying it to the wife or family, but is placed at the disposal of the pensioner.

Mr. RANDALL. I am desirous of voting with the gentleman from Ohio in this connection, but it does seem to me it would be a wise provision where a disabled soldier has any one dependent upon him that a part of his pension should go to the wife or children or other person dependent on him.

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. The suggestion of the honorable gentleman is a good one, because there are undoubtedly cases where the money intended for the support of the family or other dependent person may be diverted into other channels.

Mr. RANDALL. Yes; squandered and wasted.

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. There is no doubt that is the truth.

Mr. RANDALL. I shall be willing to go that far, and no further.

Mr. HISCOCK. Let the amendment be again reported.

The amendment was again read.

Mr. HISCOCK. That is the amendment now pending.

The CHAIRMAN. That is the pending amendment, and debate is exhausted on it.

Mr. HISCOCK. I move to strike out the last word. Now, Mr. Chairman, I have no special feeling in reference to this amendment, but I think it is entirely proper I should put the committee in possession of all the facts which bear on the amendment and the provision which is sought to be stricken out.

Under the statute as it is now the very class of people from whom we take their pensions in excess of $5, in my judgment, are not entitled to pensions at all if the statute were rigidly enforced. This is the language of the statute:

And such of these [referring to the pensioners] as have any child or parent dependent on them, on becoming inmates of this home or receiving relief therefrom shall assign thereto their pensions when required by the board of managers during the time they shall remain therein or receive its benefits.

Now, the practice there has always been to exact this assignment of the pensions of those inmates and the managers of the home have been accustomed whenever an inmate left to give him the pension, they not having expended it but holding it in trust for him, or on his death distributing it according to any will he might make or under the State law of distribution.

We believe it is entirely proper we should enforce the provisions of the law, which I have read, in a mild way. I do not believe the managers have the legal right to exercise the discretion they do exercise. We thought it was wise, therefore, to make it incumbent upon the managers to spend in support of the home the excess of each pensioner's pension above $5 per month.

Now, I have this to say about it: it is not a matter strictly in the line of appropriation, but is a general statute and a general system that we are striking at; and it is for every member of the committee to judge for himself what action he thinks best.

Mr. DAWES. As the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations has stated the managers of the Soldiers' Home had authority under the law to take the pensions and keep them for the benefit and use of the soldier and his heirs, and not appropriate them to the use of the home. This is a new proposition, and, as my colleague, the other member on the Committee on Appropriations, has very properly indicated, it is unnecessary, and, as a matter of fact, outrageous to the veteran soldiers in our homes, those who have lost their legs or arms or been otherwise crippled. One hundred and twenty-two of them at the Dayton Home, as shown by this report, are drawing pensions from $24 and upward; some $50, some $72; and those men are mulcted—every man drawing $24 is mulcted $19, and those having $72 are mulcted $67 a month, and for the benefit of about three thousand inmates who are not mulcted at all. It is an absurd provision and should be stricken out. I regret exceedingly that such hasty legislation has been incorporated into this bill. I wish the responsibility to be placed where it belongs, upon the managers of the Soldiers' Home. Let me read the letter of General W. B. Franklin upon which this hasty action has been taken:

HARTFORD, CONNECTICUT, April 18, 1882.

DEAR SIR: In compliance with the request of the Committee on Appropriations at our interview of the 15th instant, I have drawn up a draft of an amendment to the pension appropriation bill, which, I think, covers the case. That is, if it be passed, no pensioner who is an inmate of the home without dependent relative can squander more than $5 monthly of his pension, and if he have such relative he must send the pension to the relative, or all above $5 monthly reverts to the home. I sincerely hope that something of the kind will become a law.

Very truly, yours,

W. B. FRANKLIN.

Hon. FRANK HISCOCK, Chairman Appropriations Committee, House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

That is the spirit of this recommendation, and I exceedingly regret that that kind of legislation has been put into an appropriation bill. It is undoubtedly subject to the point of order made by my colleague on the other side of the House, and it ought to be stricken out. I hope it will be stricken out by a vote of the House.

Mr. McCOOK. I desire to say a single word——

The CHAIRMAN. There is an amendment pending.

Mr. HISCOCK. I withdraw the pro forma amendment.

Mr. McCOOK. I renew it. I desire only to say, Mr. Chairman, that I am as heartily in favor of striking out this provision as the gentleman from Ohio himself; and if I desired to detain the committee could give the reasons which would prompt me to favor such action. But I simply take the floor for the reason that I desire to say it seems hardly fair for the gentleman from Ohio to make any reflection even indirectly upon either General Franklin or any other member of this board of managers, for I am sure that all who know these gentlemen personally, while in all respects they may not approve of their management of the homes, will do them the justice to say that they have endeavored to do their whole duty, with the idea in view simply of taking care of the inmates of those homes. But while saying this I believe they have made a mistake in this recommendation, and I hope the committee will vote to strike it out. Still that can be done without making reflection upon them.

Mr. HISCOCK. Mr. Chairman, I desire to say a word in response to what has been said with reference to General Franklin and General McMahon in connection with this matter. It is well known that there are many soldiers who are paupers now in the almshouses, and are receiving no pension, because they are not laboring under any disabilities, either because of wounds or diseases incurred in the service of the country. But yet they were brave and true soldiers, and have become paupers and need assistance from the Government. They need this, for under the provisions of the law they are not entitled to become inmates of the homes. Now, then, General Franklin and General McMahon, in their policy, here pointed out, evince an intention directly to make provision for that class of soldiers; and I desire to say that much in justice to these gentlemen.

Now, then, the committee can do as it pleases about striking out the provision. I do not care about that. If they desire to give the soldiers their pension and support, that is all proper enough, and every gentleman may act in the matter of course according to the dictates of his own judgment. But I desire to call the attention of the committee to the fact that some time it may become the duty of Congress to make provision for the pauper soldiers that cannot receive pensions and are now receiving support from the homes.

Mr. DAWES. Mr. Chairman, I wish to say but a word in response to the remark made by my friend from New York, [Mr. McCOOK,] and that is that if what I have said may be construed into a reflection upon General Franklin by reading his own letter of recommendation, then I am guilty of that without any possible intention of reflecting upon him. But I will do General McMahon also the kindness to read his recommendation and let the committee be their own judges.

Mr. HISCOCK. There is no doubt about the recommendation——

Mr. DAWES. But I want to read the language: I want to show exactly what they do recommend, and I do not want it to be understood that I am making any reflection when I quote their exact language. General McMahon says—and I want to read this also to show what the Committee on Appropriations had before them in making up this bill and see whether they acted hastily or not——

Mr. HISCOCK. They did not act hastily.

Mr. DAWES. General McMahon says:

I think the taking of the pensions will create a stampede from the homes and raise a howl; but at the same time it is just, and if accompanied by legislation authorizing the admission of broken-down non-pensioners disabled by age would result for the best.

Does the Chairman of the Committee on Appropriations say this action was taken upon mature deliberation?

Mr. HISCOCK. That is the point exactly; they meant to leave the law as it is, and make provision for the paupers for whom no provision is otherwise made.

Mr. DAWES. No, sir; we have been able to take care of all of these pensioners and support the homes too; and there is an item in this bill of $600,000 for all of the necessities of the homes. Is not that sufficient to cover all of the estimates?

Mr. HISCOCK. There is no doubt that the amount is sufficient to support the homes.

Mr. DAWES. Exactly; there is the money appropriated for their support. Now, this provision, which should be stricken out, has been hastily put in by the Committee on Appropriations. It has no place in the bill and ought to be stricken out, and I hope it will.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will assume that the pro forma amendment is withdrawn. The question is on the motion to strike out the words which have been read.

The motion to strike out was agreed to.

Mr. RANDALL. I would suggest an amendment, as this paragraph has been stricken out, to insert the following in lieu of the part so stricken out:

That from and after the passage of this act the board of managers of the National Home for Disabled Volunteer Soldiers shall apply the excess above $5 monthly of the pensions of all inmates of the National Home for Disabled Volunteer Soldiers to the support of the wife, minor child or children, or parent depending upon him for support.

I make it for the reason that where there is a dependent on an inmate of the home, the money retained by the provisions of this bill shall go directly to such dependent or dependents.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania had better send up his amendment to the desk.

Mr. RANDALL. I do not know that I will offer any amendment. I merely make the suggestion, and it will perhaps be accepted by the chairman of the committee.

Mr. HISCOCK. Mr. Chairman, I must object to that amendment. I suggest to the gentleman from Pennsylvania that it is hardly wise to incorporate it, and I desire his attention for a moment. I think it hardly wise to put a provision of that kind into the bill, and for this reason: under the statute which I have read, where the pensioner has a wife or child or parent dependent upon him for support, provision is made under the rules governing the home for that portion which is set aside for such dependent relation, and regulations are already in force as to how it shall be applied.

Mr. RANDALL. I have no objection——

Mr. HISCOCK. I ask the gentleman to hear me out. So far as these pensioners are concerned, the period of having children and parents dependent upon them for support is passed; and the only one who would come in as a beneficiary is the wife. The wife there is all the trouble. That is what is the matter. These men go out and get married, or some woman will marry the man for the sake of his pension.

Mr. RANDALL. If the gentleman states the regulations of the home practically secure the object I have in view, I will withdraw the amendment.

Mr. HISCOCK. It might apply to cases of minor children, but there are very few of those.

Mr. RANDALL. I saw the members of the committee themselves had made this proviso.

Mr. HISCOCK. But we struck out the wife.

Mr. RANDALL. I wanted to make it affirmative.

Mr. HISCOCK. We struck out the wife. I have no doubt the bill is right as originally drawn.

Mr. RANDALL. I withdraw the amendment.

The Clerk read the following paragraph:

That all pensions and arrears of pensions payable or to be paid to pensioners who are or who may become inmates of the National Home for Disabled Volunteer Soldiers shall be paid to the treasurers of said home, to be applied by such treasurers as provided by law, under the rules and regulations of said home. Said payments shall be made by the pension agent upon a certificate of the proper officer of the home that the pensioner is an inmate thereof on the day to which said pension is drawn. The treasurers of said home, respectively, shall give security, to the satisfaction of the managers of said home, for the payment and application by them of all arrears of pension and pension moneys they may receive under the aforesaid provision: Provided, That in addition to the persons now declared by law to be entitled to admission to the National Home for Disabled Volunteer Soldiers, any person who served during the war of the rebellion in the Navy of the United States and was honorably discharged therefrom, who is not otherwise provided for by law, and who is incapacitated by reason of wounds incurred in the line of duty or disease contracted during his said service from earning his own support, may be admitted to said home in the same manner and under the same conditions as volunteer soldiers. And section 2 of the act entitled "An act making appropriations for the payment of invalid and other pensions of the United States for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1882, and for deficiencies, and for other purposes," approved February 26, 1881, is hereby repealed.

Mr. HISCOCK. I am compelled to make a motion to strike out a portion of this paragraph. It has been asserted here in the Committee of the Whole that this legislation was hasty, and there has been some reflection on those distinguished soldiers upon whose recommendation we put the legislation in this bill. Having struck out the clause of the bill indicated by the amendment of the gentleman from Ohio, it now becomes absolutely necessary to strike from the bill the provision that from and after its passage "in addition to the persons now declared by law to be entitled to admission to the National Home for Disabled Volunteer Soldiers, any person who served during the war in the Navy," &c. Now, that must be stricken from the bill.

Mr. McCOOK. Why?

Mr. HISCOCK. Because there is not room there for them.

Mr. McCOOK. You mean not room for them in the appropriation.

Mr. HISCOCK. I mean not room enough in the homes for them. It was expected under the provision we put in the bill there were pensioners who would withdraw from the homes, and expecting that we amended the act so as to provide for filling the vacancies occasioned by their retiring by the volunteer sailors during the war. Now that you have stricken out from the bill the provision that looked to the turning of soldiers out from the home, it becomes necessary for me to make the motion I make.

Mr. ATKINS. I think the gentleman from New York ought to explain to the committee why it was expected that soldiers would leave the home if this legislation was put in.

Mr. HISCOCK. It was expected they would leave the home for the reason they would prefer to have their pensions and support themselves rather than to remain in the homes and be supported and surrender their pensions.

Mr. McCOOK. Does the gentleman know the average amount of money a pensioner receives when he talks of a pension supporting a man?

Mr. HISCOCK. In my action on this matter I proceeded on the opinion and judgment expressed by the managers of the home.

The CHAIRMAN. Will the gentleman from New York please to indicate distinctly what is his amendment?

Mr. HISCOCK. I move to amend by striking out, from line 1218 to line 1234, inclusive, the following:

Provided, That in addition to the persons now declared by law to be entitled to admission to the National Home for Disabled Volunteer Soldiers, any person who served during the war of the rebellion in the Navy of the United States and was honorably discharged therefrom, who is not otherwise provided for by law, and who is incapacitated by reason of wounds incurred in the line of duty or disease contracted during his said service from earning his own support, may be admitted to said home in the same manner and under the same conditions as volunteer soldiers. And section 2 of the act entitled "An act making appropriations for the payment of invalid and other pensions of the United States for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1882, and for deficiencies, and for other purposes," approved February 26, 1881, is hereby repealed.

Mr. McCOOK. I hope the gentleman from New York will give us some better reason than he has yet done for that amendment. I am sorry he has made the statement that the purpose of the preceding section, which we have stricken out, was to squeeze out of the soldiers' home the men who are justly entitled to the provision we have made for them. The pension money for them will not on an average exceed $110 per annum. It is their blood money, not in the offensive sense of the word, but a bounty we give them in payment of a right or a claim which they have on the Government. We then, in addition to that, made provision for them in the respective homes. And no legislation proposed to be enacted by the Congress of the United States, in my judgment, should for a moment be entertained if its purpose is to squeeze them out, even to make way for as good men as are the wounded and disabled men of the Navy of the United States.

I do not know the number of men in the Navy who would be affected by this provision or would be entitled to the benefits of the home. But I hope if the homes are not large enough we will enlarge them, and that the motion of the gentleman from New York will not prevail. I hope this effort to make provision for the men of the Navy as well as of the Army will remain in the bill, being one of its unquestionably good features.

Mr. HISCOCK. All there is about it is that we must confront the condition of things. There is nothing else to do. I say now, there is not vacant space in the homes for the volunteer sailors of the war; and I say the provision in the bill which was stricken out, it was expected would in its operation have made space for the volunteer sailors. With that expectation we made this amendment of the law which is subject to the point of order. We amended the general statute so as to entitle those who served in the Navy to be admitted to the homes. But when the other provision is out, this provision must go also, because there is no place there for them.

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. I desire to say to the chairman of the committee that I dissent from the statement it was the general understanding that the clause we have stricken out was inserted or suggested with a view to creating vacancies in the home which might be filled from the Navy. Such an understanding might have obtained; but I do not remember the suggestion having been made. On the contrary, it was, so far as the managers are concerned, intended to protect the best interests of the soldiers and in the direction suggested by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. RANDALL.]

I want to say in behalf of the managers, (and it is due to them that I should say so,) that I do not believe the soldiers have truer friends than they are; and they were looking to their interests in this matter, no matter how much they may have erred as to the means for securing the comfort of these men. I do not know how many will be added to the number in these homes if this clause of the bill shall remain as reported. But I shall vote against striking it out, for there was no understanding, so far as I am concerned, that vacancies would be created by the enactment of the clause which was stricken out on the motion of my colleague, [Mr. SHULTZ.] I do not think the applicants under this provision, which the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations [Mr. HISCOCK] now seeks to strike out, will be very numerous. But as my friend from New York [Mr. McCOOK] suggests, if they are numerous I apprehend there will be room in the homes for them; and if not, then we will enlarge the homes.

The CHAIRMAN. Debate upon the pending amendment has been exhausted.

Mr. HISCOCK. I withdraw the pro forma amendment.

Mr. MOREY. I renew it. I have this to say: if there are soldiers and sailors of the Army and Navy of the United States who have become incapacitated from earning their support by reason of disease contracted or wounds received while in the line of their duty, and who are not yet provided for by this Government, it is the duty of the American people to take care of those wards of the nation whenever they apply to it for those comforts which in battling for their country they have lost the power to win for themselves.

I submit that it is the duty of this Government not only to take care of those dependent men who have lost their limbs or their health in their country's service, but I submit that it is the duty of this Government to provide for their support out of the Treasury of the United States, and not at the expense of the bounty which the Government has extended to any wounded or maimed man. The spirit of the legislation which contemplated that relief should be extended to one class at the expense of those who were drawing pensions from the Government is vicious and unjust.

If there is not room now in our national homes for those who are dependent upon the Government, and who have become dependent by reason of loss of health in service or wounds received in battle, it is time we should enlarge those homes and pay the just debt which we owe to these men. This committee has just said, on motion of my honored friend from Ohio, [Mr. SHULTZ,] that the national home is a monument to the just regard which our Government has for its obligations to the disabled soldiers of the Republic.

This very bill contains an appropriation to cover the full estimate of the expense of supporting these homes and suitably caring for their inmates. It is not pretended that the pension money is needed for that purpose. The recommendations of Generals Franklin and McMahon are not put on that ground. It is said, sir, that many of the inmates, rather than lose that portion of their pensions above $5 per month, would forego its benefits and leave the home, and thereby make room for the disabled sailors whose admission is provided for in the clause which the gentleman from New York proposes to strike out.

He says it must be struck out now, because the provision appropriating the soldiers' pension money to the support of the home has been struck out; that there will not be room to care for the applicants who will come from the ranks of the disabled sailors unless the number of soldier beneficiaries is lessened by presenting to them the option of losing its benefits or of losing their pensions.

Sir, I believe this is not just, or in the spirit of our legislation on this and kindred subjects. I do not believe either that these asylums would be overrun or crowded beyond their capacity. Their history does not justify that conclusion. In the last annual report of the board of managers the following significant and suggestive statement is made:

The increase in the number of inmates during the past year has been four hundred and eighty-three, or about 7 per cent., being less than it has been in any previous year. This fact shows that the number of inmates on the existing basis of admission has arrived nearly at its maximum, as the death-rate must increase in a greater ratio from year to year.

The following statement of ages also appear in the same report:

Thirty to forty	1,893
Forty to fifty	2,798
Fifty to sixty	2,675
Sixty to eighty	1,841
Eighty to one hundred	79

These figures, sir, are silent and pathetic witnesses to the statement of the board of managers that the death rate of our veteran heroes must increase in a greater ratio from year to year.

A few have passed beyond the ripe old age of eighty years, and look back in near a century of their country's history. They have seen it grow from its early beginnings and expand into the grand proportions it has now assumed. In their ripe old age, while they await the summons of the grim harvester, a grateful people throws around them all the comforts and joys that can come to age and decrepitude.

All are marching rapidly forward to that period in years when they must cross the line between time and eternity. In the national cemeteries lie buried more than three hundred thousand of the soldiers of the Republic, who gave their lives that their country might live. Nature has already repaired that loss. Surviving friends may mourn the absence of loved ones who have gone before. Nature has enfolded them in her kind embrace, and annually throws over them the mantle of her beauty, while the swelling tide of our fifty millions of population sweeps on to the glorious possibilities of the future.

Let us now take care of the living and redeem the pledges that were made to them. The Republic said to her sons, "Go forth and battle for your country. The Government will care for the maimed and wounded and those disabled by disease. We will care for the widow and the orphan and for the dependent father and mother who lose the stay of their declining years in a loved and cherished son on the field of battle."

I know that our pension-roll is the largest in the world, and that our expenditures for the heroes of our wars and their families has no parallel in history. That our pension law is a monstrosity, as asserted by the late postmaster-general of the confederacy, [Mr. REAGAN,] I deny. It is in perfect harmony with the spirit of our institutions.

Our Government pays pensions to its soldiers who endured the hardships of the march and were exposed to the dangers of battle, as it agreed to do. Other nations pay them to royalty and to rank.

England gave Lord Nelson and his heirs, $1,310,000; to the Duke of Marlborough and his heirs, $3,320,000; to the Duke of Wellington and his successors, more than $3,000,000; while the heirs of the Duke of Schomberg, who fell at the battle of the Boyne, have drawn from the royal treasury the enormous sum of $3,400,000. No such example can be found in the history of our country.

England's army numbers 131,000 men. The Army of the United States numbers 25,000 men. Her army costs near $100,000,000 per annum. Our Army costs $40,000,000 per annum.

England pays $12,000,000 per year on the average for pensions. The United States pays an average sum since the war of the rebellion of $50,000,000.

But, my fellow-members, our Army and our pensions cost us less than England's cost her. Our Army is the patriotic and loyal citizens of the Republic. We take care of our veterans and of their little ones, and because we are just to them we can call to arms to-day, if needs be, an army that will defy the world.

Our national cemeteries with their sacred dust, our national homes filled with the nation's wards, our pension-roll sending relief and comfort into thousands of homes where otherwise would be hunger and want and suffering, are the monuments a grateful Republic has erected, and the just recompense it pays to those who were its defense and succor in the hour of its extremity.

Mr. CANNON. I would like to ask the gentleman a question.

Mr. MOREY. Very well.

Mr. CANNON. I understand the gentleman to take the position that if there is not now room enough in the soldiers' home to accommodate all the soldiers and sailors who lost their health in the service from wounds or from disease, he is in favor of building new homes to care for them outside of their pensions. Now I want to know if the gentleman is prepared to vote the multiplied millions of dollars necessary to take care of nearly 300,000 men, soon to be 400,000?

Mr. MOREY. I do not admit the premises of the gentleman. But I am willing and prepared to do what I ask the gentleman whether he is willing to do; that is, to pay the just debt which our Government owes to these people.

Mr. CANNON. Certainly.

Mr. MOREY. And I am prepared to say that I will vote to enlarge these homes in order to provide for every man who is incapacitated from earning his support, whether by wounds or disease, whom we have not already provided for.

Mr. DAWES. Does the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] want to squeeze out these veterans in order to make room for others?

Mr. CANNON. I have said nothing about that. I want to know if you want to vote appropriations to enlarge these homes.

Mr. DAWES. And I want to know that from you.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. BAYNE. I commend to the House the statement of the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations [Mr. HISCOCK] in regard to the provisions that are being made for the destitute soldiers of the country. When some time ago a bill was brought before the House, unanimously reported by the Committee on Military Affairs, in favor of establishing a soldiers' home at Erie, Pennsylvania, it was urged that adequate provision had not been made to take care of the indigent and disabled soldiers of the country.

Some reflection was cast at that time by some members upon the State of Pennsylvania. It was said that the bill contemplated merely a local institution. I disclaimed in the most positive and emphatic language that it had any local character whatever, but that the doors of that institution should be open to soldiers from all sections of the country. It was a place admirably adapted to make proper provision for these people. It is the high and solemn duty of the American people to provide for their indigent soldiers. I think no man except one with a heart of stone can deny that proposition.

The question is not the one suggested by the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. CANNON,] whether 300,000 soldiers should be provided with homes. The question is, how many indigent soldiers are there in this country who are unable to take care of themselves, who were honorably discharged from the service, and who rendered good service during the war? How many of that class of men are there in the nation to-day who need the protection, the care, and the providence of this Government? That is the question. Whatever number there may be, whether it be one thousand or ten thousand or one hundred thousand, the pledge of this Government was made to those men when they entered the service that they should not want nor should their families want; that they should be provided for and cared for; and that obligation now rests upon Congress.

I am glad the suggestion was made by the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations that there is now no provision made for those who are in destitute circumstances that have been discharged from the Navy. I agree with the proposition in this bill that such provision should be made, and I must insist further that additional provisions should be made by establishing new homes, until every honorably discharged soldier and sailor who is unable to earn a living shall have a comfortable home during the remainder of his life.

Whether you establish a home in Pennsylvania or not is not the important point. Pennsylvania offers to the Government a fine building and a splendid site to carry out a purpose of this kind, but if you have any hostility to Pennsylvania and desire that this home shall not be located in that State, locate it wherever else you choose and I will vote for it. My object is not to establish a home in Pennsylvania, but to establish somewhere a home for the poor and destitute soldiers of the Republic. If any other State will show equal generosity, put the home in that State. It is the duty of this nation to see that her defenders are well cared for, that not a single one of them shall inhabit a poor-house or when he dies shall be buried among paupers.

The CHAIRMAN. Debate is exhausted. If there be no objection, the pro forma amendment will be regarded as withdrawn.

Mr. CANNON. I renew the pro forma amendment. Certainly no member of this House is going to refuse now or hereafter to vote proper appropriations to discharge the obligation which the people of the United States owe to the soldiers of the late war. But in my question a moment ago to the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. MOREY,] who laid down the proposition that all soldiers suffering from wounds or disease contracted during the late war should have provision made for them in some soldiers' home in addition to the pension provided by law, my object was to ascertain if I understood his position properly, because, without now expressing any opinion upon that proposition, if that is to be done, instead of six soldiers' homes we would have to provide several hundred.

There is another class of people not yet spoken of here, who after all have some claims—persons who are neither pensioners nor inmates of soldiers' homes, but who on account of inability to make the technical proof required have received nothing from the Government, although they served it faithfully and incurred injury in the service, and many of whom now throughout the country subsist upon charity.

Mr. McCOOK. Simply for the information of the gentleman from Illinois, and to answer his economical speech, I want to read to him the provision which was made by Congress on this subject in 1866, when the recollections of the war were fresh and this Government was impressed with the duty of taking care of the men who had saved the Republic. I read from section 4832 of the Revised Statutes:

SEC. 4832. The following persons only shall be entitled to the benefits of the National Home for Disabled Volunteer Soldiers, and may be admitted thereto upon the recommendation of three of the board of managers, namely: all officers and soldiers who served in the late war for the suppression of the rebellion, and the volunteer soldiers and sailors of the war of 1812 and of the Mexican war, and not provided for by existing laws, who have been or may be disabled by wounds received or sickness contracted in the line of their duty.

Those are the men declared by our legislation in 1866 as entitled to the benefits of these institutions.

Mr. CANNON. I was aware of the law the gentleman read, and I want to call the gentleman's attention to the fact that the half dozen soldiers' homes that we now have will not accommodate, I undertake to say, one in twenty of those who are entitled to admission under the law just read. If we make by law this additional provision for admitting persons who served in the Navy as well as in the Army, then gentlemen must come up and make a further appropriation, whether it be $10,000,000 or $100,000,000. Do not shirk the responsibility of carrying out your proposition.

Mr. McCOOK. I do not shirk any responsibility.

Mr. CANNON. If this amendment be adopted in its present shape, I shall be in favor of voting a proper increase of appropriation.

The CHAIRMAN Debate on the pro forma amendment is exhausted. If there be no objection it will be understood to be withdrawn.

Mr. HISCOCK. I renew the amendment.

Mr. ATKINS. I wish to ask the gentleman from New York, [Mr. HISCOCK,] the chairman of the committee that reported this bill, what he meant by the phrase "squeezing out" as used in the debate a few moments ago? Did it not mean something like this: that those inmates of the soldiers' homes who are receiving very large pensions would retire in order to avoid the proposed deduction from their pensions, thus making room for soldiers who receive less pension?

Mr. HISCOCK. I used the term "squeezed out" because it had been employed by another gentleman upon the floor as a term of reproach, as I thought, toward the Committee on Appropriations for their action in this matter. I had no intention of "squeezing out" anybody. We propose to leave to every inmate of every soldiers' home his free volition to take the full amount of his pension and go elsewhere, or to give the amount of his pension less $5 a month to the support of the home, and to stay there and be supported. We supposed the practical effect of this would be to make vacancies which might be filled by soldiers of the late war, for whom otherwise there is no place.

I know there is always surrounding a question of this kind a good deal of sentiment. I feel it largely myself; but this is a practical question; and having stricken out the other provision, let us leave the law as it is, without attempting to amend it. I say this provision should go out of the bill.

Mr. DAWES. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry. What does the amendment of the gentleman from New York propose to strike out?

The CHAIRMAN. The proviso beginning in line 1218 and ending with "soldiers," in line 1228.

Mr. McCOOK. Let me suggest to the gentleman to strike out all from line 1205 to line 1234, inclusive, leaving the law precisely as it is.

Mr. HISCOCK. So far as that question is concerned I can make that amendment. This mode of payment is just and proper. It saves trouble. I say to the gentleman, as a friend of the soldier, he ought to leave that provision as it is if he does not wish to have the money squandered in the possession of middle men, but go to the soldier.

Mr. DAWES. Let me ask the gentleman from New York a question, and that is whether he leaves the arrears of pension as the property of the pensioner?

Mr. HISCOCK. The arrears of pension are the property of the soldier. I understand you have stricken out the provision which gives to the home a part of the pension. We have never attempted to interfere with the arrears of pension. To make the bill perfect, as it should be, with the amendment already made, the lines which I have indicated should be stricken from the bill.

Mr. McCOOK. Why is not the gentleman content with the law as it now stands under the second section of the act approved in 1881, which provides for the distribution of pensions to the inmates of the homes?

Mr. HISCOCK. The managers of the home are better satisfied with this provision.

Mr. McCOOK. The managers of the home were also satisfied with the provision which has been stricken out.

Mr. HISCOCK. I really think the gentleman himself is satisfied with it.

Mr. McCOOK. Perhaps not.

Mr. BAYNE. I wish to offer the following amendment to the amendment proposed by the gentleman from New York.

The Clerk read as follows:

Whereas the Commonwealth of Pennsylvania is the owner of about one hundred and two acres of land situate within the corporate limits of the city of Erie, in said Commonwealth, and known as "Garrison Hill," being the place of the death and burial of General Anthony Wayne, upon which premises there has been erected a large and commodious brick building by said Commonwealth, at a cost of about $110,000, for a marine hospital; and

Whereas it is represented that the Commonwealth of Pennsylvania will cede title to and jurisdiction over said lands and buildings to the Government of the United States upon condition that said Government shall, upon acquiring title to and jurisdiction over the same, as soon thereafter as practicable, establish thereon a home for such of the honorably discharged soldiers and sailors of the United States as shall have served in the late or any war, and who are now or may hereafter be in destitute or indigent circumstances and unable to earn a livelihood, or who may now or hereafter be inmates of poor-houses or other eleemosynary institutions, or in any manner dependent upon public charity for support, and who are excluded from the benefits of the national soldiers' and sailors' homes or asylums now established by law, by reason of their not having been discharged from the military or naval service of the United States for wounds received or disabilities incurred while in actual service: Therefore,

Be it enacted, &c., That upon condition that the Commonwealth of Pennsylvania cede to the Government of the United States the lands, buildings, and property aforesaid, with jurisdiction thereover, for the objects and purposes hereinbefore mentioned, the Government of the United States shall thereupon establish and maintain upon said grounds a national home for such of the honorably discharged soldiers and sailors of the United States as shall have served in the late or any war, and who are now or may hereafter be in destitute or indigent circumstances and unable to earn a livelihood, or who may now or hereafter be inmates of poor-houses or other eleemosynary institutions, or in any manner dependent upon public or private charity for support, and who are excluded from the benefits of the national soldiers' and sailors' homes or asylums now established by law, by reason of their not having been discharged from the naval or military service of the United States for wounds received or disabilities incurred in actual service.

Mr. HISCOCK. I make the point of order, Mr. Chairman, that that amendment to the amendment is clearly out of order. In the first place, because there is a bill pending before the House on the same subject, and in the second place, it is new legislation and increases expenditures, as it asks for an appropriation.

The CHAIRMAN. The amendment which has been read by the Clerk is evidently the substance of a bill pending before the House, and the Chair therefore sustains the point of order and rules the amendment out of order.

Mr. HISCOCK's amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

UNDER THE NAVY DEPARTMENT.

Appropriation for transit of Venus, 1882:

To enable the Secretary of the Navy to organize parties to observe the transit of Venus in December, 1882, $75,000: Provided, That this appropriation shall be expended, subject to the approval of the Secretary of the Navy, under the direction of the Transit-of-Venus Commission created by the act approved March 3, 1871, and the provision in the act of March 6, 1882, creating the Superintendent of the Nautical Almanac an additional member: Provided further, That the Secretary of the Navy be, and he is hereby, authorized to detail a vessel of the Navy to convey parties to such points selected for the observation of said transit of Venus as are not otherwise easily accessible: Provided further, That all officers of the Government serving with the parties engaged in observing the said transit of Venus shall be paid the regular compensations and allowances from the appropriations for the support of the branches of public service to which the said officers are severally attached; but allowances for traveling expenses, quarters, and subsistence shall be paid out of this appropriation, or, in lieu thereof, the said Transit-of-Venus Commission may substitute a fixed sum per diem, for the expenditure of which bills properly receipted by the recipients, with the approval of the presiding officer of the said commission, shall be sufficient vouchers to the accounting officers of the Treasury: And provided further, That no part of this appropriation shall be covered into the Treasury until the objects for which it is made shall have been accomplished.

Mr. HARRIS, of Massachusetts. I move to add the following:

To enable the Secretary of the Navy to remunerate the officers and crew of the United States steamer Alliance, for extra clothing, mess stores, and purchases by them during the cruise of that vessel in the Arctic Ocean in search of the exploring steamer Jeannette, $8,000.

Mr. HISCOCK. I am compelled to make the point of order on that amendment until the gentleman makes some explanation of it.

Mr. HARRIS, of Massachusetts. Does the gentleman reserve his point of order?

Mr. HISCOCK. I make it now, but will hear the gentleman state the facts, to see whether it is subject to the point of order or not.

Mr HARRIS, of Massachusetts. The United States ship Alliance was ordered by the Navy Department to go to the arctic region and search for the lost steamer Jeannette, but no provision was made for the extra clothing required in that northern region. The officers were obliged to expend about $90 apiece to furnish the necessary clothing for that region, and the sailors about $45 apiece. This matter was referred to the Secretary of the Navy, who recommends the passage of this provision appropriating $8,000 to enable him to reimburse the officers and sailors of that ship.

Mr. ATKINS. I desire to ask the gentleman if this was not a volunteer expedition?

Mr. HARRIS, of Massachusetts. Not so far as the officers and sailors on board of the ship were concerned.

Mr. ATKINS. It was so far as the officers and men are concerned, as I understand it.

Mr. HARRIS, of Massachusetts. I do not so understand it. I ask that the letter of the Secretary of the Navy be read in this connection; but before that I desire to say that at any rate a United States ship with officers and crew went on that expedition, and they were obliged individually to spend money for the purchase of necessary clothing to protect them against the rigors of the climate. I ask that the letter of the Secretary be now read.

The Clerk read as follows:

NAVY DEPARTMENT,
Washington, D. C., February 24, 1882.

SIR: I have the honor to transmit to you a memorial of the officers and seamen of the United States steamer Alliance, asking to be reimbursed for extra clothing, mess stores, &c., purchased during the cruise of that vessel in the Arctic Ocean in search of the steamer Jeannette.

It is only proper that I should state at the same time that I believe the request to be reasonable and just, and hope that your committee will take such action as will relieve the memorialists.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

WILLIAM H. HUNT,
Secretary of Navy.

Hon. BENJAMIN W. HARRIS,
Chairman, &c., House of Representatives.

Mr. HARRIS, of Massachusetts. I hold in my hand also a memorial of the officers and crew of the steamer, in the following words:

To the honorable the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States in Congress assembled:

This memorial of the undersigned officers, seamen, and marines of the United States steamer Alliance respectively represents:

That in June, 1881, the United States steamer Alliance, Commander George H. Wadleigh, United States Navy, commanding, under orders of the United States Navy Department, proceeded from Norfolk, Virginia, to the Arctic Ocean on the coasts of Ic land, Norway, Greenland, and Spitzenbergen, during the months of July, August, September, and October, 1881, in search of the missing Bennett exploring steamer Jeannette;

That this voyage was not in the ordinary routine of a man-of-war cruise;

That the cruise was made in an inclement and tempestuous part of the world;

That the United States Navy Department had no fund disposable to supply the officers and crew of the Alliance with the extra clothing and mess stores necessary for their health and comfort on such a cruise;

That the officers, seamen, and marines, incurred an average personal expense of $90 per officer and $45 per man.

Your memorialists therefore appeal to your honorable bodies to take the necessary action to refund from the United States Treasury to the subscribers the sums above mentioned.

This memorial is signed by the officers and crew of the steamer, and accompanying the same is a letter from Commander Wadleigh requesting that the memorial, which has the permission of the honorable Secretary of the Navy, be presented to Congress.

The Committee on Naval Affairs adopted a resolution early in the session, which I have in my hand, recommending the Committee on Appropriations to put into some of the appropriation bills an amount sufficient to reimburse these officers and men. That resolution was sent to the Committee on Appropriations through the House, and as I understand it was omitted, not by design, from the bill, but I ask that it be now incorporated as an amendment.

Mr. HISCOCK. The point in the case, Mr. Chairman, is simply this, whether a resolution reported to this House requesting the Committee on Appropriations to incorporate into a bill an appropriation for a specific purpose, and referred by this House to the Committee on Appropriations without any direction of the House to the committee to consider the question, is subject to the point of order. I believe that it is. I once told the gentleman from Massachusetts that I would not make the point of order against this item, but when I commenced the consideration of this bill and saw the numerous propositions which were presented from all sides of the House and felt the presure that was brought upon the committee for the consideration of certain items for which it was believed money should be appropriated, I was compelled to make the point of order against all such, and in justice to other gentlemen I must make it against this, much as I regret it.

Mr. HARRIS, of Massachusetts. On the 2d day of May the gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. DEZENDORF,] a member of the Committee on Naval Affairs of this House, introduced a resolution from that committee, which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, in the following words:

The Committee on Naval Affairs, to whom was referred the memorial of the officers and crew of the United States steamer Alliance, praying for remuneration for extra clothing, mess stores, &c., purchased during she cruise of that vessel in the Arctic Ocean in search of the exploring steamer Jeannette, respectfully report back the same to the House with a recommendation that it be referred to the Committee on Appropriations, asking that they insert an item in the naval appropriation or other bill covering the amount asked for, namely, $8,000.

When I called the attention of the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations to this subject he replied, you can move that as an amendment to this bill.

Mr. HISCOCK. I did.

Mr. HARRIS, of Massachusetts. Now I have moved it as an amendment. I understood him to say that he would not make the point of order against it.

Mr. HISCOCK. I think I said even that.

Mr. HARRIS, of Massachusetts. Now I hope the gentleman will not make the point of order upon such a meritorious proposition as this.

Mr. ATKINS. I will relieve the gentleman from New York, for I am bound to make the point of order myself.

Mr. HISCOCK. Mr. Chairman, admitting all to be true that has been stated so forcibly by the gentleman from Massachusetts, and also the reference of this resolution to the Committee on Appropriations, suppose that we had brought this in as an original proposition in the bill, it would have been subject to the point of order, because we would simply be putting in an equitable claim against the Government upon an appropriation bill. We would be providing for the payment of money not in pursuance of existing law.

Mr. HARRIS, of Massachusetts. If the Committee on Appropriations find it necessary to object to this, I must only abide by the decision of the Chair. But if there is a meritorious proposition in this bill, I think this should be admitted on that account. If we can send a United States ship with its officers and crew into this service in the arctic seas and then refuse to reimburse the officers and men for the necessary clothing which they are compelled to supply themselves with, it seems to me that it lacks very much the appearance of equity and it is a sorry position in which to place ourselves.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair has no doubt as to the propriety of the point of order except what arises from the action of the House with reference to this report of the Naval Committee, which concludes with requesting that the Committee on Appropriations insert an item in the naval appropriation bill or some other bill covering the amount asked for. The Chair would be glad to know if the House itself adopted that report of the Naval Committee.

Mr. HARRIS, of Massachusetts. I understand the report was adopted technically by its reference to the Committee on Appropriations in the manner that I have stated.

Mr. HISCOCK. That is simply a reference of the report.

The CHAIRMAN. That is not equivalent to an adoption of the report, which would be in the nature of a direction on the part of the House to the committee to incorporate it.

Mr. HARRIS, of Massachusetts. Is it not equivalent to a direction of the Committee on Appropriations, when the Committee on Naval Affairs have instructed this to be brought in and it has been presented in open House and properly referred?

The CHAIRMAN. No; no committee can confer authority upon another committee or compel it to bring in an appropriation which under the rule would not be in order. The Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. WAIT. I will now offer the amendment to the bill in favor of which I addressed the committee on Thursday last. I send the same to the Clerk's desk and ask that it be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

For the navy-yard at New London, Connecticut: For quay wall along the river front, in connection with present wharf, $75,000.

Mr. WAIT. In the five minutes allowed me, I will again state in the fewest words possible the grounds on which I ask the committee to appropriate the sum of $75,000 to protect the river-front of the navy-yard on the Thames, in Connecticut, from being seriously injured by the currents of the river and the flow and ebb of the tides.

In 1867 Congress passed a resolution with great unanimity, virtually addressed to the State of Connecticut, saying that whenever the State would donate a tract of land on the Thames River, near New London, with a water front of not less than one mile, which the United States could hold and improve for naval purposes, the Secretary of the Navy should receive and accept the same and at once improve it for the uses for which it was so generously given. In 1868 the Legislature of Connecticut obtained by condemnation and purchase a beautiful site for a naval station on the river Thames, containing an area ample for all the requirements of a first-class navy-yard, with a river front of one mile, executed a proper deed of gift, conveying this valuable property to the United States by an indisputable title, and the latter accepted the same in trust for naval purposes.

As the committee must see, the Government obtained this admirable site for a navy-yard without the payment of a farthing. Such being the fact, I ask the committee if the people of Connecticut have not the strongest claims on the liberality of Congress for such expenditures as are demanded to prevent the yard from being seriously impaired by the washing away of its river front. Ex Secretary Robeson never made a more truthful, and I can with pleasure say honorable declaration than when he said that this site, being acquired through the liberality of the State of Connecticut, the Government was virtually pledged to its maintenance and improvement. The obligations of the United States to the State of Connecticut have been as warmly recognized by his successors in office. All these distinguished officials, naval officers of all ranks, who have at different times visited the yard or been in charge of the same, and the House Committee on Naval Affairs of the Thirty-eighth Congress, who were directed to examine the site and report on its fitness for naval purposes, have all spoken in eulogistic language of its remarkable adaptation for a first-class naval station.

I claim, in conclusion, that Congress, looking at this question from an economic stand-point, should not hesitate to give the sum I have named to keep this yard in proper repair. If this body holds in respect the plighted faith of the nation that this site on the Thames should forever be held and improved for naval purposes, then I ask the committee to stand by the pledges made by Congress in 1867 and do justice to the State which I have the honor in part to represent.

Mr. HISCOCK. I rise to oppose the amendment. There is nothing in the world would give me greater pleasure personally than to see the amendment adopted. But upon the Navy bill we have adopted the policy of not increasing at least the navy-yards of the Government. The policy of the Navy bill and of this bill looks directly to the maintaining of fewer yards than we have now. And I cannot see how in consistency this Congress can commence the building of a new navy-yard when it is conceded on all hands that we have more already than we have use for. I do not know but at some time in the future New London may be adopted as a place for a navy-yard. I do not know but that at the next session of Congress it may be deemed advisable to do it. But even if that shall be done it will do no hurt for us to call a halt here. As to the policy of building more yards or keeping up the establishments in the present yards, we have agreed to postpone a decision until the Secretary of the Navy can have a well defined and settled policy as to what yards he wants, how many yards he wants, and where he wishes them located.

Mr. BUCK. Would you be willing to give a smaller amount than this in the mean time to keep up the present works?

Mr. HISCOCK. What I am willing to do is this: it is claimed that this property was ceded to the United States, and that there was some obligation on the part of the United States if it holds this property to build a navy-yard there. I do not know whether that is true or not. I propose to let this matter remain precisely where it is until the Navy Department can settle its policy, until Congress can settle a policy in reference to the navy-yards. And if we have received this property as a bonus from the State of Connecticut for the erection of a navy-yard on it, and it is not the policy of Congress to build one there, then we should give the land back to Connecticut. We should either do that or go on with the work.

Mr. BUCK. I merely wished to ask the gentleman whether he was willing to vote a less sum than this to preserve the property there until the policy shall be finally settled.

Mr. HISCOCK. I am not willing to do that. If it were necessary to preserve the property and the erections there that a sum should be expended between now and the first day of next December, to that extent I might not object to it. But this is to build a quay-wall that can wait until we come here in December next.

Mr. JACOBS was recognized and yielded his time to Mr. WAIT.

Mr. WAIT. I thank my friend for the courtesy. I wish to respond to what has fallen from the gentleman from New York. I hold in my hand a copy of the resolution passed by Congress in 1867. The gentleman from New York said, if I understood him, that he did not know whether any such legislation as I claimed took place. I will read it. It was in the naval appropriation bill of that year. After appropriating for yards, &c., the act says:

And the Secretary of the Navy is hereby authorized and directed—

Mark the language, "authorized and directed." To do what?

The Secretary of the Navy is hereby authorized and directed to accept a deed of gift, when offered by the State of Connecticut, of a tract of land situated on the Thames River, near New London, Connecticut, with a water front of not less than one mile, to be held by the United States for naval purposes.

What further did the gentleman say? He said that if I was asking an appropriation to preserve the buildings in the navy-yard he would yield to the demand. What is it that I ask? I will state to the gentleman what my demand is. Intelligent engineers report that the banks in front of this navy-yard are being washed away by the tides and by the current of the river until they are being gradually cut down, and the channel in front of the yard is being partially filled and so materially impaired. I ask for an appropriation to prevent the river front from being impaired and the channel from being filled up by the gravel cut from the river bank. It is just as much a matter of repair, of preserving the property from injury, as it would be if I were to ask for money to preserve the buildings from going to decay.

The State of Connecticut has made this valuable donation to the Government of the United States, and, in the language of the Secretary of the Navy, when the Government accepted this gift it was bound in honor to stand by the pledges it then gave to the State of Connecticut. Although that State is small in point of territory, yet its people clearly understand their rights, and are ever ready to assert them. My colleague [Mr. BUCK] unites with me in asking that, in the light of the array of facts which have been fairly presented in support of the amendment that I offered, Congress will deal justly and honorably by our State.

The CHAIRMAN. The time for debate has expired. The pro forma amendment will be regarded as withdrawn, and the question is upon the amendment of the gentleman from Connecticut, [Mr. WAIT.]

The question was taken; and upon a division there were—ayes 26, noes 42.

So (no further count being called for) the amendment was not agreed to.

The Clerk read the following:

For the navy-yard at Mare Island, California: For completing iron-plating shop, $3,000; for continuation of dry-dock, $250,000; for enlarging reservoir, $10,000.

Mr. HISCOCK. I move to add to the paragraph just read that which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

And the said dock shall be completed of granite, unless the Secretary of the Navy shall, upon reinvestigation of the subject, be convinced that the dock can be completed with sufficient strength and durability with other material for less money.

Mr. PAGE. The word "sufficient" should be stricken out and the word "equal" inserted.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will remark that upon an examination of the amendment it appears that originally the word "equal" was in it, but it was erased and the word "sufficient" inserted.

Mr. HISCOCK. The word "sufficient" is the proper word.

Mr. PAGE. I ask that the word "equal" be inserted in place of "sufficient."

Mr. HISCOCK. I do not accept that.

Mr. PAGE. I move that as an amendment to the amendment. Several years ago Congress made an appropriation to build a dry-dock at Mare Island, California. That dock has been perhaps one-half completed of granite, taken from the quarries of that State.

The object of the amendment which has been offered is to continue the construction of the dock of the same material, unless in the judgment of the Secretary of the Navy, after making a re-examination, a dry-dock of equal strength and durability can be built of some other material for this money. Now, if it be left to the Secretary of the Navy, as the gentleman from New York [Mr. HISCOCK] has worded the amendment, "of sufficient strength and durability," he may say that it might be built of wood and be "sufficient" for a short time.

The Government has already expended a large sum of money in constructing this dry-dock. It is over five hundred feet in length, and when completed will be the only dry-dock the United States will have upon the Pacific coast upon which a ship of ordinary tonnage can be repaired. It is important that this work when completed shall be permanent. Nearly one-half of it has been built of granite. To change the material at this time, in my judgment, would be wholly unsatisfactory and would do great injustice to the Government.

If the word "sufficient" is retained, that would place within the power of the Secretary of the Navy to determine as to what "sufficient" meant. If the material is to be changed, the requirement should be that the dock should be of "equal strength and durability." I hope the amendment I have moved will be adopted.

Mr. HISCOCK. The estimate for this work came to Congress without any indication as to the material from which this dock should be built, whether it should be of granite or some kind of concrete. Now, I am entirely willing to leave it to the Secretary of the Navy to take the responsibility of determining whether he will build this dock of granite or of some other material.

It transpires in this case that this subject has been thoroughly investigated by the engineers of the Navy Department, and they have reported to the Department, and I believe it is approved by the late Secretary of the Navy, a plan which looks to putting into the construction of this dry-dock, at least into some parts of it, other material than granite.

Mr. HARRIS, of Massachusetts. What material?

Mr. PAGE. Some kind of concrete.

Mr. HISCOCK. I do not know what it is: I have no idea. I went to the Secretary of the Navy and he stated to me that if the appropriation was made without any suggestion as to the manner of expending the money he possibly might be bound by the action of his predecessor in reference to the use of material for this dock.

We therefore propose to leave this question open to him entirely. I am entirely willing to put in any language in the world that will leave this question to him to determine to use such material as he pleases. If you put in the words "equal strength and durability" it will not leave him sufficient discretion. The expression should be "sufficient strength and durability."

A material might be used for some parts of this work which as a matter of science might not be as strong, perhaps, as granite; yet for all purposes for which the work is intended it would be equally indestructible and equally strong. Therefore it is that I propose to throw upon the Secretary of the Navy the responsibility of using any material that is adequate for the purpose, and not to instruct him upon the question one way or the other.

I understand that the saving by the use of this material in place of granite would be somewhere in the neighborhood of half a million dollars. I propose to leave the responsibility with the Secretary of the Navy, and not by legislation to preclude him from saving this amount of money if he can do so without injury to the work.

Mr. PAGE. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. Debate is exhausted. There are two amendments pending. The pending question is on the amendment of the gentleman from California [Mr. PAGE] to the amendment of the gentleman from New York.

Mr. PAGE. I withdraw my amendment temporarily and move a pro forma amendment to strike out the last word. The amendment of the gentleman from New York would simply put this whole question as to the material which shall enter into the construction of the dry-dock at Mare Island into the hands of the Secretary of the Navy. We do not want it left there. Congress has already appropriated half a million of dollars and more to build this dry-dock of granite; and the plan which has been adopted for the work should not be abandoned because some people who happen to have a patent-right for concrete think that it can be used in this case at great profit to themselves. It is an experiment which this Government ought not to approve.

If this were an original proposition, if the work were now to be commenced, possibly it might be safe to leave to the Secretary of the Navy or to the engineers the question whether it should be constructed of granite or concrete. But here is a work already half completed of granite; but now, as the gentleman from New York says, some engineer who has been sent out there thinks there could be a saving if the remainder of the work were constructed of concrete. The proposition is as ridiculous as it would be after a building had been one-half constructed of marble upon the plan of the Government architect to propose to make the remainder of brick.

I am opposed to putting this matter into the hands of the Secretary of the Navy. He can know nothing about the question personally. The dry-dock at Mare Island is 4,000 miles away from here; and the Secretary of the Navy would have to submit the question to some subordinate, who may be influenced in his judgment by the question whether this patent-right will pay a royalty to his company. I do not say that this would be the case; but this experiment wherever tried has proved to be a failure. This concrete is not of sufficient strength for a work of this kind exposed to the action of the water.

I hope the Committee of the Whole will adopt the amendment, which I shall now renew, that this work be completed of granite, unless the Secretary of the Navy shall cause a re-examination to be made, and upon re-examination shall find that the dry-dock can be completed with other material for less money and still be of the same strength and durability as if constructed of granite. I withdraw the pro forma amendment and renew the amendment I before offered.

Mr. BERRY. The Government of the United States has commenced the construction upon the Pacific coast of a dry-dock which is to be one of the best docks in the world. It will be the only one on the Pacific coast which can be used for the docking of first-class vessels. The Government has appropriated several million dollars for this work; and the finest granite has been used in its construction. The dock is now approaching completion, and to abandon that material and commence to experiment with another would, as my colleague [Mr. PAGE] says, be supremely ridiculous. The policy of the Government should be to finish that dock with that material which is known to be the best in the world. I have, however, no objection to placing the matter in the discretion of the Secretary of the Navy, provided he be requested to complete that dock with material equal in strength and durability to granite.

It was expected that this dock would be completed by the present time; but for some years past the appropriations by Congress have been meager. At the present time we have not a dock upon that coast which is safe for the docking of a first-class vessel. There is an old floating dry-dock there upon which the Government is expending some $40,000 per annum, but it would be hazardous to attempt to dock first-class ships upon that dry-dock. When this amendment is disposed of I shall offer a proposition to increase the amount of the appropriation so that the dock may be completed at an earlier day. I hope that the amendment of the gentleman from New York will not be adopted, unless with the amendment of my colleague providing that the Secretary of the Navy shall be required to complete this dock of material equal in strength to granite.

The CHAIRMAN. Debate is exhausted. If there be no objection the pro forma amendment will be regarded as withdrawn.

Mr. HISCOCK. I renew the pro forma amendment. We stand in this position: here is the recommendation of the Secretary of the Navy, submitting an estimate and asking an appropriation to do a specific work in a given way, and saying that he wants so much money to do it. This is the statement of the late Secretary of the Navy, who says that he can complete this work according to the plan I have submitted for one-half million dollars less——

Mr. PAGE. Where is that report? I would like to see it.

Mr. HISCOCK. Here it is on my desk.

Mr. PAGE. When was it sent here?

Mr. HISCOCK. I received it on Saturday morning.

Mr. PAGE. After this bill was made up?

Mr. HISCOCK. I had examined it previously at the Navy Department.

Mr. PAGE. It was never sent to this House until after the bill was made up.

Mr. HISCOCK. It was sent to me when I wished it for the discussion of this question. It is a part of the records of the Department. The recommendation comes here and says: "I will take the responsibility of completing this work according to a given plan, and of adequate strength and durability, if you will leave it to me, and save half a million dollars over any other plan."

Now, I say to the gentleman from California that this is the recommendation of the last Secretary of the Navy. I do not care to have the present Secretary of the Navy prejudiced by his recommendation, and I am willing to put on this bill such legislation as will leave it an open question for him to consider it anew.

But I say when we confront an estimate proposing to save to the Government half a million of dollars we cannot disregard that recommendation of the Secretary of the Navy by entirely ignoring it. We have, however, gone as far as we can in propriety when we refer it back to the new Secretary of the Navy and say to him, "Take the responsibility on this question."

Mr. PAGE. Let the amendment as it would read be read.

The CHAIRMAN. The first question is on the amendment proposed by the gentleman from California to the amendment proposed by the gentleman from New York, to strike out the word "sufficient" wherever it occurs and insert "equal."

The amendment and the amendment to the amendment were read.

The CHAIRMAN. The first question is on the amendment to strike out "sufficient" and insert "equal."

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 26, noes 40.

Mr. PAGE. No quorum has voted.

The Chair appointed Mr. HISCOCK and Mr. PAGE as tellers.

The committee again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 62, noes 59.

So the amendment to the amendment was adopted.

The amendment as amended was then agreed to.

The committee rose informally, and the Speaker resumed the chair.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. SYMPSON, one of its clerks, announced the passage of the following bills:

A bill (H. R. No. 4173) for the erection of a public building at Brooklyn, New York; and

A bill (H. R. No. 4179) for the erection of a public building at Oxford, Mississippi.

It further announced the passage of a bill (S. No. 1959) granting the right of way to the Arizona Southern Railroad Company through the Papago Indian reservation in Arizona, in which concurrence was requested.

SUNDRY CIVIL APPROPRIATION BILL.

The committee then resumed its session.

Mr. BERRY. I move, in line 1294, to strike out $250,000 and insert $500,000. Now, Mr. Chairman, I wish to say but a few words in reference to this dry-dock at Mare Island, California. The estimate of the Secretary of the Navy was $600,000, and that estimate was sent to the Committee on Appropriations. The necessity for this large appropriation is this: this dock has reached a point in its construction when it becomes necessary to put in the end of the dock next to the water.

The coffer-dam, which was expected to stand for some five years, by reason of the course pursued by Congress in making small appropriations from year to year, has been standing for some nine years, so that it is now in a dangerous condition and cannot be depended upon with any degree of certainty. The appropriation should be sufficient at this time to go forward immediately with the completion of that end of the dock near the water so that it may be safe. The engineers have said that the coffer-dam has become so old and unreliable it may give out at any time, and if such be the case it would cost about half a million of dollars to restore it to its present condition.

It does seem to me, Mr. Chairman, it is poor policy to dole out particular appropriations in small amounts, as has been the case heretofore, barely sufficient to maintain the works without making any material progress toward their completion. It seems to me both economy and wisdom to make a liberal appropriation to carry forward this dry-dock to completion. And therefore, in view of that fact, and of the further fact that the Secretary of the Navy has recommended an appropriation for this work of $600,000, I hope the amendment I have offered will be agreed to, so that this Mare Island dock, instead of being postponed from year to year, will be completed as soon as practicable.

Mr. RANDALL. Will the gentleman permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. BERRY. Yes, sir.

Mr. RANDALL. What will be the expense of this dry-dock when completed?

Mr. BERRY. That is a difficult question to answer, because, as I have said, if Congress continues to carry out the policy of making an appropriation of $50,000 now and $75,000 next year it will require a pretty large amount before the work is completed, and even to continue it in its present condition.

Mr. RANDALL. I would like to ask the gentleman what this work has cost. The amount recommended in this paragraph is $250,000. Now, how much has been expended?

Mr. BERRY. I cannot answer the question exactly, but I will say that there has been perhaps more than a million of dollars expended in the construction.

Mr. RANDALL. How much will be required to complete it?

Mr. BERRY. I can only give an estimate, perhaps $750,000, but I do not pretend to be accurate. The Secretary of the Navy, however, has recommended $600,000, and the time is coming when you have got to put in a caisson and remove the old coffer-dam, which is rotten and dangerous, and therefore an appropriation will have to be made for that purpose. [Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. HISCOCK. I congratulate the gentleman from California that notwithstanding the predictions we have had for the last two years in reference to the dry-dock there, if an appropriation indicated by him was not made, that the sad destruction and deplorable result have not followed. We have been told on every occasion that somewhere from $650,000 to a million dollars was to be expended on this work and that it was absolutely necessary that it should be done. Now what I desire to say is——

Mr. BERRY. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. HISCOCK. Yes, sir.

Mr. BERRY. I wish to ask the gentleman from New York, if he does not know that the large amount of money which is expended every year upon the coffer-dam to keep it from giving way will be saved by completing the work at once?

Mr. HISCOCK. I do not know how that may be. I know this, however, that $250,000 is all the money that can be properly expended there at this time.

Mr. RANDALL. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. HISCOCK. Yes, sir.

Mr. RANDALL. I wish to ask the gentleman from New York to state, if he can, how much this has cost the Government already and what it will cost to complete it?

Mr. HISCOCK. It has cost somewhere between a million and a million and a quarter of dollars, and it is variously estimated that it will cost from $650,000 to $750,000 to complete it.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the gentleman from California.

The amendment was not agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

For navy-yards and stations, $200,000 $50,000 of which may be used in the care and preservation of such yards or stations as the Secretary of the Navy may deem expedient to close.

Mr. BRENTS. I desire to offer an amendment at this point.

The Clerk read as follows:

For the payment of the expenses of a commission to consist of three naval officers, to be designated by the Secretary of the Navy, to select as its for a navy-yard on the Pacific coast at the most suitable point north of the forty-second degree of north latitude, on which they shall make report through such Secretary to Congress, with estimates of cost of establishment of such yard and the necessity therefor, $900.

Mr. HISCOCK. I make the point of order upon that, that it is the enactment of a new law providing for the creation of a commission.

Mr. BRENTS. I hope, Mr. Chairman, as this has been recommended by the Committee on Naval Affairs of the House in the Forty-sixth Congress, and as it is a very necessary work to do, and also as the amount asked for is so small, only $900, that the gentleman will not insist upon the point of order. I would like to have read the report of the committee, showing the importance and the necessity of this work——

The CHAIRMAN, (Mr. ROBINSON, of Massachusetts, in the chair.) Does the gentleman desire to speak to the point of order?

Mr. BRENTS. I was in hopes I would be able to induce the gentleman from New York to withdraw his point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will allow the gentleman to address his appeal to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. HISCOCK. Mr. Chairman, I was told on Saturday most emphatically by members on the floor that I must not trade off points of order, and I regret that I cannot do it in this case.

Mr. BRENTS. I hope the gentleman will withdraw it, at all events for a moment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair understands the gentleman from New York as insisting upon the point of order.

Mr. HISCOCK. I must insist upon it.

Mr. BRENTS. Then I withdraw the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The amendment being withdrawn, the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read the following paragraph:

For lighting the Capitol and grounds: For lighting the Capitol and grounds about the same, including the Botanic Garden and Senate stables; for gas, pay of superintendent of meters, lamp-lighters, gas-fitters, and for materials for electric-lighting, and for general repairs to and purchase of lamps, lamp-posts, and pipes, $30,000: Provided, That the proper accounting officer of the United States Treasury is authorized to allow to be paid to the superintendent of meters, from the appropriation for lighting the Capitol and grounds for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1882, the sum of $1,200, in full for his salary for the said fiscal year, which sum has been withheld from the said superintendent of meters by a decision of the First Comptroller of the Treasury: And provided further, That the said superintendent of meters be hereafter allowed to draw an additional salary of $900 per annum, to be paid by the District government, for his services as superintendent of street-lamps under the said government of the District of Columbia.

Mr. MURCH. I desire to offer an amendment to that paragraph.

Mr. HOLMAN. I reserve the question of order on the last proviso of the paragraph.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Maine [Mr. MURCH] will withhold his amendment till the gentleman from Indiana makes the point of order.

Mr. HOLMAN. I make the point of order that the last proviso is independent legislation.

Mr. HISCOCK. I think if I give the gentleman from Indiana a word of explanation in reference to that clause he will be entirely satisfied with it. The salary is $2,100; and in the distribution of the salary between the General Government and the District of Columbia it is supposed the District should pay $900, and therefore we put this proviso on the bill.

Mr. HOLMAN. Oh, no; this is in addition to the $2,100.

Mr. HISCOCK. No, sir; the salary of this superintendent of meters is $2,100; and this is a partition of the salary between the General Government and the District of Columbia.

Mr. HOLMAN. The General Government providing $2,100, you say he shall be allowed an additional salary of $900 per annum to be paid by the District government. If the object is merely to leave the salary at $2,100, of which $900 is to be paid by the District, I have no objection. But to accomplish that purpose the gentleman will have to amend this. After the statement of salary these words should follow: "$900 of which shall be paid out of the District funds."

Mr. HISCOCK. The bill does not carry any more money than this officer is entitled to receive. Under the decision of the Comptroller of the Treasury this legislation is necessary for the purpose of providing for the payment of this salary by the General Government and the District of Columbia. There is not any doubt about it. It is a matter which was carefully investigated and this provision of law was carefully prepared.

Mr. HOLMAN. I have no objection if the gentleman will add to this "but the salary of the said superintendent shall not exceed $2,100."

Mr. HISCOCK. It cannot.

Mr. HOLMAN. My friend is mistaken. The salary out of the Treasury is $2,100 and this is an additional sum in direct words.

Mr. HISCOCK. The amount is back and unpaid; and this is to authorize the payment of it and charge it where it ought to be charged.

Mr. HOLMAN. Will the gentleman consent to add the words "but the salary shall not be increased beyond $2,100?"

Mr. HISCOCK. I have no objection to that; that is to say, to the provision that his salary from both sources shall not exceed $2,100.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair understands the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] to withdraw the point of order?

Mr. HOLMAN. Yes, sir.

Mr. HISCOCK. The clause as it stands allows to be paid to the superintendent of meters—

For the fiscal year ending June 30, 1882, the sum of $1,200 in full for his salary for the said fiscal year, which sum has been withheld from the said superintendent of meters by a decision of the First Comptroller of the Treasury: And provided further, That the said superintendent of meters be hereafter allowed to draw an additional salary of $900 per annum to be paid by the District government for his services as superintendent of street lamps under the said government of the District of Columbia.

Mr. HOLMAN. It is the words "additional salary" that creates the confusion.

Mr. HISCOCK. That sum of $900 is appropriated in the District bill to pay him. There is no doubt but the legislation is complete as it is here formulated. If adopted it will be complete.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will now entertain the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Maine, [Mr. MURCH.]

Mr. MURCH. I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

In line 1319, after the word "dollars," insert these words:

"Provided, That no more than $1.25 shall be paid for 16-candle power gas for 1,000 cubic feet for lighting the Capitol and Capitol grounds; and in case the Architect of the Capitol cannot contract at these rates, he may substitute other illuminating material, and is hereby authorized to use so much of this appropriation as may be necessary for this purpose."

Mr. HISCOCK. I make the point of order on the amendment.

Mr. MURCH. What is the point of order?

Mr. HISCOCK. I would like to have the amendment reported again.

Mr. MURCH. It reduces expenditure.

The proposed amendment was again read.

Mr. HISCOCK. That is certainly subject to the point of order. I desire to make the point of order on each affirmative provision of the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair desires the gentleman to state his point of order on each separately.

Mr. HISCOCK. I desire to make my point of order to each distinct provision of the amendment. It is possible there are some parts of the amendment that are not subject to a point of order. Certainly that part of the language which provides for other illuminating material without any regard to the expense is new legislation; and there is certainly nothing on the face of the amendment that would show it is to decrease expenditure. So far as that portion of the amendment is concerned which simply provides for the reduction in the price of gas, of course I do not understand that is subject to the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. Passing to the second point, the Chair desires to draw the attention of the gentleman from New York to the fact that the whole provision is for lighting the Capitol and grounds. Therefore the subject of the amendment is plainly germane. The second part of the proposition is that if the gas cannot be obtained at the rate specified some other illuminating material may be obtained within the limits of the appropriation specified in this bill. Therefore, it would seem on its face to indicate the expenditure of a less sum.

Mr. HISCOCK. As the Chair remarks, the amendment provides for some other illuminating material within the limits of the sum appropriated by the bill. But the amendment to be in order must contemplate a less sum than is contemplated by the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is inclined to think the amendment is not subject to the point of order as a whole, as one proposition; and the amendment, the Chair thinks, is hardly susceptible of a division into two distinct parts.

Mr. MURCH. I think the Chair is right. On Saturday last, when I moved an amendment to the provision for illuminating the Executive Mansion and grounds, I spoke from memory, not having before me the documents from which to quote. I have obtained from the Patent Office the American Gas Journal, and I note in that the proceedings of the seventh annual convention held in Philadelphia in October, 1879. The most eminent gas engineers in this country were present at that meeting. It was a meeting held in the interest of the gas manufacturers of the country.

It was demonstrated in a paper read before that convention that the price of gas manufactured by the ordinary process was only 57.36 cents per thousand cubic feet of sixteen-candle power. The gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. BLACKBURN] on Saturday presented tables to this House to show that the gas company in this District was furnishing gas to the Government and to its citizens at a much less rate than it was furnished in other cities which he mentioned. In reply to that I can only say that the degree of robbery practiced upon the citizens of other cities should evoke their condemnation and indignation, and the companies should be compelled to reduce the price of gas. It was demonstrated at the convention to which I have referred that under the Dietrich process (and the whole formula is stated here) gas can be produced for 57.36 cents per thousand feet of sixteen-candle power.

In the manufacture of gas from bituminous coal it was demonstrated that it could be produced for 35.8 cents per thousand cubic feet of sixteen-candle power. I understand that we are paying here in this city $1.75 per thousand feet. Is that so?

Mr. NEAL. We pay $1.47.

Mr. MURCH. With discount off for cash?

Mr. NEAL. No; $1.47 to the Government.

Mr. MURCH. Very well; take it at that. The citizens of the District are paying $1.75 per thousand feet, if paid within five days after the bill is rendered, and, if not, $2 per thousand. I could quote from a great many authorities from Great Britain. I hold in my hand the Plumber and Sanitary Journal, published in Birmingham, England, in which it is shown that the average of gas per thousand feet is only sixty cents all over Great Britain. From my observation of gaslight throughout this country and in Europe, and I have traveled pretty extensively over the European continent as well as on this, Washington gas is the poorest on the face of God's earth.

Mr. KLOTZ. And the owners of the company the meanest.

Mr. MURCH. I will not say anything about the owners of the company; I want to pay my attention exclusively to the gas which we are using here and paying for.

Mr. HAZELTON. Is there any city that furnishes gas for less than it is furnished here?

Mr. MURCH. Yes; the city of Pittsburgh furnishes it for sixty cents per thousand.

Mr. HAZELTON. They get their coal cheaper.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. MURCH. I wish some one would let me have a few minutes more.

Mr. COBB. I will take the floor and yield to the gentleman from Maine.

Mr. MURCH. I thank the gentleman. It is urged here that the price of coal is very high in Washington. The quotations of the price of gas which I have made are based upon coal at $5.50 per ton. Now, coal can certainly be obtained in this city for $1 per ton less than that.

It is unnecessary for me to remind members of this House of the quality of gas in this city. I have already stated what my opinion of it was. I think it is proper to make this reduction in the cost to the Government, and it will save us a number of thousand dollars; not a large amount, but it will perhaps pave the way to an investigation of the several illuminating processes in this country.

I do not want to be especially hard on this company. I want to give it a chance to dispose of its stock at a fair price. I think they can furnish such gas as we have here and make a fair profit at seventy-five cents per thousand feet of sixteen-candle power. But I am willing, as I have proposed in my amendment, to allow them $1.25 per thousand feet, which I have no doubt will yield them a profit of from 75 to 100 per cent. With these remarks I submit the amendment to the judgment of the Committee of the Whole.

Mr. NEAL. I offer an amendment to come in at the end of the amendment of the gentleman from Maine, [Mr. MURCH.] Perhaps he will accept it.

Mr. MURCH. Let me hear it.

The Clerk read as follows:

Provided, however, That no illuminating material shall be substituted which may be more expensive than gas of the quality and price above stated.

Mr. MURCH. That is right, and I accept it.

The question was upon the amendment as modified.

Mr. HISCOCK. I rise to oppose that amendment, and move to strike out the last word. I certainly do not believe that Congress ought to launch itself upon a sea of investigation as to the material we should use in place of gas provided we discontinue the use of that material.

I am opposed to any legislation which looks to a change here and at this time. When some committee shall have passed upon the question and brought in some plan looking to a change in illuminating this city I may not resist it. But without any plan being submitted, simply referring the question to people who may use methods speculatively, it seems to me it would be very dangerous for us to give them that power.

The other day we adopted an amendment to this bill reducing the price of gas per lamp with certain restrictions to $20, I believe. I believe that should be put in this bill, and there let the matter stand.

I therefore move as a substitute for the amendment which has been offered that which I send to the Clerk's desk. It is the same provision which we adopted with reference to lighting the grounds of the Executive Mansion.

The Clerk read as follows:

Provided, That for each burner not connected with a meter in the lamps on the public grounds no more than $20 shall be paid per lamp for gas, including lighting, cleaning, and keeping in repair the lamps, under any expenditure provided for in this act; and in case a contract cannot be made at that rate, the engineer in charge is hereby authorized to substitute other illuminating material in the lamps of the public grounds, and to use so much of the sum hereby appropriated as may be necessary for that purpose.

Mr. MURCH. That is right; I would have offered my amendment in that form if I could have found that provision in the previous part of the bill.

Mr. NEAL. I wish to call attention to the fact that as to a great many of these burners the gas cannot be measured in that way. Take for instance the burners in this building.

Mr. HISCOCK. Then I modify my amendment so as to provide that the pay shall not exceed that rate for each burner. This illustrates the difficulty we have in fixing up an amendment in this way. I see there is great force in the objection.

Mr. CANNON. I doubt the propriety of any of these amendments. I understand upon inquiry that the rate now charged to the Government for this quality of gas per thousand feet is $1.47.

Mr. NEAL. That is correct.

Mr. CANNON. I understand further that this is a cheaper rate than prevails in any city in the United States, unless perhaps it be Pittsburgh.

A MEMBER. Pittsburgh is not so cheap.

Mr. CANNON. We are now getting this gas more cheaply than it is furnished in the other cities of the Union. The amendment of the gentleman from Maine [Mr. MURCH] proposes if the company does not reduce the price to $1.25 per thousand feet for this quality of gas that some other mode of illumination shall be found, not exceeding that rate; and if this cannot be done we are to be in darkness. It seems to me that as we are now getting our gas more cheaply than our neighbors, our best course is to let the matter alone until we are prepared to substitute something else.

Mr. HISCOCK. I withdraw my amendment. On turning back to page 37 of the bill I find the provision there inserted is general in its terms, applying to all the public grounds. The language of the bill at that place, as amended, reads thus:

Provided, That for each burner not connected with a meter in the lamps on the public grounds no more than $20 shall be paid per lamp for gas, including lighting, cleaning, and keeping in repair the lamps, under any expenditure provided for in this act; and in case a contract cannot be made at that rate the engineer in charge is hereby authorized to substitute other illuminating material in the lamps on the public grounds, and to use so much of the sum hereby appropriated as may be necessary for that purpose.

I doubt the expediency of putting in the bill any further provision on this subject.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York withdraws his amendment, and also, as the Chair understands, the pro forma amendment.

Mr. MURCH. I renew the pro forma amendment. I find that the provision in the former part of the bill is under the head of "lighting the Executive Mansion and grounds," and it does not apply to the subsequent paragraphs of the bill. I therefore insist on my original amendment, and withdraw the pro forma amendment.

The question being taken on the amendment of Mr. MURCH, as modified, there were—ayes 43, noes 57.

Mr. MURCH. No quorum.

Tellers were ordered; and Mr. MURCH and Mr. HISCOCK were appointed.

The committee again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 52, noes 66.

So the amendment was not agreed to.

Mr. HOLMAN. I move to amend by inserting, after the word "Columbia," in line 1332, the following:

But the aggregate annual salary of said superintendent shall not exceed $2,100.

Mr. HISCOCK. There is no objection to that.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

Surveying the public lands:

For surveying the public lands, $400,000, at rates not exceeding $9 per linear mile for standard and meander lines, $7 for township, and $5 for section lines, except that the Commissioner of the General Land Office may allow, for the survey of standard and meander lines through lands heavily timbered, mountainous, or covered with dense undergrowth, a sum not exceeding $13 per linear mile for standard lines, $11 for township, and $7 for section lines: Provided, That the part of the sum hereby appropriated which may be apportioned to the surveying district of Louisiana, together with such sums as have been or may be deposited for surveys therein by actual settlers, under sections 2401, 2402, and 2403 of the Revised Statutes, may be, in whole or in part, employed in making such surveys as may be necessary in the discretion of the Commissioner of the General Land Office; and he may also, in his discretion, make resurveys of other portions of the public lands from this appropriation to an amount not exceeding $50,000 thereof, which may be expended for occasional examinations of public surveys in the several surveying districts, in order to test the accuracy of the work in the field, and to prevent payment for fraudulent and imperfect surveys returned by deputy surveyors, and inspecting mineral deposits, coal-fields, and timber districts: Provided further, That no certificate issued for a deposit of money for the survey of lands under section 2403 of the Revised Statutes, and the act approved March 3, 1879, amendatory thereof, shall be received in payment for lands except at the land office in which the lands surveyed for which the deposit was made are subject to entry, and not elsewhere; but this section shall not be held to impair, prejudice, or affect in any manner deposits and contracts made under the provisions of said act prior to the passage of this act.

Mr. ANDERSON. I desire to offer an amendment.

Mr. PAGE. I rise to a point of order.

The CHAIRMAN, (Mr. KASSON.) The Chair recognizes the gentleman from California, [Mr. PAGE.]

Mr. PAGE. I make a point of order upon the second proviso, extending from line 1465 to the end of the paragraph.

Mr. ANDERSON. My amendment relates to a prior portion of the paragraph.

Mr. PAGE. My point of order is only against the proviso.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair so understands and will hear the gentleman on his point of order.

Mr. HISCOCK. If I may be allowed, I desire to offer some amendments to perfect the text before the point of order is ruled upon.

The CHAIRMAN. If there be no objection these amendments will be entertained, the point of order being reserved.

Mr. HISCOCK. I move to amend by inserting a semi-colon after the word "appropriations," in line 1459; by striking out at the same place the word "to," and inserting "and;" also, by striking out, after the word "thereof," in line 1460, the word "which;" so that the clause will read:

He may also, in his discretion, make resurveys of other portions of the public lands from this appropriation; and an amount not exceeding $50,000 thereof may be expended, &c.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. ATKINS. I desire to offer an amendment.

Mr. PAGE. I am willing to reserve the point of order for the present.

The CHAIRMAN. If the amendment of the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. ATKINS] is to perfect the text, the Chair will hear it. Does it apply to the proviso upon which the point of order is made?

Mr. ATKINS. It relates to the preceding part of the paragraph.

The CHAIRMAN. Then the Chair will entertain the amendment.

Mr. ATKINS. I move to amend by striking out, in line 1440, the word "nine" and inserting "eight;" by striking out, in line 1441, the word "seven" and inserting "six;" by striking out, in line 1442, the word "five" and inserting "four;" by striking out, in line 1446, the word "thirteen" and inserting "twelve;" by striking out, in line 1447, the word "eleven" and inserting "ten;" and, in the same line, striking out "seven" and inserting "six."

I make that motion because I am thoroughly satisfied and believe the Committee on Appropriations is satisfied this reduction ought to be made. The amount which has been given for surveying the public lands is altogether out of all question, and it is not only an open secret but a patent fact that there have been immense frauds perpetrated upon the Government in the survey of public lands amounting to millions of dollars.

Mr. HISCOCK. If I may be allowed to make a suggestion it would be that the point of order should be first disposed of. I understand there is a point of order pending looking to this section.

The CHAIRMAN. There is, looking to the proviso of the section made by the gentleman from California, [Mr. PAGE,] but he has withheld his point of order until the text can be perfected.

Mr. ATKINS. I have no objection to having the point of order settled.

Mr. HISCOCK. We ought to know certainly how much of this section is subject to amendment before we proceed to offer amendments to it.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will remark, at the request of the gentleman from New York, an amendment to perfect the text was entertained pending the point of order. The gentleman from Tennessee also desired opportunity to perfect the text, and the Chair suggests he be allowed to proceed, as he has commenced his remarks, the point of order being reserved.

Mr. CANNON. I object to the gentleman proceeding by way of amendment while the point of order is pending to any portion of the paragraph. It can only be done by unanimous consent, because if a part of the paragraph is subject to the point of order then the gentleman's amendment might be a different thing to the section as dismantled and cut off by the point of order.

Mr. ATKINS. I think the gentleman is correct.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is trying to keep the record uniform, but objection being made, the gentleman will withdraw his amendment, and the Chair will now hear the gentleman from California on the point of order.

Mr. PAGE. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order to the proviso, which reads as follows:

Provided further, That no certificate issued for a deposit of money for the survey of lands under section 2403 of the Revised Statutes, and the act approved March 3, 1879, amendatory thereof, shall be received in payment for lands except at the land office in which the lands surveyed for which the deposit was made are subject to entry, and not elsewhere; but this section shall not be held to impair, prejudice, or affect in any manner deposits and contracts made under the provisions of said act prior to the passage of this act.

Now, that proviso changes existing law and does not retrench expenditure. It changes the act of 1879, which I will send to the Clerk's desk to be read. It is section 2403 of the Revised Statutes.

The Clerk read as follows:

An act to amend section 2403 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, in relation to deposits for surveys.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That section 2403 of the Revised Statutes of the United States be, and is hereby, amended so as to read as follows:

"SEC. 2403. Where settlers make deposits in accordance with the provisions of section 2401 the amount so deposited shall go in part payment for their land situated in the townships, the surveying of which is paid for out of such deposits, or the certificates issued for such deposits may be assigned by indorsement and be received in payment for any public lands of the United States entered by settlers under the pre-emption or homestead laws of the United States, and not otherwise."

Approved March 3, 1879.

Mr. PAGE. If I can get the attention of the committee for a few moments I wish to state that the amendment proposed by this bill limits the certificates issued under the act of 1879 and prior acts to be located in the land districts. But I do not desire to discuss the point of order unless I can have the attention of the Chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is sending for the Revised Statutes and is giving attention to the gentleman from California.

Mr. PAGE. May 25, 1862, Statutes at Large 410, and 1864, Statutes at Large, 414, and March 3, 1871, 16 Statutes at Large, 521, the law provided for a deposit system. It provided that actual settlers on the public lands might make a deposit with the surveyor-general for the survey of their lands. They entered on the land, made their homes there, waited for Congress to make an appropriation, which it never did make, to survey their lands, and for years, going on making improvements, they have waited for authority to go on and complete their titles to their lands.

In 1861–'62 this law was passed, and afterward from time to time amended, extending its scope and providing that settlers on the land should make deposits on survey certificates to be authorized by the United States surveyor-general, and the scrip they were entitled to was to go in payment of the land upon which surveys were made.

In 1875 Congress amended prior acts by providing the section I have had read at the Clerk's desk, enlarging the scope by providing these deposits when made and the scrip when issued might be used to locate any of the public lands of the United States, subject to homestead and pre-emption entry under the homestead and pre-emption laws.

Mr. KASSON. The gentleman refers to the act of 1879?

Mr. PAGE. Yes, sir; I mean the act of 1879, and not 1875. This proposes to repeal that act; and I hold in my hand a letter to the honorable chairman of the Committee on Appropriations, dated June 7, 1882, in response to a letter from that gentleman. It is as follows:

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR,
Washington, June 7, 1882.

SIR: I am in receipt of communication of 3d instant from your committee inclosing Senate bill No. 859, "A bill to amend an act entitled 'An act to amend section 2403 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, in relation to deposits for surveys,' approved March 3, 1879," and informing me that your committee contemplate the incorporation of the same in the sundry civil appropriation bill, now being prepared, and asking, in view of that fact, if I consider it necessary to send revised or amended estimates for the survey of public lands, especially for the general item, page 189, Book of Estimates for 1883.

I have the honor to reply that, should said bill 859 become a law, it would be necessary to increase the estimate for surveying the public land from $400,000 to from $1,000,000 to $1,250,000, and that the item of $50,000 on page 190 for examination of public surveys should in any event be appropriated, as of the greatest importance to the service and to the public.

I am, however, of the opinion that said bill (S. No. 859) should not become a law. Its effect would be to repeal the act of March 3, 1879, "An act to amend section 2403 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, in relation to deposits for surveys."

To clearly understand said act of 1879, and the purpose it was intended to subserve, it is necessary to refer to prior legislation on the same subject and to the mischief said act was intended to remedy.

By the system of surveying the public lands, contracts are made with deputy surveyors by the United States Surveyor-General for the survey of such parts of their respective surveying districts as upon inquiry and representations made are found to most need surveys. The number of settlers and character of the land are both considered in determining where the surveys which can be made in any one year should be made.

As the appropriations are limited, and when parceled out among the several districts give but a small amount to each, but two, three, or four small contracts, as the case may be, are possible, or consequently many communities greatly in need of surveys must go without them because others need them still more, and for successive years settlers wait in vain for surveys. The laws, both pre-emption and homestead, invite settlement on unsurveyed lands, and the Government is thereby under implied obligations to furnish surveys to those who settle, within a reasonable time, as otherwise great inconvenience, hardship, and loss, constituting positive injustice, inevitably result to the settler.

Until the land is surveyed he cannot obtain title, and he not infrequently has to wait five, ten, or fifteen years before securing a survey, while others on surveyed lands, under the same laws, obtained title within one or five years, according to the laws under which they proceed. This is simply equivalent to requiring of one settler a residence and cultivation as a prerequisite of title of perhaps four times the period required of another, a manifestly unjust discrimination between citizens equally meritorious. Further, the settler on unsurveyed lands cannot know his boundaries. This results in conflicts, disorder, disputes, and ultimate litigation between coterminous proprietors. The most valuable and permanent improvements made before survey are frequently when surveyed cut off from the body of a claim also largely improved, and a part has to be surrendered in the face of an adverse occupation and the claim rearranged with loss and vexation. No permanent and valuable improvements can be made on unsurveyed lands with satisfaction or safety and subsequent amicable arrangement is, when possible, an expensive and onerous method of relief, and its necessity ought not to be needlessly imposed.

The hardships referred to, and above only in part illustrated, were sought to be relieved by act of May 30, 1862, (12 Stats., 410.) This act and resolution of July 1, 1864, (Stats., 414,) and act of Congress of March 3, 1871, (16 Stats., 581,) are found in revised sections 2401, 2402, and 2403, which in substance provide that where settlers in any township not mineral or reserved desire a survey they may apply in writing therefor to the surveyor-general, and deposit in a United States depository, to the credit of the United States, a sum sufficient to pay for such survey, together with all expenses incident thereto, without cost or claim for indemnity on the United States, and thereupon it is made lawful for the surveyor-general, under instructions from the Commissioner of the General Land Office, and in accordance with law, to make the survey. The deposit is deemed an appropriation for the objects contemplated, and is placed to the credit of the appropriation for the surveying service by the Secretary of the Treasury, and the amount so deposited goes in payment for the depositor's lands situated in the townships so surveyed.

This was the law as it stood prior to the act of March 3, 1879. If for any reason the settler who had paid his money for surveying the Government land could not perfect his title, or if he desired to obtain title under the homestead law, under which a long period of residence and cultivation are made the consideration instead of money payment, or if he misdescribed the township to be surveyed and for which he deposited, (which was often the case, as mistakes in estimating the numbers of an unsurveyed township were very easily made,) he had contributed his money to the Government without recourse, for he could not assign his certificate of deposit, and could not use it in any other township than that in which he lived, because he had no claim in such other township. If the amount deposited for the survey was in excess of the value of the depositor's claim he lost such excess.

Assuming that it was the duty of the Government to survey its own lands, the loss to the settler, as above, was absolutely unjust and imperatively called for an adequate remedy, and the act of March 3, 1879, was enacted as such remedy. It changed the prior laws by simply providing that the certificates issued for deposits for such surveys might be assigned by indorsement, and be received in payment for lands entered under the pre-emption and homestead laws, and not otherwise, and thus the surveys are paid for directly in land.

Inasmuch as surveys under this system are made at rates fixed by law, and in all respects in the same manner, and by and through the same method and machinery as under stated appropriations, except that the settler advances the money which the Government afterward repays, there can be no objections to surveys made under the deposit system which do not apply with equal force to surveys made under annual appropriations by Congress.

This method has this advantage, that surveys can be made where, when, and to just the extent that the necessity for them exists; while it is manifest that Congress can at the best only approximate the amount annually needed, (and such approximation is, in the nature of things, quite improbable,) and if it should, the surveying contracts would be made at the commencement of the fiscal year, when the necessities of any one district could not be accurately known or estimated for the entire year, and in certain localities to the exclusion of others. This would, in practice, actually result.

The magnitude of the mischief of the old law and the perfect remedy furnished by the act of March 3, 1879, would seem in the interests of the multitude of settlers now seeking homes on the public lands, no less than in the interest of the General Government, so intimately connected therewith, to justify the intention of the act now sought to be repealed.

The only objections which have been or can be urged against the present law is that it is possible that lands may be surveyed in which there was no settlements, or on lands of no present value, and I understand that some allegations to that effect have been made. The evidence, however, on which such allegations are based is in my judgment quite unsatisfactory and inconclusive, and, if it is true at all, it is doubtless to a very limited extent; and any evil which can so far be possibly established is utterly disproportionate to the positive benefits conferred by said law.

If it be a fact that some surveys have been made of lands not settled upon, while it would prove an evasion of the law, yet the Government loses nothing. It pays for the surveys, certainly, but unsettled lands are surveyed under annual appropriations and the lands in both cases ought to be surveyed, and are the sooner settled in consequence. Moreover, it is impossible to survey any considerable extent of land in the unsurveyed regions without including a certain amount which are properly regarded as waste lands.

But this popular estimate of what are waste lands is most unreliable. But a few years since the eastern part of Washington Territory, Dakota, and other regions, were generally regarded as valueless for agricultural purposes, while they are now swiftly becoming of national importance because of their agricultural worth. Under the desert-land act large areas of unsurveyed waste lands have been entered and redeemed by expensive systems of irrigation, and the existing law is made available to secure the necessary surveys.

During the last fiscal year the appropriation by Congress for surveys was $300,000, and the amount deposited for surveys was a little over $1,800,000, and this large amount of itself when considered with the suggestions of fraud created apprehension. Proof of any wrong to an extent beyond what is incident to the stated annual appropriation has not been made; and the extent of the surveys, after the public became acquainted with the law, is overwhelmingly indicative of their necessity and of the prior neglect of the Government in not sooner making them, or providing the now existing remedy.

The law as it now stands is right; and the only abuse to which it can be subject is rendered possible because there has been no provision made for an effective inspection of surveys in the field. This abuse is, however, as possible and probable under the usual appropriation as under the increase of such appropriation by depositors. The amount annually appropriated for examination of surveys and the manner of their execution is ridiculously insufficient. It suffices to pay the expenses of examination into some incidental alleged irregularity as a brief inspection of a very small portion of a single contract, but when divided up between sixteen surveying districts is obviously of trifling value.

Under existing methods, all surveys substantially are approved without examination.

Under proper methods no surveys should be approved without examination.

The Government should know that the money paid for surveys is properly expended and the surveys faithfully made, with permanent legal monuments, and this should be provided for by a suitable appropriation, and the estimate of $50,000, hereinbefore referred to, is essential to that end. The expenditure of the annual appropriation by Congress without an intelligent inspection, whereby its proper disbursement for honest work is assured, is a flagrant departure from common business procedure and ordinary prudence.

It is my best judgment that the said act of March 3, 1879, ought not to be amended, and that at least $50,000 should be appropriated for examination of surveys, and I recommend accordingly.

Said bill is herewith returned.

Very respectfully,

H. M. TELLER, Secretary.

Hon. FRANK HISCOCK,
Chairman House Committee on Appropriations.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I am not stating whether this is a good or a bad law, or whether it should be repealed or not, but simply that when it is repealed it shall be repealed in the usual way. The Secretary of the Interior says that it is a good law, and that it ought not to be repealed, and his recommendation ought to have some weight.

Now let me read what has been done under the deposit system. I hold in my hand a statement from the Commissioner of the General Land Office to which I desire to call the attention of the committee. The following are the sales of public lands and surveys that have been made and the amounts turned into the Treasury for the years 1880 and 1881; and also from July 1, 1881, to May 31, 1882, which was after this law went into effect. From this table it will be seen that the sales of the public lands in 1880 were 9,152,357.62 acres. In 1881 it amounted to 10,762,957.18 acres; while from July 1, 1881, to May 31, 1882, there were 13,714,266.77 acres disposed of.

Now, the receipts for 1880 amount to $2,283,118.65. For 1881 it was $4,401,708.47, and from July 1, 1881, to May 31, 1882, there was sold and put into the Treasury of the United States $7,417,498.45; so, while there has been a large increase in the surveys of the public lands every year, the increase in three years has jumped from two millions and some two or three hundred thousand to seven million and four hundred and odd thousand dollars. The increased cost of the surveys has not been proportioned to the amount of money received from the sales of the public lands under that system.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman is speaking to the point of order?

Mr. PAGE. I am speaking to the point of order to show that the only claim that this provision can have under the rule to permit it to escape the point of order is that it retrenches expenditures, and in order to show what it is, and its effect, and why it is obnoxious to the point of order I am calling attention to these facts and figures. I desire also to repeat that the estimates made by the Commissioner of the Land Office and by the Secretary of Interior show that this appropriation must be increased as I have stated if this proviso is incorporated.

Now, it cannot retrench expenditures for the reason that I have stated, and that is all that makes it admissible under the rule. Why does it not reduce expenditure? Because under the law, when parties apply for a survey of the public lands in order to obtain title to their homes upon which they have resided for many years, they make a deposit of money to the surveyor-general and file an oath that it is for the purpose of surveying the lands to which they are entitled, and are required to state the value, &c., of the improvements. They are then required to bring two responsible witnesses to certify to the character of the applicant, &c. The surveyor-general is then to order the survey upon payment of an amount that cannot then be determined, but enough to cover the expense of the survey. That amount can only be estimated, and when they pay the money into the Treasury they get the certificate; but the survey is made under the same law as all other surveys and at the same rate per linear mile or acre, no more nor less; and all this bill seeks to do is to prevent the certificates from being transferred, which is not in the interest of economy, for they cover only the same amount of land, although the cost is greater. In other words, the public lands survey themselves under the present system of law and cost a certain amount, which is provided by the system. Strike out this proviso and these parties would then pay to the Department the actual cost of the survey, and consequently the surplus would be less. Under the present law the certificates issued shall be put upon an equal number of acres, whether in the district, township, or State.

This bill seeks to limit that right and curtail the privilege as to where these lands may be taken up, whether in one place or another. It covers one hundred and sixty acres of land under the pre-emption law or eighty acres under the homestead law; and it cannot be economy to cut it down, nor can it be economy, as the Chair will see, to repeal the present law. Now, that this proviso does repeal the existing law there can be no question. The letter of the Secretary of the Interior shows that to be the case. I have thus very hurriedly enumerated some of the main points in support of the objection I urge against this proviso. I think the point of order will clearly lie against it.

Mr. WASHBURN. I desire to say a very few words on the point of order. I wish I had an opportunity to speak on the merits of the case, but I presume I shall not have that opportunity.

So far as the point of order is concerned, it is as clear as the sun in heaven that the putting of that proviso in the bill does retrench expenditure. Last year the appropriation for the surveys in this country was $300,000. That was the appropriation made by Congress directly. The result was under this abuse of the deposit system nearly $2,000,000 in addition to the $300,000 were expended. By this provision that is to be prevented and under the deposit system they will not be able to go on and deposit one, two, or three, or five million dollars to survey lands for which there is no earthly use except to put money in the hands of surveying contractors.

Mr. PAGE. If the gentleman from Minnesota proposes to discuss the merits I shall want an opportunity to reply.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Minnesota as speaking in the same line as the gentleman from California [Mr. PAGE] did. The gentleman from Minnesota will proceed.

Mr. WASHBURN. Now, I claim we could have retrenched in the last year, 1881, nearly $2,000,000 if this provision had been incorporated in the appropriation bill at that time. If that is not retrenchment, if that does not come within the rule, I do not know for what the rule is made.

Mr. Chairman, under this deposit system in the State of Colorado there were $405,000 put up to survey—what? Wild lands that would not be called for in half a century. Why, sir, during 1881, of the nearly eight millions of acres of land surveyed in Colorado only about 200,000 acres were taken up. In California the amount under this deposit system was $265,000, almost as much as is the entire appropriation for surveys. In the Territory of Wyoming $261,000 was expended for surveys, and only the little, pitiful amount of 48,000 acres of land taken up, showing the surveys made were in advance of the requirements of settlement and that they were made in the interest of contractors.

I am not prepared to prove, but it is my belief, that three-fourths of these surveys made under this deposit system are fraudulent. I believe that the surveys are not made. We have had no provision by which these surveys could be examined. I believe in the wilds of Colorado, in the wilds of New Mexico, in the wilds of Wyoming that thousands and hundreds of thousands of acres have been reported surveyed, field-notes returned, and maps made where the white man never placed his foot.

Mr. CASSIDY. There can be no question about that. That is absolutely true to my knowledge.

Mr. WASHBURN. Of course it is true; and I ask what is the use of planting a stake or building a mound where the white man will not go for fifty years?

Mr. PAGE. I would like to know if these surveys are reported by the surveyor-general and certified to the General Land Office, and to prove how that can be true.

Mr. CASSIDY. I do not know how the reports are made, but I know there are rings out there that survey worthless land, obtain certificates, and float them off in other sections where lands are valuable.

Mr. WASHBURN. I want the committee to understand all the facts in this case. The original law for the deposit was very just, very wise, and very beneficent. The original law provided when a certain number of parties desired to go on any township that had been surveyed, by putting up the money they could have it surveyed and get certificates; and when the lands were surveyed those certificates could be turned in in payment. That was all wise and proper. But in March, 1879, these certificates were made transfer-able, and the consequence is that now, instead of surveying lands at the rate of $400,000 per annum, which is sufficient for all the requirements of settlement, it is going into the millions. That is the practical result; and the only effect of this proviso is to prevent this transfer, to put an end to the assignability of these certificates, and to break down this enormous combination which has been surveying the worthless lands of this country for the last few years. That is all there is of it; and if that does not come within the rule of this House it is much to be regretted that the rule does not cover it.

Before I take my seat I should like to have the privilege of having a table, prepared at the Land Office, making a full exhibit of this whole business, incorporated as a part of my remarks.

There was no objection.

The table referred to is as follows:

Mr. HISCOCK. In discussing this point of order, I shall keep myself just as clear of a discussion of the merits as is possible, and discuss the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. Will the gentleman allow the Chair to request him to indicate what retrenchment of the amount appropriated by this bill he contemplates as being effected by this proviso?

Mr. HISCOCK. Under the homestead and pre-emption law as originally passed, or as subsequently amended, there was a provision made that actual settlers might deposit their money for the surveys of the townships in which they had settled; and when a sufficient amount of money had been deposited then that township was surveyed and the money which had been paid by them was applied in payment of their land. I think I am stating the law with sufficient accuracy, practically, for the committee to understand the case. When the parties deposited the money they received a certificate of the deposit of so much money, and they had the right to return that certificate in payment of the land at the regular rates in that township. In 1879, at some period during the year, I do not now remember the date of the act——

Mr. CASSIDY. March 3, 1879.

Mr. HISCOCK. In March, 1879, a law was passed which made these certificates of sums paid in for surveys assignable and receivable in payment for public lands anywhere and everywhere throughout the United States. The result of that assignability is portrayed by the Commissioner of Public Lands in this language, which I ask gentlemen to note:

> The vastly increased area of the public-land surveys during the past fiscal year, as compared with that of previous years, is due to the facilities afforded to individual depositors under the provisions of the act of Congress approved March 3, 1879, amending section 2403 of the Revised Statutes so as to allow the assignment of certificates of deposit by indorsement, and making them receivable in payment for any public lands of the United States entered by settlers under the pre-emption and homestead laws.
> The aggregate of deposits by individuals applying for surveys and declaring themselves, under oath, to be bona fide settlers amounted during the year to $1,874,523.68, thus exceeding the Congressional appropriation ($300,000) in the ratio of 6 to 1.
> Very extensive tracts of inarable lands, devoid of timber sufficient even to supply posts for marking the corners of the public surveys, have been surveyed, and the topographical features, when delineated on township plats from the field-notes of deputy surveyors, fail, in a majority of cases, to show any evidence of settlement.

Mark the language of the statement of the Commissioner of the General Land Office. There was received on deposit from persons who declared themselves under oath to be bona-fide settlers the sum of $1,874,523.68 for these surveys. That money was received from persons who declared upon their affidavits that they had made actual settlements, and an examination of the whole area of lands so surveyed fails to disclose an actual settlement upon any part of it. That is a startling fact, to which I call attention.

Mr. PAGE. Can the gentleman tell the committee how much more money was received that year for public lands sold than was received other years?

Mr. HISCOCK. I will come to that in a moment. These certificates were issued to men who swore themselves and filed affidavits of other people that they had located upon this land that was surveyed. And these affidavits of theirs, with the payment of the money, procured the survey of that land. When the land was surveyed it was discovered that these affidavits were false, that it was a dodge put up by the surveyors in order to procure the job of surveying the land.

That is corroborated by the gentleman from Nevada [Mr. CASSIDY] and by every gentleman who resides in any of these surveying districts. The testimony is all concurrent on this point.

I have deemed it necessary to state these facts in connection with this matter, because they bear directly upon the point of order. This law permits the land itself to be used to pay for surveying purposes; the proceeds of the sale of the land to procure its survey. The issuing of these certificates and allowing them to be received in payment of lands which have been surveyed devotes the land itself to the cost of making the survey.

The very moment that we repeal the law providing for the assignability of these certificates we strike down the appropriation for these surveys; and if it amounts to one million dollars' worth of land, the proceeds of which were turned in in payment for the public surveys, it is a reduction to that amount, and the expenditures are reduced to that extent for public surveys. This is simply an appropriation of land instead of money to procure the surveys. And when you repeal the law you simply reduce the appropriation for that purpose.

But we do not repeal the law entirely; all we do in this provision is to limit the operations of the law. We say that these certificates shall be receivable only in the land district of the office in which the deposit was made; that the certificates shall be issued for money deposited for survey of land in Colorado, for instance, shall not be turned in for the payment of land in the Territory of Dakota.

That is the effect and scope of the provision we have here reported. It strikes at the abuse of affidavits being furnished of actual settlement in the wilds and mountains of Colorado, and the payment in of a large amount of money for the survey of those wild lands and the issue of certificates therefor, and the turning in of those certificates for the payment of public lands in the Territory of Dakota. It says to these people that they shall be limited at least to the land district in which the land is situated, and for the survey of which they have deposited their money.

As I have said before, to repeal the certificate system entirely is simply to strike down the amount of land appropriated for purposes of survey. And when we do not repeal that law entirely, but restrict its operations, we pro tanto strike down the appropriation. And just so far as we diminish the operation of the law just so far we diminish the amount of appropriations for surveys and so far our legislation is in the direction of economy.

I apprehend that there is no man who would have the least doubt, if we came in with a bill by which we propose to repeal the certificate system entirely, that a point of order would not lie against it, for the reason I have already stated, that it is simply an appropriation of the proceeds of the sales of the public lands to the expenditure for the survey of the lands.

I do not care to repeat myself on this question, but I desire to impress it upon the Chair that in so far as we limit or restrict the operations of those statutes just so far we reduce the expenditure for the survey of the public domain.

Mr. BRENTS. Mr. Chairman, it is conceded by all parties in this debate that the provision in question does change existing law; but it is insisted that it reduces expenditures, that it retrenches. Now, it is not enough that it shall merely reduce expenditures; it must do this in a certain way specified in clause 3, Rule XXI. I read the language of the rule:

Nor shall any provision in any such bill or amendment thereto changing existing law be in order except such as, being germane to the subject-matter of the bill, shall retrench expenditures by the reduction of the number and salary of the officers of the United States, by the reduction of the compensation of any person paid out of the Treasury of the United States, or by the reduction of amounts of money covered by the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair has the rule before him, and begs the gentleman to address himself to the latter point.

Mr. BRENTS. It occurs to me, Mr. Chairman, that nothing has been presented here to show that the provision in question does reduce the amount covered by the bill. What is the amount covered by this bill? It is an appropriation of $400,000 for surveys; nothing more, nothing less. The money that may be paid for these surveys is not money covered by the provisions of this bill in any way. The provision under consideration proposes simply to curtail the surveys which are to be made; it does not affect any money appropriated by the bill.

The Secretary of the Interior, in the letter to which my friend from California [Mr. PAGE] has already referred, uses this language:

The law as it now stands is right; and the only abuse to which it can be subject is rendered possible because there has been no provision made for an effective inspection of surveys in the field. This abuse is, however, as possible and probable under the usual appropriation as under the increase of such appropriation by depositors.

What is the object of adopting this provision? Only to the extent that we curtail surveys; and by the curtailment of those surveys do we cut off in any way the frauds which may be perpetrated. The vice is in the original law providing for the surveys, and not in the deposit system at all. If you wish to cure that vice you must amend the original law relating to surveys. This provision does not accomplish anything of that kind. It simply cuts down the amount of surveys. Whatever might be the amount of this appropriation, it would still be subject to the abuses which the Secretary tells us exist under the present law.

Mr. ATKINS addressed the Chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will hear the gentleman from Tennessee on the point of order, remarking that nearly time enough has been consumed in the discussion on this point.

Mr. ATKINS. I shall occupy but a moment. It is true, as the gentleman from Washington Territory says, that the provision of the bill does not propose a reduction in the amount of expenditure, but the proposed change in the law will work a utilization of the expenditure, and the result will be economy and benefit to the Government. By requiring these certificates to be confined to the land district where the land is located, and not allowing them to be assigned and located anywhere within the range of the public domain, the amount appropriated is utilized and the result is economy to the Government and the prevention of frauds. Therefore, the provision comes within the spirit of the rule providing that legislation to be in order on an appropriation bill shall produce economy.

Mr. RANDALL. I desire to ask the gentleman why these certificates should not be confined to the township in which the lands surveyed is located.

Mr. ATKINS. That was substantially the law up to March 3, 1879, when a provision was adopted making certificates assignable, and allowing them to be located anywhere upon the public domain. That is the very law which we now seek to restrict or restrain——

Mr. RANDALL. Repeal.

Mr. ATKINS. Not to repeal entirely, but to restrict, so that these certificates shall be located in the land district in which the survey is made.

Mr. RANDALL. I think the proposition of the committee is right, but it does not go far enough.

Mr. ATKINS. I think it should be confined to the townships, but the committee did not so conclude.

Now, one word more. I state in addition to what I have already said that this reduces the amount per linear mile paid for survey of the public lands. That is applied to this paragraph, and therefore it does actually retrench expenditure. The whole is to be considered together, the proviso as well as the preceding part of the paragraph, and on its very face it does retrench expenditure by the reduction per linear mile one or two dollars.

Mr. PAGE. I did not make the point of order on that part of the paragraph.

Mr. ATKINS. I know the gentleman did not, but I make the point that this is one paragraph, and the gentleman cannot pick out one part and make the point of order, but that the whole paragraph must be taken into consideration in reference to the question as to whether it retrenches expenditure or not. As I have shown, it does retrench expenditure, and therefore is in order.

Mr. ROBESON. Mr. Chairman, I think this provision may be said to reduce the amount of appropriation carried by the bill for two reasons. First, because the appropriation of $400,000 is an appropriation subject to the law, that only so much of it shall be paid as is used for the purpose for which it is appropriated and the remainder will stay in the Treasury. Now, if the certificates with their wider scope carry with them a larger expenditure for the survey of the public lands then limiting the scope of these certificates by limiting the survey of the public lands will limit the expenditure under that appropriation and will leave a larger balance in the Treasury. This is one point.

The second point is, this provision making these land certificates available for surveys of public lands is, in fact, itself an appropriation, and made so by law. Then when you limit the scope, power, reach, and application of those certificates, you limit the amount of the appropriation thereby contemplated. And that is all there is of it.

Mr. HOLMAN. I wish to say a word. The gentleman from New Jersey in part has anticipated what I wished to say, and that is that all the money deposited under this deposit system is in reality an appropriation for the survey for the current year in which it is made. Last year the appropriation was $1,800,000, and the Chair in deciding this question as to whether it retrenches expenditure or not would necessarily consider the reduction of this permanent appropriation. Any measure which tended to diminish the amount which would be expended under that deposit system would bring the question fairly under the purview of the rule of the House.

Here are $1,800,000 expended by specific and permanent appropriation of money during the last fiscal year. That amount of money is not proposed to be diminished directly by the pending bill, but the amount to be expended is proposed to be diminished by limiting the availability of the certificates and the scope of the scrip.

I concede this is not a direct retrenchment, and the rule does not require it, but that it is sufficient if it results in retrenchment. If that is the incidental result in any reasonable and fair probability, then I submit under the rule this proposition is in order. It is in order if it does by fair intendment reduce the expenditure of the Government. That, I think, has been already demonstrated from the official record. It has been shown by the report of the Commissioner of the General Land Office that the effect of this system of deposit unnecessarily increases the survey of the public lands and opens facilities to reach rich public lands out of the proceeds of the surveys of worthless lands.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is ready to pass on the question.

Mr. POUND. I do not know that I can throw any further light on this question, but possibly a letter addressed to me by the Commissioner of the General Land Office may be useful to the chairman in making his decision. It is in reply to a letter I addressed to him in reference to a Senate bill which was believed would be ultimately referred to the committee in the House of which I am a member.

The Clerk read as follows:

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR, GENERAL LAND OFFICE,
Washington, D. C., June 30, 1882.

SIR: I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of your letter of the 23d instant, requesting information upon the following points:

First. Has there been any material increase in the receipts from the sale of public lands since the inauguration of the deposit system in 1879, and to what extent?

Second. As to the regulations governing applications by settlers for surveys.

Third. Is it better economy to permit settlers to deposit for surveys, or to appropriate moneys therefor from the Treasury?

Fourth. In view of statements having been made that the deposits for surveys are beyond the demands of settlement and public interests, is there any necessity for an appropriation for surveys during the incoming fiscal year?

In reply to the first interrogatory I have to state that the act of March 3, 1879, amending section 2403 of the Revised Statutes by making certificates of deposit assignable and receivable for any public lands entered under the homestead and pre-emption laws, did not virtually go into effect until the beginning of the fiscal year 1881, because the circular of this office conveying instructions thereunder to surveyors-general and registers and receivers was not issued until the 5th day of March, 1880, and some little time transpired before the system went into operation.

The following are the disposals of public lands and the receipts therefrom for the fiscal years 1880, 1881, and from July 1, 1881, to May 31, 1882:

	Acres.
1880, sales	9,152,357.62
1881, sales	10,762,957.18
July 1, 1881, to May 31, 1882	13,714,266.77
Receipts in—
1880	$2,283,118 65
1881	4,401,768 47
July 1, 1881, to May 31, 1882	7,417,498 45

The expenditures from deposits made for surveys during the same periods are as follows:

1880	$273,763 69
July 1, 1881, to May 31, 1882	1,297,984 98

Replying to your second interrogatory I have to state that applications for surveys under the deposit law are required to be sworn to by actual settlers and the nature and value of improvements shown upon such applications, and such sworn statements to be supported by the affidavit of two witnesses, as per blank form inclosed herewith marked A.

Referring to interrogations third and fourth, I have to state that should the act of March 3, 1879, be repealed it would be necessary to largely increase the estimate of $400,000 for the survey of public lands to meet the demands of settlers, as is evidenced by extensive disposals and receipts during the current fiscal year.

In any event an appropriation will be necessary, as section 2401, Revised Statutes, authorizes deposits to be made for the survey of township and subdivisional lines, leaving base, standard, and meridian lines to be provided for by the United States, as well as the survey of all lands other than agricultural.

Very respectfully,

N. C. MCFARLAND, Commissioner.

Hon. THAD. C. POUND,
Chairman Committee on Public Lands, House of Representatives.

[During the reading of the foregoing letter,

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair thinks that this is a duplicate of what has already been stated by the gentleman from California, [Mr. PAGE.]

Mr. PAGE. I insist, if the Chair will allow it, that this matter from the Commissioner of the Land Office, and which is calculated to throw light upon the subject, should be read in full. It is a matter bearing directly upon the subject and contains information pertinent to the matter at issue, and I hope it will be read in connection with the point of order, as it throws light upon the question. I ask that it be read in full, and also that the letter of the Secretary of the Interior be read.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair must decline to hear an argument from the Commissioner of the Land Office or any other gentleman not upon the floor of the House upon this point of order.

Mr. HISCOCK. If that letter from the present Secretary of the Interior should be read in that manner, I should then be under the necessity of calling attention to and having read a letter from the former Secretary, Mr. Kirkwood, and a further letter from the Commissioner of the Land Office sustaining the opinion of Mr. Kirkwood.

Mr. POUND. If the Clerk will read one or two paragraphs at the close of the letter I think it will be sufficient for the purpose I have in contemplation.

The Clerk read as follows:

Referring to interrogatories 3 and 4 I have to state that should the act of March 3, 1879, be repealed, it would be necessary to largely increase the estimate of $400,000 for the survey of public lands to meet the demands of settlers, as is evidenced by extensive disposals and receipts during the current fiscal year. In any event an appropriation will be necessary, as section 2401 of the Revised Statutes authorizes deposits to be made for the survey of township and subdivisional lines, leaving base, standard, and meridianal lines to be provided for by the United States, as well as the survey of all lands other than agricultural.

Mr. POUND. That I think bears conclusively upon the point of order, and the figures contained therein are the same as those which have been addressed to the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations, and quoted by the gentleman from California. The conclusion is, if this provision is repealed, as proposed by this proviso, that the appropriation for surveys must be largely increased.

Now, as to the merits of the law I have nothing to say, but in anticipation of its probable reference to the committee of which I am chairman, I addressed this letter to the Secretary of the Interior, and obtained the response which has been quoted.]

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is ready to rule on the point of order.

Mr. RYAN. Before that I desire to be heard for a moment only in reference to the point of order under the rule. The provision of our rule is:

Nor shall any provision in any such bill or amendment thereto changing existing law be in order, except such as being germane to the subject-matter of the bill shall retrench expenditures by the reduction of the number or salary of the officers of the United States, &c.

Now, Mr. Chairman, the argument has disclosed the fact, in fact it has been admitted, that the provision in this bill against which the point of order is made will greatly reduce the surveys of the public lands. It is claimed in effect by those who are sustaining the point of order, and very justly too, that it will largely curtail the surveys of the public domain. Let us bear in mind the fact that under existing law every dollar put up under the deposit system is an appropriation for the survey of the public domain.

Let us consider further that nearly $2,000,000 of deposits every year are made. Now, it is undeniable that an immense sum of money will be saved and the employment of an immense number of officers, a large corps of United States surveyors, will not longer be needed, for their duties will cease if the provisions of this law shall remain in force. Nearly $2,000,000 are expended under the law as it exists annually to maintain a corps of United States surveyors. This provision restricts that expenditure very largely, by two-thirds at least, rendering unnecessary this large corps of surveyors and officers. Therefore, it comes directly within the rule, if the position be a correct one and if the admissions are true on the part of those who are endeavoring to sustain the point of order, namely, that the expenditure for surveys will be largely reduced and the surveys greatly curtailed, because it will reduce the number of United States officers.

Mr. CASWELL. Mr. Chairman, I only desire to say a word in reference to this point of order. The very object of this provision of the bill is to prevent the surveys of worthless lands, so we may not be compelled by these surveyors to pay for a region of country that is not worth being surveyed, and employ a great corps of deputies to expend nearly $2,000,000 to do it.

Now, as the law stands it allows these deputy surveyors to determine the extent of this appropriation to be used in the surveys of the public domain. They may make it one, two, or three millions of dollars, as they see fit. A great portion of it is employed in surveying, as I have said, worthless lands for the purpose of obtaining certificates, that they may sell these certificates at a discount to parties in other parts of the country where the lands are not worthless. This clause, if adopted, restricts them to the districts where the lands surveyed are located, and unless they buy certificates to issue worthless lands they will not buy them at all.

Mr. PAGE. Mr. Chairman, one word more.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair, in view of the length of this debate on the point of order, begs the gentleman to be brief.

Mr. PAGE. If the Chair should take the view enunciated by the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. ATKINS] of course I admit this section would not be subject to the point of order, because, in the first part of the paragraph, there is a reduction of the cost of surveys per linear mile. That is true. My point of order was not made to that portion of the paragraph. It was made against the proviso. The rule says:

Nor shall any provision in any such bill or amendment thereto changing existing law be in order, except such as, being germane to the subject-matter of the bill, shall retrench expenditures—by the reduction of the number and salary of the officers of the United States, by the reduction of the compensation of any person paid out of the Treasury of the United States, &c.

Now, no gentleman has contended that this reduces the salary of any officer, that it reduces the amount of money carried by the bill, that it reduces any amount of money paid out of the Treasury of the United States. It is simply contended that under the general law surveys may be made by deposit; but the amendment does not prevent surveys in the future, but only limits them.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will ask the Clerk to report the proviso against which the point of order is made.

The Clerk read the proviso, as follows:

Provided further, That no certificate issued for a deposit of money for the survey of lands under section 2403 of the Revised Statutes, and the act approved March 3, 1879, amendatory thereof, shall be received in payment for lands, except at the land office in which the lands surveyed for which the deposit was made are subject to entry, and not elsewhere; but this section shall not be held to impair, prejudice, or affect in any manner deposits and contracts made under the provisions of said act prior to the passage of this act.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair has no trouble with the suggestion that the point of order cannot apply to the whole section, as it is evidently intended in the application of the rule to take any distinct provision that may be separated from the bill without detriment to the context. Therefore the point of order may lie as far as form is concerned.

The question is whether this proviso is subject to the point of order under the rule which has been frequently referred to? The Chair begs to remind gentlemen that it is not sufficient that the proposition retrenches expenditure in some direction, for the rule reads:

Shall retrench expenditures by the reduction of the number and salary of the officers of the United States.

Second:

By the reduction of the compensation of any person paid out of the Treasury of the United States.

Third:

By the reduction of amounts of money covered by the bill.

It is the latter clause and that alone that has given the Chair any trouble in deciding the point of order. Turning then to see if it is calculated to retrench any one of these expenditures it may be, as an effect, that it diminishes the number of persons employed by the United States by reason of reducing the number of surveys. But that would seem to the Chair to be rather remote in its effect, too remote perhaps to be contemplated by the rule.

The Chair finds in looking to what particular amounts are covered by the bill something else is appropriated by it than the simple sum of $400,000. In the first proviso, beginning at the top of page 60, the phrase is used touching one surveying district—

Together with such sums as have been or may be deposited for surveys therein by actual settlers under sections 2401, 2402, and 2403 of the Revised Statutes.

And appropriates that, so far as is necessary. In other words, apart from the merits of this provision, of which the Chair may have a distinct opinion or not, the appropriation involved in this paragraph does touch this very large amount that by general law is appropriated and is in part, therefore, an amount covered by this bill. As the line is so nearly touched, however, in the proper application of the rule, and it is not so much a question of construction as a view taken of the language of the paragraph, the Chair avails himself of his right to submit the question to the committee, inasmuch as the importance of it is sufficient to justify an appeal from the judgment of the Chair. The question, therefore, is, Shall the point of order made by the gentleman from California [Mr. PAGE] against this proviso be sustained?

The question being taken, the point of order was not sustained.

Mr. ANDERSON rose.

Mr. RANDALL. I suggest to the gentleman from New York to move that the committee rise.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Kansas [Mr. ANDERSON] has been recognized. Does he yield for a motion that the committee rise?

Mr. ANDERSON. Yes, sir.

Mr. HISCOCK. I move that the committee rise.

Mr. SPRINGER. I ask that my admendment may be printed.

Mr. HISCOCK. I hope the amendment of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SPRINGER] will be printed.

Mr. SPRINGER. I ask that the amendment may be printed in the RECORD.

There was no objection.

The proposed amendment of Mr. SPRINGER is as follows:

Strike out, in lines 1041 and 1042, the words "to be distributed as provided in the act approved June 16, 1880," and insert at the end of line 1043 the following:

"The volumes of the Official Records of the War of the Rebellion shall be distributed as follows:

"One thousand copies to the Executive Departments, as now provided by law.

Six thousand three hundred copies to such libraries, organizations, and individuals as may be designated by the Representatives and Delegates of the Forty-seventh Congress. Each Representative and Delegate shall furnish the Secretary of War with the names and addresses of not exceeding twenty-one libraries, organizations, and individuals to whom he shall send such volumes from time to time, as they may be published, until the completion of the publication of said records. Two thousand copies of said records shall be sent by the Secretary of War to such libraries, organizations, and individuals as may be indicated by the Senators who are members of the Forty-seventh Congress. Each Senator shall indicate not exceeding twenty-six addresses to whom such volumes shall be sent in like manner. And each Senator, Representative, and Delegate shall state how many volumes he has already furnished to such addresses.

"If two or more sets of said volumes are ordered to the same address the Secretary of War shall send but one set and designate other libraries, organizations, or individuals to whom the surplus may be sent by him.

"The remaining copies of the 10,000 to be published and all sets that may not be ordered to be distributed as provided herein shall be sold by the Secretary of War for cost of publication with 10 per cent. added thereto; and the proceeds of such sale shall be covered into the Treasury.

"The Secretary of War shall report to the first session of the Forty-eighth Congress what volumes of the series heretofore published have not been furnished to such libraries, organizations, and individuals."

Mr. REED. I reserve all points of order on the amendment of the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. SPRINGER.]

Mr. ANDERSON. I ask that my proposed amendment may be printed in the RECORD.

There was no objection.

The proposed amendment of Mr. ANDERSON is as follows:

On page 60, after the word "lines," in line 1448, insert:

"Provided, That in the event of the repayment to the United States of moneys advanced and expended by it in surveying and selecting public lands granted to certain railroad companies under 'an act to aid in the construction of a railroad and telegraph line from the Missouri River to the Pacific Ocean,' &c., approved July 1, 1862, and the act amendatory thereof, approved July 2, 1864, the said companies or parties in interest being by such acts required to pay 'into the Treasury of the United States the cost of surveying, selecting, and conveying' lands so granted, then and in that event such sums so paid into the Treasury shall, without further appropriation, be used for surveying the public lands; and in this latter event, but not otherwise, the sum of $400,000 herein appropriated shall be diminished by the aggregate sum so paid into the Treasury and so used for the public survey.

"And the Kansas Pacific Railway Company, or its assigns, shall forthwith pay into the Treasury of the United States all the cost, as determined by the Secretary of the Interior, of surveying, selecting, and conveying public lands granted to it by said acts and situated either in the State of Kansas or in legally organized counties of the State of Colorado, and upon which such costs shall not have been already paid. And in the event that any such costs shall remain unpaid on the 1st day of October, 1882, the Attorney-General of the United States is hereby authorized and directed to institute forthwith, in the name of the United States of America, in the circuit court of the United States for the district in which the tract or parcels of land are situated upon which such costs remain unpaid, any and all proceedings against said company or party in interest that he may deem necessary and proper and that can be maintained to secure the prompt payment of such unpaid costs and of the further cost of all such legal proceedings."

Mr. HEPBURN. I desire to offer an amendment, which I ask may be printed in the RECORD.

There was no objection.

The proposed amendment of Mr. HEPBURN is as follows:

Strike out all after the word "except," in line 1470, to and including the word "entry," in line 1472, and insert "those lands covered by the contract of survey for which the certificate shall have been issued."

No. 5118) granting a pension to Elizabeth Weinstein; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar, and the accompanying report ordered to be printed.

JOSEPH WARD.

Mr. PARKER also, by unanimous consent, from the same committee, reported adversely the bill (H. R. No. 5483) granting a pension to Joseph Ward; which was laid on the table, and the accompanying report ordered to be printed.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. HISCOCK. I now call for the regular order.

The SPEAKER. The regular order is the motion to adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and accordingly (at five o'clock and forty minutes p. m.) the House adjourned.

SENATE.

TUESDAY, July 11, 1882.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. J. J. BULLOCK, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. CAMERON, of Pennsylvania, presented resolutions of the board of health of Philadelphia, favoring an appropriation in the sundry civil appropriation bill providing for the continuation of the bulletins issued by the National Board of Health; which were referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. LOGAN presented the petition of Boswell M. Grant, a volunteer of the war of 1812, praying to be allowed a pension; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. MAXEY. I am instructed by the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads, to which was referred the bill (S. No. 1540) for the relief of S. E. Ogden, to ask to be discharged from its further consideration. An examination of the papers shows that that committee has not jurisdiction of the case, and I think it properly belongs to the Committee on Claims. I ask that the Post-Office Committee be discharged, and that it be referred to the Committee on Claims.

The report was agreed to.

Mr. SLATER, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 1873) for the relief of Patrick Sullivan, reported it with amendments; and submitted a report thereon, which was ordered to be printed.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 1439) granting a pension to Lydia Smith, submitted an adverse report thereon, which was ordered to be printed; and the bill was postponed indefinitely.

Mr. BLAIR, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 2127) granting a pension to James F. Rose, reported it without amendment; and submitted a report thereon, which was ordered to be printed.

Mr. PLATT, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 1102) granting a pension to Elizabeth T. Dubois, reported it without amendment; and submitted a report thereon, which was ordered to be printed.

Mr. VAN WYCK, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 703) granting a pension to Sarah Shea, reported it without amendment; and submitted a report thereon, which was ordered to be printed.

Mr. MITCHELL, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 2481) for the relief of Dicey Bobbitt, reported it without amendment; and submitted a report thereon, which was ordered to be printed.

Mr. MORRILL. I am directed by the Committee on Finance, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 3854) to repeal so much of section 3385 of the Revised Statutes as imposes an export tax on tobacco, to report it favorably, amending only the title. I will not ask to have it reprinted.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be placed on the Calendar.

Mr. MORRILL, from the Committee on Finance, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 6715) to correct an error in section 2504 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, reported it with an amendment.

Mr. MORRILL. I am also directed by the Committee on Finance, to whom were referred the bill (S. No. 348) to amend certain sections of the Revised Statutes concerning taxes upon banks and bankers, and the bill (S. No. 548) to repeal taxes on deposits with banks, banking associations, and bankers, to ask to be discharged from their further consideration, and that they be indefinitely postponed, the subjects having been heretofore considered.

The report was agreed to.

Mr. CAMDEN, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 1098) granting a pension to Martha Westervelt, reported it without amendment; and submitted a report thereon, which was ordered to be printed.

Mr. JACKSON, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 5239) granting a pension to Mrs. Spedie B. Eggleston, reported it without amendment; and submitted a report thereon, which was ordered to be printed.

Mr. COCKRELL, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 2137) donating four condemned cannon and four cannon-balls for the soldiers' burial lot in the Hudson, New York, cemetery, reported it without amendment.

Mr. GROOME, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 1884) granting a pension to William J. Duley, submitted an adverse report thereon, which was ordered to be printed; and the bill was postponed indefinitely.

PAYMENT OF DOUBLE PENSIONS.

Mr. GROOME. I am instructed by the Committee on Pensions to report an original bill, entitled "A bill to prevent the payment of double pensions," and in doing so to say to the Senate that the reasons which have led the committee to report this bill are of the most extreme urgency, and that I am directed at the first convenient opportunity after the bill is in print to ask the Senate to take it up and pass upon it.

Mr. HARRIS. Why not act on it now?

The bill (S. No. 2138) to prevent the payment of double pensions was read the first time by its title.

Mr. HARRIS. Let the bill be read for information. From what the Senator from Maryland states I think it probable that the Senate will agree to consider it now.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be read at length.

The bill was read the second time at length, as follows:

Be it enacted &c., That no person who is now receiving or shall hereafter receive a pension under a special act shall be entitled to receive in addition thereto a pension under the general law, unless the special act expressly states that the pension granted thereby is in addition to the pension which said person is entitled to receive under the general law.

Mr. GROOME. At the request of Senators all around me who desire an explanation of this bill, I will state that the attention of the Committee on Pensions has been called this morning to the fact that the Attorney-General of the United States has given an opinion on the pension case of General Ward B. Burnett to the effect that when a special act is passed granting a pension to any one who is already upon the rolls, which pension act states expressly that that pension is in lieu of the pension which the pensioner is then receiving, the pensioner is entitled both to the pension under the special act and to the pension under the general law. How much further that opinion goes it is hard to say upon a hasty reading.

Mr. HOAR. If that be true, would not the same thing be true after the bill passed?

Mr. GROOME. I think not.

Mr. HOAR. I understand the Senator to say that the Attorney-General has said that if there be a special pension law which expressly states that it is in lieu of the existing pension, the pensioner gets both. That is what the Senator said.

Mr. INGALLS. Will the Senator allow me to inquire how it is that when a pensioner is on the roll under the general laws he is also placed there by special act?

Mr. GROOME. I will answer the Senator's question very readily. There are a great many persons who are upon the pension-roll under the general law whose pensions have been increased by special act. That is this precise case.

Mr. INGALLS. Where there is an increase?

Mr. GROOME. There is an increase of pension in the case of General Burnett from $30 to $50 a month.

Mr. INGALLS. The Attorney-General holds in that case that the recipient is entitled to $80 a month?

Mr. GROOME. The Attorney-General holds that under the proper construction of the pension laws General Burnett was entitled to $50 a month under the general law at the date of the passage of the special act, and is now entitled to $72 a month under the general law and to an additional pension of $50 a month under the special act.

Mr. INGALLS. I would be very glad before action on this bill to have that opinion read. I cannot conceive that any official in the possession of his senses would render such an opinion as the Senator from Maryland has stated.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. INGALLS. I object until we hear that opinion read. I think there must be some mistake about it.

Mr. GROOME. The proposition was to my mind such a monstrous one that I anticipated the very objection made by the Senator from Kansas, that Senators would hardly believe it was possible that such an opinion had been given by the law officer of this Government.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. I ask the Senator from Maryland if he has a copy of the opinion?

Mr. GROOME. The opinion is in the committee-room of the Committee on Pensions. I did not bring it into the Senate Chamber with me, for the reason that it was not my intention nor the instruction of the Pension Committee to call up the bill for action or discussion until it had been printed and placed upon the desks of Senators.

Mr. VAN WYCK. Send for it, and let us have it read.

Mr. PLATT. I think the bill had better be printed and taken up for consideration to-morrow morning.

Mr. GROOME. That disposition, I think, is the proper one to make of it under the circumstances.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will go over.

Mr. BECK. Can we not have the opinion of the Attorney-General printed in the RECORD, so that we may all see it?

Mr. GROOME. Yes, sir.

Mr. BECK. I should like to have that done.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The opinion of the Attorney-General will be printed in the RECORD if the Senator from Maryland will produce it.

Mr. GROOME. Very well; I will send to the committee-room for it and furnish it to the Official Reporter.

The opinion is as follows:

DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE,
Washington, D. C., June 29, 1882.

SIR: Replying to your letter of the 24th instant concerning the case of General Ward B. Burnett, I have the honor to advise you that according to the opinion rendered by this Department on the 10th of April last, the rates of pension which should be allowed General Burnett are as follows:

From June 4, 1872, to June 4, 1874, $31.75 per month. (Act of March 1873, fourth section.)

From June 4, 1874, to June 17, 1878, (act of June 18, 1874,) $50 per month.

From June 17, 1878, $72 per month. (Act June 16, 1880.)

Under the special act of March 3, 1879, General Burnett has drawn and is entitled still to draw $50 per month.

True this was given him "in lieu of the pension he now receives," but the pension he was then receiving was $30 per month. This was not the sum which he was entitled to receive under the general law.

The $30, it is presumed, was paid him under section 4695 Revised Statutes, as for total disability and in lieu of this the special act gives him $50. It provided also that nothing "in this act" (the special act) shall entitle General Burnett to arrears of pension.

It is not under this act that back pay of pension is claimed, but under the general laws cited above, which entitle him to the rate of pension prescribed therein.

I do not think the special act can be so construed as to deprive General Burnett of these.

It should be considered as a law by itself, intended to show the estimate by Congress of the great services of General Burnett to the country, having regard also to his helpless condition.

I am of opinion that two pension certificates should be issued to General Burnett, one under the act of June 6, 1880, the other under the special act of March 3, 1879.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

BENJAMIN HARRIS BREWSTER,
Attorney-General.

Hon. H. M. TELLER,
Secretary of the Interior.

DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE,
Washington, D. C., July 7, 1882.

SIR: In the pension case of General Ward B. Burnett, I have the honor to observe, in reply to your letter of the 3d instant, that the said pensioner, under the general act of 1874, was entitled to, though he was not receiving, a pension of $50 a month. While so entitled, Congress passed a special act giving him another pension. This did not take away his right under the general law, nor was his pension merged in that granted by the special act.

The case is exceptional. In the law under the title "Pensions," as enacted in 1873, nothing can be so construed as to allow more than one pension at the same time to the same person. But subsequently, Congress having the power, stepping beyond the rule prescribed in section 4715, by a separate, independent law gives to a pensioner already entitled to a pension of $50 another pension of the same amount. Section 4715 has, in my judgment, no application to a case of this kind. The special act of March 3, 1879, has not been repealed or its force and effect taken away by any subsequent legislation.

I adhere to the opinion expressed in my letter of the 29th ultimo.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

BENJAMIN HARRIS BREWSTER,
Attorney-General.

Hon. H. M. TELLER,
Secretary of the Interior.

Mr. VAN WYCK. In connection with this same subject, the Committee on Pensions instructed me to report a joint resolution, and also to ask action upon it as soon as possible.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator ask for its present consideration?

Mr. VAN WYCK. No, sir; I ask for action on it at the same time that the bill just reported is acted upon.

Several SENATORS. Let it be read at length.

The joint resolution (S. R. No. 94) directing the Secretary of the Interior to withhold action in payment of double pension to General Ward B. Burnett was read the first time by its title, and the second time at length, as follows:

Whereas the Attorney-General has by written opinion advised the Secretary of the Interior that General Ward B. Burnett is entitled to a double pension, one by the general law and one by special act of Congress; and

Whereas such decision is contrary to the intention of Congress in granting such special act, which said act expressly declared that said special pension was given in lieu of pension he was then receiving:

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives in Congress assembled, That the Secretary of the Interior be directed to suspend action under and by reason of said decision until Congress shall have acted upon a bill this day introduced entitled "An act to prevent the payment of double pensions."

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

FORT ABERCROMBIE RESERVATION.

Mr. MCMILLAN. I ask that the action of the House of Representatives on Senate bill No. 1432 be laid before the Senate, in order that the amendments of the House may be concurred in.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate the amendments of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. No. 1432) abolishing the military reservation of Fort Abercrombie, in the State of Minnesota, and authorizing the Secretary of the Interior to have the lands embraced therein made subject to homestead and pre emption entry and sale, the same as other public lands, which were, in line 4, to strike out "and pre-emption;" in line 7, to strike out "and pre-emption;" in lines 10 and 11, to strike out "and pre-emption," and to amend the title by striking out "and pre-emption."

The amendments were concurred in.

NATIONAL BANKING ASSOCIATIONS.

Mr. ALLISON. I desire to call up the conference report on the bill (H. R. No. 4167) to enable national banking associations to extend their corporate existence. I will say to Senators that if they will look on their tables they will find the bill printed as it will become a law if the conference report is adopted, and appended to the bill is the conference report. If no Senator has any questions, I ask that the conference report be adopted.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The report of the committee of conference is before the Senate, and the question is on concurring in it.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. As I have not had time to look over the report, I wish to ask the Senator from Iowa who has charge of it what change there is from the bill as it passed the Senate, if any.

Mr. ALLISON. The only material change is found on page 7 of the printed bill in capital letters. The modification of section 8 is the principal change.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. The bill is substantially as the Senate passed it, I understand.

Mr. ALLISON. The bill is substantially as the Senate passed it. The next modification is on page 9, in capital letters.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. Is it a unanimous report of the conferees on the part of the Senate?

Mr. ALLISON. Yes, sir.

Mr. BECK. It seems to me that the few changes made are improvements merely to make the bill more clear. While I was opposed to the bill, I thought the House had agreed to everything we had done, and that it is all right.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on concurring in the report of the committee of conference.

The report was concurred in.

Mr. ALLISON. I wish now to call the attention of the Senate to section 10, on page 10 of the printed bill, where the House asks us to concur in an amendment which was not before the conferees. In line 11 of that section they propose to strike out the word "hereinafter" before "provided" and after "provided" to insert "by law."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there unanimous consent to the word "hereinafter" being stricken out and the words "by law" inserted? The Chair hearing no objection, consent is given.

HOUR OF MEETING.

Mr. GARLAND. The other day I submitted a resolution to fix the hour of meeting for the remainder of this session at eleven o'clock. At the suggestion of several Senators this morning I desire to call up that resolution.

The Senate proceeded to consider the following resolution, submitted by Mr. GARLAND on the 29th of June:

Resolved, That on and after the 3d of July next the hour of meeting of the Senate during the present session shall be eleven o'clock a. m.

Mr. GARLAND. I wish to amend the resolution by striking out "third" and inserting "Thursday, the 13th."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

Mr. ANTHONY. I move that the resolution be referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. GARLAND. I wish to state that the resolution was permitted by me to lie over at the suggestion of the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations, but from the conversation that was had in the Senate yesterday with reference to the hour of meeting and having night sessions and all those things, it was pretty evident, so far as the expression of opinion was had, that it would be preferable to meet at eleven o'clock instead of being driven to night sessions.

I think that the committee work generally is about through for this session outside of the Committee on Appropriations, and it would be much better for us to meet here one hour sooner each morning instead of sitting late in the evening with the risk of being driven to night sessions, which are entirely out of the question in this hot weather. I think it would facilitate business to adopt the resolution.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I suggest that we had better meet at ten o'clock in the morning, because we have committee work no longer, and then we could adjourn at four o'clock in the afternoon. In this hot weather I think it a great deal better to meet early in the morning and get through our business by four o'clock. I think we shall dispatch business much faster in the morning hours than we shall in the evening. I hope the resolution will be amended so as to make the hour of meeting ten o'clock in the morning.

Mr. BECK. I rise for the purpose of saying that I object to meeting at eleven o'clock, and certainly ten o'clock would be out of all character. The Committee on Appropriations expects to take part in the proceedings of the Senate and ought to have a right to be present. Unless that committee has from half past nine or ten o'clock until twelve to consider the naval appropriation bill and the sundry civil appropriation bill—and every gentleman knows how troublesome those bills are—the committee can do no work at all without absenting itself absolutely from the sessions of the Senate, which we ought not to be required to do. It will require every hour and every minute from nine or half past nine in the morning until twelve, and night sessions to boot, to be able to report those bills in a reasonable time. One of two things is to happen, either the nine gentlemen who compose the Committee on Appropriations have to absent themselves from the Senate or you will have to give them time to consider those bills. One branch of the committee was in session until half past eleven o'clock last night and came back at half past nine this morning.

The adoption of this resolution is equivalent to saying to the Committee on Appropriations that they shall not take part in the deliberations of the Senate, for if we are to be deprived of time to do that work the Senate, instead of getting away sooner, will be kept here a week or two longer. We are obliged to take time in the consideration of those bills.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Rhode Island to refer the resolution to the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. ALLISON. I think that is the wisest disposition of it for the present. If it shall turn out next week, I will say to the Senator from Arkansas, that we can meet at eleven o'clock, I will have no objection to doing so then.

Mr. GARLAND. If the resolution is to be referred to the Committee on Appropriations, it might as well be voted down, because, as indicated by the Senator from Kentucky, they are opposed to it. They have leave to sit during the sittings of the Senate. They sit any way from twelve o'clock on at intervals during the time we are holding session here. It is a matter entirely immaterial to me. I can come as early or as late as any one else, and I can come at night. It makes no difference to me. If the resolution is to go to the Committee on Appropriations we might as well take a direct vote on it at once.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. I think very little will be gained by meeting here at eleven o'clock. As stated by the Senator from Kentucky, a part of the Committee on Appropriations was on duty last night until half past eleven o'clock, and some of the same members met again this morning at half past nine, and again to-night there is to be a session. As the Senator from Kentucky has said, the members of the committee want to attend the sessions of the Senate, and if we are to meet at eleven o'clock it will be impossible for them to do so. I hope the resolution will go to the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. INGALLS. If we ever want to get away from here we have got to go to work and do something. It is an extraordinary commentary on the capacity of this Congress for public business that after sitting here from December until the last of June we were compelled to pass a joint resolution continuing the appropriations indefinitely because the necessary work of the session that ought to have been completed by the 1st of May had not been done. Now it is proposed that when we want to meet at eleven o'clock for the purpose of transacting important and indispensable business upon the Calendar, that the resolution shall go to the Committee on Appropriations because forsooth they are compelled to occupy a certain portion of the day in the consideration of other business that comes before the Senate. If that rule is to apply we may as well dispense with business altogether until the Committee on Appropriations are ready to attend the sessions of the body without interfering with their duties on that committee. Of course their presence here is desirable; their deliberations would be valuable here; but to say that we are to dispense with the consideration of all business on the Calendar and with the consideration of the great matters that are requiring our attention because the Committee on Appropriations, or a part of them, meet at nine o'clock and sit here again after adjournment, seems to me to be an untenable position. The rest of the Senate have work to do, and if the Committee on Appropriations cannot attend, it is our misfortune.

I hope the resolution will not be referred to the Committee on Appropriations, but that the Senate will meet at eleven o'clock in the morning and see if we cannot dispose of some business now pending on the Calendar.

Mr. BECK. I am rather glad the Senator from Kansas has made the remarks he has just made. He intimated that the Committee on Appropriations have been perhaps holding back or not working up all that was possible. The Committee on Appropriations have passed upon every bill that has come from the House of Representatives except the naval appropriation bill, which we have had before us for only a few days. We have passed upon them promptly; we have sat up night and day in order to do so; but we cannot force the House of Representatives to send us bills. It seems we lack either the courage or the disposition to originate appropriation bills ourselves in order to have a fair chance to consider them. It is whispered here by a friend, and I adopt the suggestion, that we cannot control a Republican caucus and prevent them from holding back bills in the House against their own rules which ought to have been sent to us months ago.

Seven months and seven days have now passed since this Congress met and the sundry civil appropriation bill, embracing twenty-odd million dollars, every ten lines of which, in many places every two lines, relate to a separate subject, with appropriations for all the public buildings of the country, (and everything that cannot get anywhere else is on that bill,) and we have not even seen it yet, on the 11th day of July, seven months and seven days after Congress met. It is assumed by every member of the Senate that a member of the Committee on Appropriations shall be able to answer every question that is put to him relative to every item of that bill when we bring it into the Senate. To do that we have to send for the heads of the Departments, the heads of the bureaus, Senators themselves come before us and tell us of amendments that ought to be made, and we are required to sit here night and day. As I said the other day, when the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. WINDOM] was chairman of the committee some years ago, the first time I ever saw the two Houses in any conflict, one being Democratic and the other Republican, we sat, I think, for five nights until the sun was shining at five o'clock in the morning when we left and had to be back at the committee-room at nine o'clock.

Now we cannot help ourselves. If the Senate would do what I think it ought to do, whenever the House of Representatives holds back these great appropriation bills for over three months (sixty days being the rule and they holding them back seven months and seven days) we would take up the sundry civil bill, originate it and report it here, and pass it and send it to the House. I would not be trifled with as we have been trifled with for the last seven months by the House of Representatives in regard to the appropriation bills, and I would have some of the bills originate here. But they are not here; we have to wait until they come; we have to consider them when they do come. We have a right to be in the Senate when other work is being passed on and we are obliged to attend to other work also, as every Senator knows. The amendments are submitted by hundreds now waiting for that bill to come over. But we are not idle while waiting for that bill. Senators are working every day; the clerk of the committee is at work now and we are sending to the heads of Departments and considering the bill before the House in order to understand it in advance; and why are we to be deprived of our right to be in the Senate?

We certainly cannot be blamed if we cannot get the bill. The Senator from Iowa, [Mr. ALLISON,] the chairman of the committee, the Senator from Maine, [Mr. HALE,] and myself are a sub-committee on the sundry civil bill. We are willing to do all that men can do, we are willing to meet at nine o'clock in the morning and sit until twelve, and then we are willing to meet again at seven at night and sit until twelve, and we are willing to do that from week to week; but we insist that we shall not be deprived of the right to be in the Senate attending to the very important business the Senator from Kansas says will be going on when we are devoting every minute of time to the public business, not necessary to take rest, and are willing to work for six or eight hours a day. We ask the privilege of being here, and the Senate will not gain any time by forcing us to leave our committee-room at eleven o'clock and sit in the Senate until six. If they will give us another hour they will save more in that committee-room, by giving us a chance to investigate the amendments referred to us and have them reported fairly, than they will by making us meet in the Senate at eleven and sit here and do what we have to do and ought to do. We shall not gain time; we shall lose time by this. The purpose ought to be to facilitate the business of that committee now that it has so little time in which to work.

Mr. INGALLS. I do not understand that the entire Committee on Appropriations is sitting during the hours the Senator names. I am advised that all those bills are submitted to sub-committees, consisting of a few members of the entire committee.

Mr. BECK. They are at first, and the bulk of the labor is done by them. That is the reason why I named the three Senators I did, the Senator from Iowa, the Senator from Maine, and myself. The sub-committee first goes over a bill and then submits it to the whole committee, and that involves going over every bill so that each member of the committee may understand it. There is also a sub-committee on the naval appropriation bill.

Mr. INGALLS. Is that in the hands of a sub-committee?

Mr. BECK. That is in the hands of a sub-committee now, of which the Senator from Maine [Mr. HALE] is chairman. There are some extremely important questions in that bill that the Senator from Kansas would feel very much aggrieved if I could not answer.

Mr. INGALLS. The entire committee does not sit to consider the naval appropriation bill now?

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. I will say to my friend that the Committee on Appropriations is divided into three, and all of them are sitting now, probably each member on the naval appropriation bill or some other bill. There is one on the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill.

Mr. INGALLS. There is one on the naval appropriation bill.

Mr. HALE. The other is a committee of conference.

Mr. BECK. I have no objection to stay here as long as any Senator pleases, but I merely say that I expect to be in the Senate, and if we are going to meet at eleven o'clock you will have to wait that much longer for your appropriation bills. I can stay all summer as well as anybody else, but I will not do any more, as we did two or three years ago, and I do not think the Senator from Minnesota would now, when we sat up night after night, as we had to do, when we had the papers piled up so high that we could hardly see over them. It is not legislation at all; there is no chance for it; we cannot explain what we attempt to do when the bill comes into the Senate. We must have time. I wish the Senator from Minnesota would say a word; he knows what we have to do.

Mr. WINDOM. I am not a member of the Committee on Appropriations, but I appreciate and indorse every word the Senator from Kentucky has said on that subject, and I am extremely glad to hear him say that the committee is resolved that it will not work all night any more on the appropriation bills. I believe it is one of the greatest evils of our legislation; and I think the suggestion made by the Senator from Kentucky that the bills should originate in the Senate as well as in the House is a very valuable one, and the time is coming when the Senate will have to insist upon it. I think the Committee on Appropriations has done everything it could do at this session, and I am glad to learn that it does not propose to work all night as it has done heretofore.

Mr. HALE. I do not think the committee has said it will not work all night. They are working now nearly all night, and are willing to.

Mr. ALLISON. I do not think the business of the Senate will be at all facilitated at present by meeting at eleven o'clock. I have no doubt the Senate can get along very well without the Committee on Appropriations in this body during its sessions, but the several members of the Committee on Appropriations are also members of the Senate and they are interested in the legislation that is going on here and they will be present during the sessions of the Senate. For instance, after the important bill that is now under consideration, the river and harbor bill, the next bill in order, as I understand, will be the tax bill that affects all the constituents of all the Senators. Are we——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair would inform the Senator that the next bill is the bill to create the Territory of Pembina.

Mr. ALLISON. I am obliged to the Chair for correcting me in that regard and also for pronouncing the name "Pembina" correctly, as I believe he has done. [Laughter.] The bill relating to Pembina may possibly be set aside for this important tax bill, though I do not know that it will be; but we must during the sessions of the Senate on the tax bill certainly be present here. I wish to be here for one. I promise Senators that the appropriation bills will be put forward as rapidly as they can be put forward from day to day by the active work of all the members of the Committee on Appropriations.

The Senator from Kansas seems to think that we work in relays and are not all engaged at the same time. It is true we have a sub-committee upon the naval appropriation bill and also a sub-committee on the sundry civil bill; but Senators must remember that these bills are not finally disposed of when they pass the Senate. They must then pass the ordeal of the House of Representatives, and finally the ordeal of a conference committee. We have now a conference going on upon the legislative bill which has met for three or four nights during the last week and this week considering that bill, and it will meet again to-night. A conference will soon be in session on the deficiency bill. So that all these matters are going on as rapidly as possible.

Now, is it expected that Senators who are interested in the public business on the Appropriations Committee will carry on their operations in the committee-room and sit here in the Senate daily from eleven until five? I do not think that ought to be done this week. If it is necessary to hasten the adjournment, I am quite willing that we shall attempt it next week.

Mr. MORRILL. I move that the consideration of the resolution of the Senator from Arkansas be postponed until next Monday, July 17.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The motion to postpone until Monday next takes precedence of the motion to refer. The question is on the motion to postpone the resolution to Monday next.

The motion was agreed to; there being on a division—ayes 31, noes 19.

RIVER AND HARBOR BILL.

Mr. MCMILLAN. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the river and harbor bill.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate resumed, as in Committee of the Whole, the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 6242) making appropriations for the construction, repair, and preservation of certain works on rivers and harbors, and for other purposes.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The pending question is on the amendment of the Senator from Indiana, [Mr. HARRISON,] which will be read.

The ACTING SECRETARY. On page 33 it is proposed to strike out all after the word "river," in line 800, down to and including line 852, on page 36, as follows:

Continuing operations, $300,000; and this sum shall be expended at such places on said headwaters of the Mississippi River and its tributaries as the Secretary of War shall determine: Provided, That the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, authorized and empowered to enter upon, purchase, take, and hold any lands or premises, and any materials of stone, timber, or other kinds, that may be necessary and proper for the construction of said works. And in case the owner of such lands, premises, and materials and the Secretary of War cannot agree as to the value of the lands, premises, and materials taken or to be taken for said use, then the value thereof shall be determined by the appraisal of three disinterested commissioners who may be appointed upon application by either party to the judge of the United States district court for the district in which such land, premises, or materials may be situate; and said commissioners, in their assessment of damages, shall appraise such lands, premises, and materials at what would have been the value thereof if said works had not been constructed; and upon return into said United States district court of such appraisement, and upon the payment into the same of the estimated value of said land, premises, and materials so taken and appraised as aforesaid, said land, premises, and materials shall be deemed to be, and shall become, the property of the United States, which shall thereby acquire full title to the same. And either party feeling aggrieved at said appraisement may, within thirty days after the same has been returned into said court, file an appeal therefrom and demand a trial by jury in said court to estimate and ascertain the damages sustained: Provided further, That the money hereby appropriated shall be used solely for the improvement of the navigation of the Mississippi River and its tributaries, and no part thereof shall be expended with the view to the improvement of private property. And the Secretary of the Interior is hereby authorized and directed to ascertain what, if any, injury is occasioned to the rights of any friendly Indians occupying any Indian reservation by the construction of any of the said dams, or the cutting or removing of trees or other materials from any such reservation for the construction or erection of any of said dams, and to determine the amount of damages payable to such Indians therefor; and all such damages to private property and to friendly Indians, when ascertained and determined in the manner herein directed and provided, shall be paid by the United States: Provided, however, That such damages shall not exceed 10 per cent. of the sums hereby appropriated for the construction of said reservoirs.

And in lieu thereof to insert:

Continuing observations and surveys for reservoirs at the headwaters of the Mississippi River and its upper tributaries, under the direction of the Secretary of War, $50,000.

Mr. HOAR. I raised a point of order upon the amendment. So much of it as proposes to insert new matter is liable to a point of order. It is not saved from the point of order by the fact that something already in the bill is stricken out and this matter substituted. I made that point solely for the sake of saving time, but as the Senate is not legislating in time, but in eternity, I withdraw the point of order.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, I do not desire to occupy the time of the Senate very long, but if this appropriation of $300,000 is one that is entitled to the attention and consideration of the Senate I would be glad to have it for a brief time, while I present some statements from the engineers who have investigated the questions involved in this appropriation.

Mr. President, if this were a bill to distribute surplus revenues among the States I certainly should not object that the States of Minnesota and Wisconsin should have their full share, nor would I be disposed to stand upon nice questions of division with them in the distribution of this revenue; but believing as I do that this project for improving the navigation of the Mississippi River by constructing great reservoirs upon the headwaters of that river and upon the headwaters of some of its upper tributaries is not justified, that it will not be efficient to accomplish the purpose for which it is said to be inaugurated, the ostensible purpose with which it is pressed, I ask leave to call the attention of the Senator to what some of the engineers have said upon the subject.

As I said yesterday, when the Mississippi River commission was constituted it was made part of the duty of that commission to investigate this project of improving the navigation of the upper river by the construction of these reservoirs, and they were required to look into the subject and to report to Congress their views upon it. They have done so, and it is to what the engineers of that commission have said rather than to any original argument of my own that I desire to have the attention of the Senate. It has been said that the Mississippi River commission has made no personal examination of the ground upon which these reservoirs are to be constructed, and no surveys under its own control in order to ascertain the amount of water that might be accumulated or impounded, or the amount that might be delivered to the Mississippi at Saint Paul or to the mouth of the Chippewa or Wisconsin River. The fact is that the Mississippi River commission constituted a sub-committee, consisting of Major Suter, of the Engineer Corps of the Army, and Major Harrod, one of the civil engineers of that commission. I do not think there is in the Engineer Corps any officer who has had better experience upon all the questions connected with the improvement of the navigation of the Mississippi and the tributary rivers than Major Suter. This sub-committee employed a civil engineer under them, who took, in the first place, all the reports that had been made by General Warren, Colonel Farquhar, and Major Allen, who had been in immediate charge of this work, and gave a careful examination to all their reports; examining into the data which they had furnished; going through all their calculations; and that engineer went to the headquarters of Major Allen, in Saint Paul, and spent a considerable time there with him in his own office, being furnished by that officer with access to all the office data which he had collected upon this subject. After this examination that engineer made a report to the sub-committee of the Mississippi River commission. Now, I ask the attention of the Senate, first, to what that sub-committee have said. I shall not undertake to read at great length, but, if I can, to fasten the attention of the Senate upon the conclusions to which these engineers came.

Mr. McMILLAN. What report does the Senator read from?

Mr. HARRISON. I read now from the report of the sub-committee of the Mississippi River commission.

Mr. McMILLAN. Who was the sub-committee?

Mr. HARRISON. The sub-committee were Major Charles R. Suter, of the Engineer Corps, and Major B. M. Harrod, civil engineer. Mr. R. E. McMath was the engineer who prepared this extensive report, which was done under the direction of the sub-committee. They say in conclusion:

To sum up the question, it appears—

That a reservoir system to be efficient should be on a large scale.

That there is but little, if anything, to be gained by such a system that may not be effected by proper channel improvements.

That it has many disadvantages and elements of uncertainty that do not pertain to the other system of improvement.

Finally, that the choice between the two, granting possibility of construction and equality of results, is largely one of relative cost, though, unless there is material difference in this respect, preference should be given the channel improvement.

So far as the Upper Mississippi is concerned, your committee have no reason to doubt its capacity for improvement up to the full measure of the demands of its commerce. It is not so much a question of getting more water into it as it is of utilizing that which it already furnishes.

We would therefore recommend that the commission take such action in this matter as will put Congress on their guard against the hasty legislation on this subject that has already been inaugurated, while at the same time recommending such estimates as they may deem proper to carry out a comprehensive system of surveys and observations to settle the points which are now too much a matter of mere conjecture.

A scheme of operations of this character is herewith appended, the estimated cost of a year's observations being $25,000.

Mr. CONGER. What is the date of that?

Mr. HARRISON. The date of that sub-committee's report is November 30, 1880. Now, I call attention to the report of the commission itself, to whom this report of the sub-committee was made from which I have just read, and this report is dated January 8, 1881. The commission say:

We have no reason to doubt that the Upper Mississippi River is susceptible of direct channel improvement to any reasonably desired extent without the aid of reservoirs.

They further say:

An increase by reservoirs of the low-water flow would diminish the amount of contraction of low-river width which otherwise would be necessary, thus diminishing its cost, while above Prescott the greater width which thus might be adopted for the regulated river would be of value; but if, on further study, the construction of one or more of the reservoirs which furnish water at the cheapest rate should be deemed advisable, they would be valuable only after the contraction of the river had been carried to the fullest economical development, and not till then should they be built.

They say further:

The uncertainty surrounding the subject can only be removed by extended and systematic observations as to the amount of water that can be collected and stored up in reservoirs, and also as to the effect which may be expected to follow its addition to the low-water flow of the river. In order to carry out these observations we estimate that $27,000 will be required.

Now I come to some of the conclusions and recapitulations of the report:

It is therefore apparent that the interests to be subserved by the construction of reservoirs at the headwaters of the Mississippi, Saint Croix, Chippewa, and Wisconsin Rivers are not in any great measure identical with those which are directly dependent on the improvement of the navigation of the main stream below the Falls of Saint Anthony.

It seems proper to state that Major Allen, the local engineer in charge of these reservoir investigations, who has freely placed the records of his office at the disposal of the commission, has stated that he regards his last estimate of $1,400,000 for the construction and $208,000 for the first ten years' maintenance and operation of the entire reservoir system as considerably too low. He now places the cost of construction and ten years' maintenance at about $2,000,000, exclusive of land damages. If we estimate the land damages at $1,000,000 to $2,000,000, the reservoir system maintained ten years will cost from $3,000,000 to $4,000,000, and at this cost can only be regarded as an auxiliary to the method of direct channel improvement now in process of execution. In this view Major Allen coincides.

Captain Mackenzie's estimate of the cost of securing by direct means a six-foot channel from Saint Paul to Rock Island, a distance of 397 miles, is $2,847,000.

I ask Senators to keep these figures in mind. Captain Mackenzie, who is in charge of the improvement of the upper portion of the river extending nearly to Saint Paul, estimates that the channel works for which we are making appropriations in this bill, and which no one contends can be dispensed with, are the essential works. No one has looked upon the reservoirs as other than an auxiliary to the channel works, and we have here the opinion of Captain Mackenzie that the works which are now being constructed in the river and which consist of the contracting of the water-way of the river, cutting off chutes where there are two channels of the river by the construction of dams, and concentrating the flow of the water, by which they will be able to complete a six-foot channel from Saint Paul to Rock Island, will involve a cost of $2,847,000.

Now, Mr. President, the mistake I think we are making here is this: we are proposing to enter upon a work which is to cost, as an independent work, from three to four million dollars, and which is conceded to be an auxiliary work, when in the opinion of the engineers directly in charge of the main work this auxiliary or aid will not be needed at all. The suggestion of the Mississippi River commission was that we should do nothing more with this, which is auxiliary, than to continue our observations, perfect our knowledge with regard to it, and that we should only enter upon a scheme to spend this additional money when it has become apparent that the engineers were mistaken in supposing they could secure on the Mississippi River without the aid of these works the necessary water for navigation.

I read now the recapitulation of the commission on this subject. They say as follows:

First. The system of works in progress on the Mississippi River between Saint Paul and mouth of the Illinois River, with the modifications which experience will suggest, is adequate for the improvement of navigation, and should be pushed rapidly to completion.

This commission is composed, besides the gentlemen I have named, of engineers whom I have heard highly eulogized here since the river and harbor bill has been under consideration; such men as General Gillmore, the president of it, and General Comstock, of the engineer corps, both of whom sign this report. In the opinion of these engineers, and in the opinion of Captain Mackenzie, who is in charge of the works on the river, these direct works for which we are appropriating are sufficient to secure navigation on the Mississippi River up to Saint Paul.

I read in the recapitulation:

Third. It is possible that on the completion of the observations now in progress some of the proposed reservoirs which furnish water at the least cost may be found to be economical aids to the principal system of channel contraction. But they should only be built when the works for channel contraction approved have been carried to the fullest economical development.

* * * * *

Sixth. It is recommended that the sum of $49,000—

In my amendment I have made it $50,000—be appropriated for continuing the observations, examinations, and surveys necessarily required as preliminary to a trustworthy estimate of the capabilities and cost of an efficient reservoir system.

Now, Mr. President, I want to read one more extract from the report of Major Allen, the engineer in charge of this work at Saint Paul. I read from his report, at page 1780, as it would be of the engineer's reports, page 12 of the pamphlet before me. Captain Allen says:

Two main questions bearing on minor ones seem to have been asked by reviewers, self-constituted or appointed:

1. Can it be answered categorically whether or not the exact proportion of rainfall that actually feeds the water-courses (all items of loss left out) has been ascertained by daily or hourly gaugings at the outlet of a basin for a season of years?

2. Is there any precedent for the construction on so large a scale of reservoirs to aid navigation?

Answer to each, no. Experiments upon hydraulics, models for architecture, fortifications, guns, &c., have generally been made upon a limited scale. For successful working of reservoirs reference is made to the construction and operation of those assisting to maintain the great hydraulic works at Lowell, Massachusetts.

It seems, then, that the engineer in charge finds no precedent in the history of engineering construction of such reservoirs as aids to navigation upon a great river like this, and that he can only refer to those reservoirs which are used to furnish additional water-power, to accumulate or impound water during the season when the rainfall is plentiful and eke it out during the low seasons in order to run mills. I have no doubt that reservoirs are efficient for such a purpose or as feeders to canals; nor do I claim that because there is no precedent for this it may not ultimately be developed to be a practicable scheme, for I am one of those who concede that in engineering as well as in every other branch of science we go on to make precedents and should do so. It is very possible there may be mills which will be interested in this, and whose water-power will be increased by it; but I am speaking now solely of its effect upon the navigation of the Mississippi River. Major Allen goes on to say:

As to daily or hourly gaugings for a year or several years at the outlets of several typical basins so as to compare the annual flow with the product obtained by multiplying the drainage area of such basin by the recorded precipitation for one year, (or several years,) the necessity of such has been fully recognized in my previous reports and strongly urged.

So that the officer in charge, the Senate will see, says that not only in a previous report but in this report recommends these observations which are to determine the amount of precipitation and the amount of water that is drained by these several basins in which it is proposed to impound it.

But as the case has been, we found it best to take at the outset the first step, namely, to find places to store water, their capacities, &c.; then simultaneously, if possible, to find how much water could be placed in them and what such quantity of water would accomplish.

That is, to find the size of the hole, and then supposing the hole shall be filled with water, what could you do with the water that it contained, without first definitely settling the question whether the hole would be full or not.

The second step, upon which we have already entered, consists in obtaining the ratios of flow to rainfall—

This I believe is the last report of this officer—and boring and digging of wells, to satisfy the geological querist. The third step to consist in construction and operation of dams, dependent upon full facts rendered, conclusions arrived at, appropriations by Congress, &c.

In order to meet questions that will certainly arise, it seems best to continue the observations by stationing a gauging party at the outlet of a defined basin at each of the Upper Mississippi, Saint Croix, Chippewa, and Wisconsin River headwaters, and to establish meteorological stations at each; the time to cover not less than a year; observations to be made daily, and, if possible, hourly. Also to make borings at all projected dam-sites, to better report upon the resources of the country; to work up past and future records, maps, drawings, estimates, &c. For one season's operations as thus delineated not less than $47,000 will be required.

I think, Mr. President, in that extract which I have read from Captain Allen, the officer in charge, I have shown that he himself recognizes the necessity of continuing and perfecting these observations and surveys, in order that we may have the data upon which this work can go forward, if it is entitled to go forward, and certainly it is not the right way to get at that to start in now by an appropriation of $300,000, which, according to the estimates of this engineer, must go on to $4,000,000, $3,000,000 at least, without first having obtained the necessary data to know whether the work is to be efficient or not.

I do not stop to detain the Senate to consider some questions which have been raised as to the effect of delivering this water, if their calculations are right. I only suggest that it is known to every one at all familiar with the river that this anomaly or paradox exists, that there is better navigation at a certain lower stage of water than there is at a certain higher stage; in other words, just before the low-water channels are cut out through the bars, and when the waters are spread over the entire river, navigation is more difficult than it is afterward when the waters by natural processes have been concentrated, and low-water channels have been cut out. It is suggested that if you disturb this condition of things by turning in additional water, it is an open question whether it would not rather injure by filling up the low-water channels than aid navigation, unless the influx of additional water should be so great that it would furnish a navigable stage over the entire water without making the excavated or low-water channels in the bottom of the river necessary at all.

Mr. President, we have appropriations in this bill for the improvement of the Chippewa, Saint Croix, and Wisconsin Rivers, all of them separate appropriations for the improvement of these rivers. I suppose this appropriation would not have been asked at all, except for its connection with a plan of improving the navigation of the Mississippi River proper, and I want to say for one that when it can be demonstrated that it is necessary, the $4,000,000 that is talked of here, or twice that sum, will not stand in my way for one moment in making the appropriation. I claim to be a thorough-going friend of the improvement of the Mississippi River, and every other principal stream in our country. I believe, as I have said before in the Senate, by this sort of improvement we have the most natural, the most flexible, and the most efficient regulation of the charges of railways that we can obtain in any way, and I profess myself here friendly to every such scheme.

But, Mr. President, as I felt with regard to the levee project so I feel with regard to the reservoirs project, that if we are to add to the cost of the improvement of the channel of the Mississippi River $4,000,000 in a project for constructing reservoirs, I believe, upon the opinion of the engineers, they are likely to fail of their purpose, and so we shall break down in the commerce of this country the true rule of improving our channels by proper means. Therefore it is as one friendly to the improvement of this river, and one who will not stint at all in appropriations to make the river serviceable to commerce and to all people who dwell upon it from Saint Paul to New Orleans, that I have thought that I shall protest at this session against these attachments or auxiliaries which are talked of here and which I believe not to be any proper part of the channel improvement.

As all the Senators from the States interested and all others know, I can have no possible feeling in this matter. If it were a mere matter of cleverness, if it were a matter of kindness toward gentlemen here or toward the States which they represent, I am sure no one here would go further than I would to evidence that kindness. But I think it is a serious question to start in with an appropriation of $300,000, and we do it directly in the teeth and face of this commission which Congress has put in charge of this river and has asked to report upon the propriety or necessity of these different plans. I think we take a grave responsibility when we do it.

I know there have been a great many calculations and reports with reference to these reservoirs, with reference to what they will do, but if we examine them all they are theoretical, and, as I have shown from the last report of Major Allen, he himself recognizes the fact that there have not been such surveys and observations of rainfall and outflow from the streams draining these basins as to justify him in saying just how much water he could deliver to the Mississippi.

Mr. CONGER. Will the Senator tell me what last report of Major Allen he refers to? What is the date?

Mr. HARRISON. The report I read from is 1881.

Mr. CONGER. Considerably more than a year ago. They are the reports of a year ago last fall.

Mr. HARRISON. I think not a year ago last fall.

Mr. CONGER. While he was engaged in the examination.

Mr. HARRISON. This is the last report the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. WINDOM] tells me he has seen, and it was sent to me from the office of the Chief of Engineers. I will turn to the report itself. The date is January 16, 1881.

Mr. CONGER. So that it is the report of the operations of the preceding year.

Mr. HARRISON. I do not care what year's operations it is a report of; it is the last report that can be furnished to us from the Engineer's Office on this subject as far as I know. It is the latest information that Congress has upon the subject.

Now, Mr. President, I have said all I care to say about this matter. I simply felt that having from circumstances had some previous knowledge of this matter, it was due to the Senate and to myself that I should state these facts, produce these records which I have read, and simply say that in my judgment we cannot justify ourselves in going over the reports of these engineers upon the pretext of improving the Mississippi, when they have said it is not necessary to the improvement of the Mississippi, and when they have said it is doubtful whether it will aid it, and when they have said that there is not sufficient information upon which Congress should go forward to act. Now, I have felt so. As I have said before, if further information shall develop that these reservoirs ought to be built, the cost which has been named here or twice that cost will not be in my way if they are necessary to give safe navigation up to Saint Paul.

Mr. McMILLAN. Mr. President, I have listened with interest to the remarks of the Senator from Indiana, and I have been impressed with the fact that the Senator has spoken from a stand-point which gave him a very limited view of the question he was discussing. It is true that the Senator was at one time a member of the Mississippi River commission, and has given some attention to the improvement of that river; but it has been to a portion of the river entirely distinct and separate from that portion of it to which our attention is called this morning.

The Senator has in his remarks assumed that the Mississippi River took its rise at Saint Paul and emptied into the Gulf of Mexico. We have heard not one word of any portion of the Mississippi River but that from Saint Paul down. The Senator does not seem to be aware of the fact that between the Falls of Saint Anthony and the nearest point at which the discharge of water will take place from this system of reservoirs is three hundred and fifty miles, a distance about as far as from Rock Island to the Falls of Saint Anthony, a portion of country embraced in the State which I have the honor in part to represent here, and to which the Mississippi River commission has never turned a glance. The Northern Pacific road bisects that portion of the country and that part of the river up at Brainerd, and the country below and above is an interesting and rich country, capable of great development, with but one interruption in the bed of the Mississippi to navigation between those points, and I call attention to that fact.

Mr. HARRISON. Now, I ask the Senator whether this bill contains any appropriation for the improvement of the Upper Mississippi—above Saint Paul, I mean?

Mr. McMILLAN. The appropriation for the Mississippi River is contained in a general appropriation clause suggested by the Mississippi River commission. The Upper Mississippi River, as it is generally termed and generally understood, embraces only that part of the Mississippi River above the Des Moines Rapids to the Falls of Saint Anthony. That is termed and known as the Upper Mississippi River, and appropriations in the river and harbor bills passed by Congress under that term have applied to that portion of the river. When an appropriation is made for the river above that point it is designated as the Mississippi River above the Falls of Saint Anthony, and to that portion of the river appropriations have been made annually for a number of years. This year, perhaps, that appropriation has been omitted, but it has been incorporated in bills in preceding years, and always designated in that way. So that there is a portion of the river, equal to the distance between Rock Island and the Falls of Saint Anthony, which of itself would justify this improvement.

But I have a further reference to make to the report of the Mississippi River commission. By whom is it made? I observe that it is signed by Q. A. Gillmore, president of the Mississippi River commission, and lieutenant-colonel of Engineers, C. B. Comstock, Charles R. Suter, Henry Mitchell, B. M. Harrod, and Benjamin Harrison, but appended to that report I discover this statement, and I call the particular attention of the Senate to the fact: I see it announced that James B. Eads states that the report is concurred in by him, with the exception of that part of it which relates to the improvement by means of reservoirs, of which he says:

> I have not sufficiently investigated this subject to justify an opinion upon it.

He refuses to concur in the opinion of this board of engineers, these engineers who state that this is something new, that there can be no reference to reservoirs constructed upon other systems, and that therefore it should not be undertaken. Mr. Eads knows that every enterprise which has been undertaken and successfully carried out at the mouth of the Mississippi River has been under the opposition, the determined opposition and resistance of the very men who are now denouncing this reservoir system, and those of the same corps.

Mr. HARRISON. The Senator is mistaken about that.

Mr. McMILLAN. He did meet the opposition and determined resistance of those who feared to enter upon the jetty system because it was new.

Mr. WINDOM. I want to correct the Senator and state my recollection of the jetty business. I think that seven engineers when they started out to investigate that matter at the mouth of the Mississippi stood six against to one in favor of the project. After they had made the investigation, gone over the ground, they came back reversed, six in favor and one against, precisely as they are now; before they have ever investigated or know anything about it, they are against it; but if they will go and investigate it on the ground, as the engineers have, they will be in favor of it.

Mr. McMILLAN. I think my colleague is right, and that is just the argument I was going to make in regard to this matter. Mr. Eads knows what obstacles he met with in endeavoring to inaugurate a system which was new and in which, from his examination, he had faith would be successful, and which the result has proved to be successful.

Then, in reference to this report further, what is it? It seems to me that the report from which the Senator from Indiana read was a report prepared by a civilian who was appointed by a sub-committee of the Mississippi River commission to make an examination of the reports and calculations and examinations made by the engineer in charge of this very improvement.

Mr. HARRISON. If the Senator will look at the report of Major Allen and Major Farquhar, or that of any other engineer, he will find that just that work is done by civilian employés all along. His own report here produces the report of civilian employés.

Mr. McMILLAN. I know how the reports from the engineer in charge of the works in our State are made. I know that Major Allen, in charge of these improvements, gives his personal inspection to this work and to all the works within his department, at Duluth, on the Red River of the North, the Mississippi reservoirs, and the Upper Mississippi. Of course much of the detail of the work is done by those who are subordinate, but the work is done by persons on the ground; and that was not the case with the engineer to whose report the Senator from Indiana has referred, because the sub-committee only charged him with the duty of examining the calculations and the work as it appeared upon paper made by Major Allen. He was not sent to make a personal inspection of the river above the Falls of Saint Anthony; he was not sent to examine the actual work in regard to these reservoirs, probably never got nearer to them than Saint Paul, probably never has been there in his life; and upon such a report as that the sub-committee make a report to the Mississippi River commission, upon which they come here and say that this work should not be undertaken.

The Mississippi River, from Saint Louis up to Saint Paul, has certain peculiar features which affect its navigation. From Saint Louis to the Des Moines Rapids the minimum stage of water may be put at five feet in the channel. The canal around the rapids provides for a minimum of five feet and a maximum of eight feet in the channel.

The next obstruction in the navigation is at Rock Island, where a channel has been cut through the rock, and that gives a minimum depth of four feet in the channel. Boats that pass above Rock Island and get to La Crosse can pass up to Hastings; the difficulties that they meet before coming to La Crosse are about equal to those they encounter after passing La Crosse before coming to Hastings, a town about twenty-five miles below Saint Paul, and three miles above the mouth of the Saint Croix River, a tributary of the Mississippi.

After coming to that point the great difficulties in the navigation of the river between Saint Paul and Keokuk are encountered, and there is where the principal difficulty must be overcome. When you get the difficulties removed from that space of the river, then you can have a channel from Saint Louis to Saint Paul of a minimum depth of five feet.

Mr. President, this reservoir system consists of a series of lakes about three hundred and fifty miles above Saint Paul, and in that portion of the State is a very interesting part of this country. From that source, about that section of the State, the waters divide, a portion running west into the Red River of the North, running thence due north into the Canadian province of Manitoba, into Lake Winnipeg; others run east into Lake Superior; others run southeast into the Mississippi River; but the source of the Mississippi River in Lake Itasca comes down, after running several hundreds of miles, into this series of lakes which are constituted reservoirs, and from them into the main channel of the Mississippi River. This system of lakes it is conceded is well prepared by nature for the purpose of reservoirs; they will retain all the water that can be collected there and the discharge from all the series of lakes in the channel of the Mississippi River is at the Falls of Pokegama. There the water comes into a stream which supplies the quantity to be used for the purpose of navigation in the Mississippi River.

This commission itself adverts to the fact that these lakes are admirably adapted to this system of reservoirs, and that from these upper sources of the Mississippi River 6,400 cubic feet of water per second can be discharged at the Falls of Pokegama or at the dam at the mouth of Pokegama Lake, so that the discharge from these reservoirs will give at Saint Paul, according to the estimate and the observations taken for years, the amount of 12,000 cubic feet per second passing that city, which will just about double the present volume of water found there; I mean the low-water flow at that city. This is about 100 per cent. of increase of the water at Saint Paul, and it will affect the stream to the same extent and have the same beneficial results down below Hastings, the point to which I have referred, and will overcome the very obstacles which the engineers say must be removed before this channel can be made to Saint Paul.

Mr. President, the Senator referred to the fact that the improvements going on by wing-dams were improving the Mississippi River. That will be conceded. But they have not been able to obtain the depth in the channels that is necessary for the improvement of navigation to the extent which is necessary to afford the facilities which the commerce of the river demands between Rock Island and the Falls of Saint Anthony. The observations taken by these engineers have extended through a period of more than ten years. They have been made by General Warren in charge of the improvements there. They have been made by Major Houston and by Colonel Farquhar and by Major Allen, all in charge of that division of the river and harbor improvement. Every one of these officers has examined this system; they have each one gone into detail and made all the observations and calculations which could be obtained in regard to it, and I refer the Senate to the reports of Colonel Farquhar——

Mr. HARRISON. What report of Colonel Farquhar does the Senator refer to?

Mr. McMILLAN. The report made in February, 1875.

Mr. HARRISON. I will ask the Senator to read from that report, or allow me to read, in which he says:

In closing this report, I would state that it is only preliminary to a more complete one to be rendered when the detailed surveys of the sites of proposed locks and dams have been made.

Mr. McMILLAN. And that was the survey he was making; he has made it, and he has been followed in those details by Major Houston, and much more in detail by Major Allen, who has had charge of the work for the last three or four years, and his report I have before me containing the maps of the surveys of these dams and the observations and calculations made by him upon the observations in regard to the precipitation of moisture, in regard to the capacity of these reservoirs, and in regard to the effect of the discharge of this water during one hundred days of low water during the summer, because that is the period in which the navigation is seriously affected and embarrassed.

Now, Mr. President, in regard to the observations taken as to the precipitation of moisture in the region of these reservoirs, observations have been had at Fort Ripley for ten years; observations have been had at Fort Snelling since the establishment of the fort in 1826. Senators must not suppose that nothing has been done in that country in regard to these matters. The largest record of observations in the Northwest in regard to meteorological matters is found in the registers at Fort Snelling and at Fort Ripley, an old military post of the Government. These records are found there; and the report of Major Allen is that his calculations are much within the average allowed by those observations.

There can be no doubt whatever that these calculations have been minute and extensive; and so far as the reservoirs of the Mississippi River are concerned, I do not believe one iota can be added to them by the Mississippi River commission; and if they would make a personal observation of that country, if they would make an inspection of it, and go through the reports that have been made on the subject themselves, they would come to the same conclusion that the engineers in charge have done.

Mr. HARRISON. If the Senator will allow me, I will say for his information that when the Mississippi River commission went up the river to examine the upper river they took on board Captain Mackenzie on that part of the river of which he was in charge, and stopped wherever he was erecting a dam. He had his drawings along, and they examined the work as it was on the ground or in the water, and had an explanation from him as to what he hoped to accomplish and what he had accomplished. They also had Major Allen on board in the same way. They invited him to go down the river some distance. He did, and got on the boat, and they went over all these matters with him. There was discussion between him and the other engineers as to all these matters, he stating his theory and going over the data he had.

Mr. McMILLAN. Will the Senator state where Major Allen came from and where he went with the commission?

Mr. HARRISON. Major Allen came from Saint Paul. I do not recollect at what point he got on the boat.

Mr. McMILLAN. Was it at Cairo?

Mr. HARRISON. No, sir; it was on the upper river.

Mr. McMILLAN. Some place between Keokuk and Saint Paul. The commission in their report say:

This subject, though not embraced in the act organizing the commission, was referred to them during the past season.

A matter that they had not had charge of officially, a matter to which they had paid no attention. Then they say further:

At that time the field operations for the present season had been already laid out, and as the sum allotted by Congress for the use of the commission was considerably less than either their original estimate or their supplemental estimate, they did not feel justified in diverting any money from the more important Mississippi work to follow up this new subject of investigation.

They paid no attention to it whatever; they applied not one cent of the amount at their disposal to examining this new matter, but they appointed a sub-committee, who requested some civil engineer, of we know not what capacity or acquirements, to examine the reports of Major Allen in his office; and that is the ground upon which the Mississippi River commission attempt to pronounce a judgment upon an important system which has been favored by the Army engineers, engineers as capable as the members of the board. Colonel Farquhar will compare with any of them; Major Allen is perhaps a younger man, but with a reputation which they cannot interfere with. Major Houston, General Warren, of the engineers of the Army, equal in number, equal in capacity, are all in favor of this improvement. The Mississippi River commission stood with the principal and most active man refusing to concur in their report. Eads was not ready to denounce this improvement because it was new, established as it is by the calculations and the observations of these scientific men.

Now, Mr. President, with reference to the cost of this improvement it is very evident to me that neither this Mississippi River commission nor the Senator from Indiana understands the nature of these different systems of reservoirs; or if the Senator does understand them he has not presented them in that distinct manner which would convey to the Senate the proper information as to the cost of this improvement.

The system of reservoirs upon the headwaters of the Mississippi, and which will affect as I have stated, and to the extent I have stated, according to the reports of the engineer, the Mississippi River below Hastings, is entirely different from any of the reservoirs upon the other streams mentioned. The Saint Croix is altogether different and may be regarded as independent of the Mississippi River. The Chippewa improvement, the Wisconsin improvement, all these are attended by different circumstances, and are altogether unlike those in the Mississippi system of reservoirs.

Mr. HARRISON. Will the Senator answer me this question, does not this appropriation here cover the improvement of the Saint Croix and the Wisconsin?

Mr. McMILLAN. This appropriation is to be expended upon the reservoirs which have been commenced, and will be appropriated to reservoirs upon the Mississippi River.

Mr. HARRISON. I want to get a correct understanding; I do not think it is very distinct in the bill. Does the Senator mean that this appropriation is for reservoirs on the Upper Mississippi alone, that none of it is to be expended on the Saint Croix or the Wisconsin?

Mr. McMILLAN. The Senator will understand that the system of reservoirs has been inaugurated. Seventy-five thousand dollars has been appropriated, and one of the dams has been commenced.

Mr. INGALLS. Where?

Mr. McMILLAN. That dam is at the mouth of the Pokegama Lake, and that is one of the series of lakes embracing five, which constitute——

Mr. HARRISON. The Senator does not understand my question.

Mr. McMILLAN. I will answer before I stop. It is one of the lakes at the head of the Mississippi River which constitute one section of these reservoirs.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. Will my friend from Minnesota allow me to call the attention of the Senator from Indiana——

Mr. McMILLAN. I understand the language of the appropriation.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. The provision of the bill itself answers him.

Mr. HARRISON. I thought the Senator from Minnesota did not seem to understand it.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. It is discretionary with the Engineer Bureau.

Mr. McMILLAN. I understand it perfectly, but the Senator from Indiana has recited here from the Mississippi River commission in regard to the expense of this improvement, and I want to call his attention to the fact that that statement of amount embraces every improvement upon all the headwaters of every stream mentioned in this system of improvements. It embraces all the reservoirs we have constructed on the headwaters of the Mississippi River, all the reservoirs upon the headwaters of the Saint Croix, all the reservoirs upon the headwaters of the Chippewa River, all the reservoirs upon the headwaters of the Wisconsin River.

Mr. WINDOM. And Rock River.

Mr. McMILLAN. And Rock River too. In making the statement of the estimate of the cost, the Mississippi River commission say:

It seems proper to state that Major Allen, the local engineer in charge of these reservoir investigations, who has freely placed the records of his office at the disposal of the commission, has stated that he regards his last estimate of $1,400,000 for the construction, and $208,000 for the first ten years' maintenance and operation of the entire reservoir system, as considerably too low.

Major Allen's estimate in regard to the maintenance of the Mississippi system of reservoirs is $10,000 per annum for ten years, and that is the entire cost.

Mr. HARRISON. Will the Senator pardon me? He is charging me with a mistake. Now, I understand that this appropriation is the beginning of the work of constructing all these reservoirs that have been recommended by Major Allen and others on all these tributaries as well as the Upper Mississippi. If so, where is the mistake of the Mississippi River commission in including the cost of maintenance of all these things that your engineer on whom you rely has recommended to be constructed, and upon the construction of which you enter by this bill, every one of them?

Mr. McMILLAN. Because in the report of the Mississippi River commission, to which the Senator referred and from which he read, they put that forth as a report upon the improvements of the Upper Mississippi River between the Falls of Saint Anthony and the mouth of the Mississippi River. That is their report on page 4 of this pamphlet. These reservoirs are in entirely separate and distinct sections, and it would be unfair to charge all of them to the system upon the headwaters of the Mississippi, which will give to the entire improvement of the Mississippi River for three hundred and fifty miles above the Falls of Saint Anthony, and over the difficult obstructions below that in the Upper Mississippi River, a channel of five feet minimum between Keokuk or Saint Louis and the Falls of Saint Anthony.

So far as the system of reservoirs on the Mississippi River is concerned, both the expense and the annual maintenance of the system is economical and is comparatively small. These estimates are all here distinctly made, and it must have been through inadvertence, because they did not know what they were talking about, evidently, that they embraced this whole system distinct, entirely; because nothing has been entered upon but the improvement of this system at the headwaters of the Mississippi.

Mr. HARRISON. But do you not intend by this appropriation to enter upon it on the Chippewa and on the Wisconsin?

Mr. McMILLAN No, sir, I distinctly say; because the improvement upon the Saint Croix River, in Wisconsin, and the improvement upon the Chippewa will be a matter which, although a part of the same system, yet is not essentially connected with the Mississippi reservoirs.

Mr. HARRISON. I am sure the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. CAMERON] does not understand that his State is left out in this appropriation?

Mr. McMILLAN. The Senator from Wisconsin understands this entire system, and he understands this appropriation, and if this system is completed, if this Mississippi reservoir system is completed, then the Senator from Indiana will find whether it is a success or not. Then the Senator will find whether it will do to undertake the improvement of the Wisconsin or of Rock River or of any other. Here is where the Senator disputes the fact that this system is feasible. The Mississippi River commission denied that this should be entered upon, because it was too much of an experiment. Now, let it be solved where it can be solved, where the experiments show that the least cost will be incurred and where the great results will follow.

This is not to interfere at all with the present system of improvements by wing-dams. That may be conducted to perfection, and this will be an aid to it; it will only make it more successful, because if this channel is created by wing-dams in the Mississippi River then the reservoir system will empty into the channel this amount of water, which must increase the depth of the channel both on the system of scouring out and of obtaining a greater supply of water.

Mr. President, I will not detain the Senate longer, and ask for a vote.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. Mr. President, the thermometer indicates a degree of heat of I think about 90, and although I take a great interest in the question of reservoirs on the Upper Mississippi and the upper tributaries of that river, I do not think I shall be able to interest the Senate on the subject for any great length of time to-day.

When this bill came from the House it contained a provision appropriating the sum of $300,000 for the construction of reservoirs upon the Upper Mississippi and its tributaries. This sum, by the provisions of the bill, is to be expended under the direction of the Engineer Bureau. The engineers may in commencing this work conclude to construct all the reservoirs that can be constructed with the amount of this present appropriation upon the upper waters of the Mississippi River proper; they may conclude that one or more reservoirs had better be constructed upon the Saint Croix, upon the Chippewa, or upon the Wisconsin River. I leave that matter entirely to the Chief of Engineers.

Mr. HARRISON. I ask the Senator whether he does not understand this bill as the Senator from Minnesota does, that this provision is to be expended exclusively on the headwaters of the Mississippi?

Mr. McMILLAN. I did not state that such were the terms of the bill at all.

Mr. HARRISON. That the Senator understood to be the effect of it. It was to be there spent. I understood the Senator from Minnesota to say that the State of Wisconsin gets no benefit by this appropriation at all.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. If the navigation of the Mississippi River is improved the State which I represent does receive a benefit, no matter whether the reservoir is constructed in a river lying in the State of Wisconsin or in the Mississippi River proper above the falls. I say I leave that matter entirely where the bill leaves it, in the hands of the engineers.

This provision of the bill was very fully considered in public by the House Committee on Commerce. Those who oppose this proposed system of improving the river were represented before that committee, and those who favor this proposed plan for improving the navigation of the Mississippi were also represented there, and after full consideration the committee reported this provision as it now stands in the bill to the House. The provision was considered in the House, was debated at length, and by a decided vote the House refused to strike out this provision, refused to modify it, and adopted it, I think, exactly as it was reported by the committee.

Mr. SAULSBURY. Will the Senator allow me to ask whether the object of the reservoirs is to store up the surplus water, or is it for the purpose of accumulating water in order to make navigation when the rivers are low? I should like to understand the object.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. Both those objects are in view, but primarily the latter. This is not a new project at all. It was very carefully considered before the Engineer Bureau long before the passage of the act under which the Mississippi River commission was appointed.

I read from Executive Document No. 54, Forty-fifth Congress, third session, page 12, a report made by Major Allen, of the Engineer Corps, on the 28th day of December, 1878. Major Allen uses this language:

The general interest in the subject—

That is the subject of reservoirs—

has called out several able though preliminary reports, the principal among them being report by Major G. K. Warren, brevet major-general, United States Army, April 30, 1870, contained in Annual Report Chief of Engineers, 1870; report by Major D. C. Houston, brevet colonel, United States Army, January 27, 1873; report by Major and Brevet Lieutenant-Colonel Farquhar, February 4, 1875, contained in Annual Report Chief of Engineers, 1875; and subsequent reports by the same officer January 23, 1878.

It will appear from this statement that as early as 1870 this subject was considered by the Engineer Bureau and reported upon. It was again considered in 1875, in 1878, and subsequently, so that the question is not a new question at all.

Now, in plain language, what is this thing? It is well known that during the flood season there is a great surplus of water in the Upper Mississippi and its upper tributaries. It flows down, overflows the valley adjacent to the Upper Mississippi and tends to flood the lower valley of that great river. It is well known, further, that during the dry season, that is, commencing about the 1st of July and extending through the months of July, August, and September, the water of the river, except during exceptionally wet periods, is very low, and the commerce of the upper river is very much interfered with in consequence of this low water. The object of these reservoirs is to collect the surplus water during the season of flood, store it in these reservoirs, and during the season of low water let it out so as to maintain a comparatively uniform depth of water in the river during the entire period of navigation each season. Incidentally, one effect of storing the water will be to lessen the floods below, and in that way tend to prevent—how far it will prevent I, of course, do not know, and the engineers do not know either how far it will prevent—the disastrous effects of the floods upon the lower valley. That can only be conjectured; but I think I am safe in asserting that to some extent at least it will prevent those injuries.

Mr. HARRISON. I think the Senator from Wisconsin will find that Major Allen does not himself claim that it will have any effect on the lower river at all but a short distance below.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. I do not claim that it will have. You mean as to decreasing the flood. He does claim that it will have an effect in raising the water during the dry season.

Mr. HARRISON. Yes.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. Now I desire to refer again to the document from which I have read; first, as to the practicability of establishing reservoirs upon those waters, I refer to pages 15, 24, 26, and 28 of the same document. I need not read at length from the document, but it will be observed if this document is examined that this distinguished engineer is satisfied, and so reports, that the establishment of these reservoirs is practicable. He gives detailed statements of the amount of water that can be stored in the various reservoirs recommended to be constructed by him, and the amount is very large.

Something has been said in regard to the cost of the reservoirs. We do not expect that they will be built for nothing; we do not expect that they can be built for any very inconsiderable sum. The object to be attained is a great one, and if they will accomplish what it is claimed they will accomplish, that is, maintain a uniform depth of water in the Mississippi from Saint Paul to Keokuk during the entire season of navigation, they will be worth a large sum of money.

In regard to the cost of these reservoirs various estimates have been made, but the last estimate, I think, is contained in Executive Document No. 48, Forty-sixth Congress, third session, pages 12 and 13. Major Allen recommends the construction of seven reservoirs upon the Upper Mississippi.

The sum total of the seven proposed dams—

at the sources of the Mississippi will then be $558,135.08, and, if telegraph lines be necessary, $573,660.08.

The cost of the system of dams upon the Saint Croix, Chippewa, and Wisconsin Rivers, noted in my report of January 15, 1880, was placed at $968,338.80. To this estimate I would add, in the light of recent examinations upon the sources of the Mississippi River, 25 per cent., bringing the estimate up to $1,235,423.50.

The total first cost, then, of the entire system for the Mississippi, Saint Croix, Chippewa, and Wisconsin Rivers is estimated at $1,809,083.50. This is exclusive of land damages—a problematical sum.

It is impossible to arrive at the exact sum, of course, that these land damages will amount to, but the region in which it is proposed to construct these reservoirs is an uninhabited country. A large portion of the land is still owned by the United States. In the State of Wisconsin a portion of the land that will probably be required for the construction of the dams on the headwaters of the rivers in that State belongs to the State, and those lands have been withdrawn from market, waiting for the time when Congress will make an appropriation for the purpose of constructing these reservoirs in Wisconsin. The engineers have shown in a subsequent report the description of lands that will probably be required in the construction of these reservoirs. This description of lands can be found in Executive Document No. 39, Forty-sixth Congress, second session; and if any Senator will take the pains to examine this document he will find the lands described in detail.

I am satisfied, Mr. President, from some slight knowledge of the country in which it is proposed to construct these reservoirs, that the land damages will not amount to a million of dollars, as was suggested by the Senator from Indiana, or anything like that sum.

The State of Wisconsin would be perfectly willing to donate its lands for the purpose of the construction of these reservoirs. The State would be satisfied that it could derive no greater advantage from the use of those lands than by devoting them to that purpose.

Mr. HARRISON. Will the Senator inform the Senate what amount of land belonging to the State of Wisconsin will probably be flooded by these dams?

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. It is stated——

Mr. HARRISON. I suppose the Senator is not authorized here, representing his State, to remit the damages that would be due the State of Wisconsin if we should flow this water over her lands.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. I am not authorized to remit them, but I am authorized to state that the matter was considered by the Legislature of Wisconsin, and by an act of the Legislature those lands were withdrawn from market, waiting for the time when these reservoirs would be constructed.

Mr. WINDOM. I am informed that the State has remitted all claim for damages to these lands.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. The Senator from Indiana now has his answer. As the representative of the State, in view of the action of the State, I do now feel authorized to remit all damages that anybody may suffer from the taking of these lands for this purpose in Wisconsin. I supposed they had done so, but I was not quite certain enough to state positively that that had been done.

Mr. McMILLAN. And Minnesota has ceded her right to the land, and also has passed an act remitting damages.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. The engineers state with great minuteness and particularity the amount of water that can be impounded in the proposed reservoirs, and unless their estimate is very much exaggerated the effect of using the water thus stored during the season of low navigation would be to give a uniform depth of water from Saint Paul to Keokuk of six feet.

The Senator from Indiana objects to this provision of the bill, and has moved to strike it out for one reason, as he states, that the information we now have is not sufficiently accurate to justify Congress in acting upon the subject at this time. The Senator from Minnesota has shown at length what information has been laid before Congress in regard to this subject. Of course, no one can tell absolutely what the effect will be upon the navigation of the Upper Mississippi. Those who are best informed and who by their studies and acquirements are competent to express an opinion upon this subject, always excepting the Mississippi River commission, are of the opinion that it will increase the depth of water to a uniform depth of six feet during the season of low water on the Upper Mississippi. The Mississippi River commission propose and recommend that certain work shall be done upon the Mississippi River for the purpose of improving the navigation of the river, and yet they do not pretend to say positively what results will eventuate from these works if they are done in accordance with their recommendation. Everything that we do upon the Mississippi River is, to a certain extent, experimental; everything that we do in many other localities is also, to a certain extent, experimental. We yesterday agreed upon an appropriation of $300,000, the exact amount that is asked for in this appropriation, for the improvement of the harbor at Charleston, South Carolina. The plan of improvement that has been adopted and is now being carried out in that harbor is new. The Senator from South Carolina had read a letter from the principal engineer in charge stating that after the expenditure of nearly a million dollars the navigation of the harbor is worse now than it was when the work was commenced.

Mr. BUTLER. Seven hundred thousand dollars.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. But, suggesting that if the plan is carried out as is proposed the navigation will be improved; admitting at the same time that it is problematical, that it may improve it, and it may not improve it. In other words, it is a new plan, and it is to be tested for the first time in the improvement of the harbor at Charleston. Now, a person who did not know that the fact existed would suppose that the Mississippi River commission had reduced this question down to a mathematical certainty; that they know exactly what they are doing and what the effect of what they are doing will ultimately be. If any Senator, however, will refer to the last report of that commission he will see that even that commission do not know what the effect of the improvements which they recommend will be. They hope and expect that these improvements will greatly benefit the navigation of the great Mississippi River, but it is an opinion merely, and cannot be certainly known until the plan is carried out.

Mr. BUTLER. If it will not interfere with the argument of my friend——

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. Oh, no, sir.

Mr. BUTLER. I simply want to correct a misapprehension under which he seems to labor as to Charleston Harbor. I understand that that is not problematical. It is the same system practically that was adopted by Captain Eads at the mouth of the Mississippi, and I am told it has been adopted at several other harbors. General Gillmore recommended it after the most thorough and complete investigation and has not one particle of doubt of its success. It is true that just in the transition state this condition of things happened in the harbor which he predicted at the time, but it has not shaken his confidence in the success of the work in the slightest degree. I am much obliged to the Senator for permitting me to correct what appeared to be a misapprehension. That is all I desired.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. I hope that the plan adopted for the improvement of the harbor at Charleston will be as successful in all respects as its most earnest advocates can desire. I have no reason to think that it will not be. I referred to it simply for the purpose of calling attention to the fact that as to a large amount of the work that is provided to be done in this river and harbor bill the effect of it is problematical. We hope that effect will be all that the Engineer Bureau anticipate and desire it will be, but that is a matter that the future alone can determine.

This bill provides an appropriation of $5,000,000 for the improvement of the Mississippi River below Cairo. That is a very large sum of money. The matter was fully considered, however, by the Senate when a separate bill making this appropriation was under consideration, but just what the effect of the improvements upon the Lower Mississippi River by the expenditure of this large sum of money will be no man can tell, not even a member of the Mississippi River commission.

Mr. SAULSBURY. What is the amount of appropriation above Cairo on the Mississippi River?

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. I am asked by the Senator from Delaware what is the aggregate amount of the appropriation for the Mississippi River above Cairo, and its tributaries. I have not figured up the amount. The chairman of the committee will inform the Senator.

Mr. McMILLAN. About one million dollars in this bill.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. That includes, as I understand, the sum of $300,000 appropriated for the construction of reservoirs. I hold in my hand the last report made by the Mississippi River commission, which is Executive Document No. 10, Forty-seventh Congress, first session. I read from it for the purpose of showing that that commission is experimenting in the matter of the proposed improvements upon the Mississippi River. On page 4 I read thus:

> In projecting improvements at these localities the commission have considered that a reduction of the width of the river by suitable works to a uniform low-water width of 3,000 feet would accomplish the results desired.

That is their opinion.

> The maps, however, were made several years ago, and changes are known to have occurred. It will therefore be essential, before definitely laying out the works, that a resurvey should be made.

That is, a resurvey of the whole lower river. The report proceeds:

> It will also doubtless be necessary to modify the project during the process of the works in order to meet changes in the regimen of the river that cannot be foreseen at present.
> The plan submitted is therefore only an expression of our ideas as to the general points to be attained or approximated to as nearly as possible.

There is one subject, however, upon which the Mississippi River commission always agree; there is no dissent among their members as to that, and that is expressed in this language:

> In carrying out the work under the existing appropriation the commission deem it of the utmost importance that there should be no failure to secure results due to lack of the necessary funds.

They are all in favor of getting whatever amount of funds they deem necessary to carry on this great work, and I am in favor of giving them the necessary amount of funds. Even Captain Eads does not dissent from his associates upon the commission in regard to that matter. After stating at some considerable length the plans of improvement proposed by the commission, the report proceeds thus:

> That these methods are practicable, although not yet beyond the experimental stage, and that they can, in some form or another, be rendered effective for the objects in view, is shown by the works already executed on the Mississippi and Missouri Rivers.

I refer to that, as I have stated, merely for the purpose of showing that the objection which the Senator from Indiana makes against this appropriation, to wit, that the information now before Congress is not sufficient to inform Congress absolutely what the effect of the proposed improvement of the navigation of the river by means of reservoirs will be, is not tenable for the reason that the Mississippi River commission themselves do not pretend to state absolutely what effect the improvements which they propose will have upon the navigation of the river, even if they are carried out according to their plans.

I think the information before the Senate is sufficient to justify us in making this appropriation. If it shall be found after constructing the reservoirs, which can be constructed with this sum of $300,000, that the plan is a failure, Congress can do in regard to it as it has done in regard to other matters, abandon it; but the engineers who have examined this improvement thoroughly and carefully, I submit, are of the opinion that the navigation of the river will be greatly improved by means of the proposed reservoirs, and no one will doubt that if a uniform depth of water of five or six feet from Saint Paul to Keokuk can be obtained by means of reservoirs, it will be worth ten times over to the country adjacent to the Mississippi and to the whole country what it would cost.

Mr. WINDOM. Mr. President, I have no doubt the Senate is weary of this discussion and of this bill, and I should be very glad indeed to relieve it from any further talk upon this subject were it not that I deem this appropriation of very great importance, and I should not be doing my duty did I not present very briefly my views with reference to it. I promise the Senate, however, that I shall be very brief.

The Senator from Indiana alluded to this as hasty legislation, and he conveyed to the Senate the impression that it is ill considered; that surveys, estimates, and careful consideration are required before Congress can safely enter upon this work. I have before me on my desk only a part of the official reports made upon this subject year after year, and yet these reports cover over one thousand pages of investigations, reports, surveys, everything tending to give Congress and the country full information on the subject. The reports are made, too, by some of the ablest engineers of the Army. These surveys began as far back as 1869 and they have continued almost every year from that time to this. Yet the Senator tells us that this is something novel, that it is hasty legislation, entered upon without due consideration.

The whole people of the Upper Mississippi Valley have known all about this, and have been deeply interested in it for years. The Legislatures of three or four, and I do not know how many more, States in that section of the country have memorialized Congress for it. Boards of trade from Saint Paul to Saint Louis have also sent memorials asking that Congress make this improvement. The Mississippi River convention, which met some two years ago at Quincy, Illinois, after a full discussion of this question by representatives of the commercial interests all along the Mississippi River, passed a resolution urging Congress to commence this work, and it was not entered into without full and careful consideration in these Halls.

Something over a year ago, when this question came before a committee of the House of Representatives, as already quoted by the Senator from Wisconsin, a full, open, thorough investigation was had of the whole question. The Mississippi River commission was there represented. General Gillmore, Major Henry Mitchell, and James B. Eads were all before that committee and made their statements with reference to it. General Wright, of the Army, was also there and was examined, and scores of others who had most information upon this subject. After that full and patient and careful investigation the House acted upon the subject. General Wright, than whom there is no more learned, experienced, and skillful engineer in this country, gave it his unqualified sanction at that time, and he is now at the head of the engineers. Not only that, but in a former Book of Estimates there are $750,000 estimated for this work, which must have been done by the sanction of General Wright. I am informed also by a member of the House of Representatives that during the last winter General Gillmore, who stands as president of the Mississippi River commission, stated that he now gave it his unqualified support; so that he has learned about it since he signed the report quoted by the Senator from Wisconsin, and now it has his sanction too.

Some two years ago $75,000 was appropriated to begin the work. Last year $150,000 was appropriated, and that, too, after this careful investigation in which all of these interests were represented and when all the conflicting views were presented to the committee. I state here to the Senate to-day, as General Wright stated when the investigation was going on before the committee, that very few public works, if any, have been more carefully and thoroughly prepared. Yet, in view of all these expressions of the people interested, with over a thousand pages of surveys and reports of able engineers, running back for twelve years and over, with all of these facts before us, the Senator from Indiana tells us that it is hasty legislation, and that we must stop and go to surveying again. In the name of conscience, how many more surveys do you want made before you can commence this work?

Mr. HARRISON. Major Allen wants to do that.

Mr. WINDOM. Major Allen wants to continue his investigations as to rainfall, &c.; but during all these years careful measurements have been made. As my colleague has said, ever since Fort Snelling was established those observations have been going on. The flow of these rivers has been carefully measured, the lakes have been surveyed. I do not know what more is necessary before Congress can enter upon this work. In opposition to this what does the Senator from Indiana bring? He brings the report of the so-called Mississippi River commission, which starts out with this statement:

IMPROVEMENT BY MEANS OF RESERVOIRS.

This subject, though not embraced in the act organizing the commission, was referred to them during the past season, especial reference being had to the system of reservoirs proposed for the headwaters of the Upper Mississippi, Saint Croix, Chippewa, and Wisconsin Rivers. At that time the field operations for the present season had been already laid out, and as the sum allotted by Congress for the use of the commission was considerably less than either their original estimate or their supplemental estimate they did not feel justified in diverting any money from the more important Mississippi work to follow up this new subject of investigation. They had indeed been obliged to give up a projected scheme of observations on the lower river and to confine themselves to observations on the Upper Mississippi, because, although second in importance, they were less costly than those required on the main river. For these reasons the commission have mainly confined themselves to a careful revision of the data already collected by the Engineer Department, United States Army, which has from time to time been published in the annual reports of the Chief of Engineers, United States Army.

They go on to tell you that it was regretted that after the work was laid out they had not any money to make the investigation, but the Senator from Indiana explains how they made it. They appointed a sub-committee, and that sub-committee even did not do the work, but it appointed some gentleman, whose name I never heard of before, to act as a sub-committee of the sub-committee, in order to investigate this great work which had received the attention of all these engineers for a dozen years or more. I do not know that Mr. McMath, or whatever his name may be, is a very experienced engineer, but having given a good deal of attention to river improvements for the last ten or twelve years, I will say to the Senator from Indiana that until he mentioned his name it had never before fallen upon my ears. When the name of Mr. McMath, this distinguished engineer who is to overrule all that has been done for twelve years on this subject, was announced to the Senate every Senator looked up to inquire who in the world is McMath? We never heard of him. Possibly those living in his immediate neighborhood can testify that he has an existence; I do not know. It is upon this kind of an inquiry that all the investigations I have mentioned are to be overruled and the Senate is to discontinue the work which the House has provided for in this bill.

Mr. HARRISON. May I ask the Senator a question?

Mr. WINDOM. Certainly.

Mr. HARRISON. Did the Senator ever hear of Mr. Zimer?

Mr. WINDOM. I have heard of him just now.

Mr. HARRISON. Did the Senator ever hear of him before?

Mr. WINDOM. I do not know that I did.

Mr. HARRISON. Very well. He is one of the engineers on whose investigation Mr. Allen made his report.

Mr. WINDOM. That will not do. We have Mr. Allen's own report, and I believe no gentleman of his age stands higher in the engineer service than he does. The knowledge of the commission is eked out by a remarkable statement made here by the Senator in response to my colleague. He does not rely wholly upon this distinguished Mr. McMath, who was a sub-committee of a sub-committee appointed to investigate this subject, but as they passed up the Mississippi on a steamboat they took Mr. Allen on board and they rode probably fifteen or twenty miles, nobody knows how far, and they there talked with Mr. Allen about this great work, and they came to the conclusion that it needed more surveys and they would make an estimate; they would stop this great improvement long enough to make these surveys until further estimates for appropriations are submitted. I submit that the Senator thus far has shown that the Mississippi River commission acted only upon the investigation of this Mr. McMath and the conversation of Mr. Allen; and Mr. McMath, I believe, made some examination of the books of Mr. Allen at Saint Paul.

I shall not take the time of the Senate to read extracts from these voluminous reports. Commencing back as far as 1870, General Warren made a statement of what would be the result of this improvement. He said:

It would supply at Saint Paul the difference between a 2-foot and 3-foot navigable stage for three hundred and sixty-five days; the difference between a 2 and 4 foot stage for one hundred and fifty-six days; the difference between a 2 and 5 foot stage eighty-three days; the difference between a 3 and a 4 foot stage two hundred and sixty days; the difference between a 3 and 5 foot stage one hundred and five days; and the difference between a 4 and 5 foot stage for one hundred and seventy-nine days. It would do as much above the Falls of Saint Anthony.

These reports show that the average flow of water past the city of Saint Paul in low water is a little less than 6,000 cubic feet per second. I want the Senate to bear in mind, in order to appreciate the great value of this improvement, that the low water always commences about the middle of August and runs through August, September, and October, the very time when the great wheat crop of the Northwest is to be moved, and then the Mississippi River is rendered worthless by the insufficient supply of water. The careful surveys made of this subject and the estimates are collected in a few paragraphs which I shall read from Captain Allen's report. He says:

Collecting the various items of discharge, we find that we can control from the proposed reservoirs at the sources of the Mississippi sufficient water to insure a steady flow of at the least 12,200 cubic feet per second past Saint Paul for one hundred days, (see my report of December 12, 1879,) and from the Saint Croix for the same period, 6,000 cubic feet per second. The sum of these gives about 18,000 cubic feet per second for one hundred days.

At that point it will give three times the ordinary amount of water that we have in the low stages at the particular time when we need the river to move the crops of Minnesota, Dakota, and of the great Northwest.

A gauging of the Mississippi River, in the fall of 1878, taken several miles below the mouth of the Saint Croix, under the direction of Major Farquhar, Corps of Engineers, reduced to the low water of 1864, showed 16,100 cubic feet of water per second passing that point, or but little more than one-half of the quantity that can be assured for one hundred days, as above stated.

That is at another point.

Now, carrying our quantity forward to the mouth of the Chippewa, neglecting the area of watershed tributary to the river between the Saint Croix and the mouth of the Chippewa, we have at the latter point 4,860 cubic feet more per second for one hundred days, or in all 22,860 cubic feet per second for one hundred days. And passing the mouth of Beef Slough—

Which, by the way, I know is one of the most difficult points on the Upper Mississippi—

we have about 23,660 cubic feet per second for the same period; in round numbers, 24,000 cubic feet.

A gauging of the Mississippi River at Winona, about thirty miles below Beef Slough, under direction of Major Farquhar, in 1878, reduced to the low water of 1864, showed 11,190 cubic feet of water per second passing that point, or less than one-half of the quantity that can be assured from the combined operation of the proposed reservoirs at the sources of the Mississippi, Saint Croix, and Chippewa Rivers, added to the normal low-water flow of these three streams—24,000 cubic feet per second for a width as at Winona would afford not less than five feet in the channel.

A difference between the present low water of two feet and five feet makes all the difference between cheap transportation to the eastward for the 40,000,000 bushels of wheat raised in Minnesota and the 50,000,000 bushels which will soon be raised in Dakota. It makes all the difference between cheap and costly transportation. He goes on to discuss further the advantages of extending these improvements down the river.

The reports which lie before me are full of these estimates and calculations. It is true, as was said by the Senator from Wisconsin, they may not be absolutely accurate, but they have the indorsement of the Engineer Department, not only the formal indorsement of General Wright made in the regular Book of Estimates in reporting in favor of this work, but the indorsement of General Wright made in his testimony before the committee of the House of Representatives. In answer to all this we have the investigations of Mr. McMath, the sub-committee of another sub-committee of a commission, and we have the little interview which was had with Major Allen on the Mississippi River.

I do not believe that upon such evidence as that the Senate is going to strike out a proposition which the House has so carefully considered, and which it has after a thorough investigation before its committee placed in this bill, which it has for the third time acted upon by sending to us this proposition, and thereby denying the great benefits which would flow from these improvements.

I should like to speak longer on this question, but I think I ought not to weary the Senate. I will mention one or two other points very briefly. I could speak about the great value of trade on several of these tributaries. For instance, on the Chippewa River the commercial transactions year before last were $6,712,087.31; on the Saint Croix River, which is another one to be benefited, there were twenty-nine steamers running. My colleague has mentioned the fact that it is not only the Mississippi below Saint Paul, but there is a reach of three hundred and fifty miles above Saint Paul, which, according to these reports, would be navigable with but a slight additional improvement, and those three hundred and fifty miles reach into the very heart of the great wheat-growing region of the Northwest.

Mr. HARRISON. Will the Senator allow me to ask him a question in reference to that?

Mr. WINDOM. Certainly.

Mr. HARRISON. Has the Senator considered what the effect on the upper waters of the Mississippi above the Falls of Saint Anthony would be in other seasons of the year by impounding this large volume of water?

Mr. WINDOM. I have considered what the engineers report after a careful investigation of that subject. They state that this improvement would make those three hundred and fifty miles of river navigable and would give, they say, four feet in addition to that extent of river.

The commission has shown its animus on this question, I think, by the estimate of costs that it makes. I do not think they are very different from other people and I think the Senator from Wisconsin has given us a clew to their report on this subject. He says that they are always agreed on one thing if nothing else, and that is that they shall retain all power with reference to the improvement of the Mississippi River. Congress had the temerity to place this improvement of the reservoir system in the hands of other people. It was placed under the control of the War Department and the work was going on, and hence it was necessary to check it up. Now, I want to see what they make the estimate of damages. They say:

> We estimate the land damages at $1,000,000 to $2,000,000.

Let me tell you what a careful investigation upon the ground shows the land damages of Minnesota to be. Major Allen says in regard to these damages, which they estimate at $1,000,000 to $2,000,000:

> The damage to property would consist, so far as can be ascertained, in the overflow of hay-meadows, of small value, and the overflow of fields of wild rice upon which the Indians depend; but these latter would, as the adjoining lands come under the influence of the prolonged rise of water, be simply transferred. From the best information attainable at present I do not think that more than 2,500 acres of entered land would be overflowed, though this estimate is held subject to revision. The land at present is of little value.

So far as the swamp lands and overflowed lands are concerned they are already given to the States, and the States of Minnesota and Wisconsin have passed over their rights to those lands to the Government, and I am informed that private owners have already largely released what little claims they may have. Yet in the face of a report made by gentlemen in charge to the War Department of that investigation that it would be but of slight importance, the Mississippi River commission says it would be from $1,000,000 to $2,000,000, and the Senator from Indiana proposes to put up a $4,000,000 expenditure by calling this slight damage to real estate $2,000,000.

Mr. President, I shall not take further time in discussing this subject.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, I have no such interest in this debate as to make it a partisan discussion. I am sorry the Senator from Minnesota, who has just taken his seat, has such an interest.

Mr. WINDOM. Will the Senator yield to me for a moment?

Mr. HARRISON. Certainly.

Mr. WINDOM. My friend was a member of the famous Mississippi River commission, and signed the report. I think he has as much interest in defending it as I have in urging the appropriation.

Mr. HARRISON. The Senator has placed this debate, however, just where I would want it to be placed if I had a partisan interest in defeating the appropriation. He has given Senators to understand that the appropriation cannot be carried unless he can discredit and break down the Mississippi River commission. Both the Senators from Minnesota have recognized that fact, as well as the Senator from Wisconsin; and the bulk of their time has been occupied in an assault upon that commission. May I be permitted to suggest to the chairman of the Committee on Commerce, who has just reported to us a bill placing at the absolute disposal of that commission $5,000,000 of the public revenue to be expended according to their own plans and judgments, that he does not occupy a favorable position to assault those gentlemen and engineers?

Mr. McMILLAN. If the Senator from Indiana will permit me, I will say that the report of the Mississippi River commission was made at a time when they were endeavoring to obtain a large appropriation and an appropriation for the reservoirs of the Mississippi River, and in this preliminary report the principal engineer of their number, Mr. Eads, does not coincide.

Mr. HARRISON. That is only another illustration of what I have said. The Senator from Minnesota imputes now mean and corrupt motives to the members of the Mississippi River commission. He says whereas they were public officers charged with the work of improvement on this entire river, they were so partial and sectional in their views that they were willing, contrary to good faith, to discredit a man who should have been credited, with a view of getting a large appropriation for another part of the river.

I am not here as the special champion of the Mississippi River commission; but I ask Senators whether an appropriation that, according to the confession of these arguments, has to be carried by discrediting not only the professional but the personal character of the men who make the reports is not under stress for arguments to enforce it? I think the Mississippi River commission as originally constituted was a very good body of men with one exception. I never could quite understand why President Hayes designated me to a place upon it; but I never assumed certainly to be an authority upon any of the engineering questions which came before that commission for discussion.

My purpose was simply to lay before the Senate the reports of this commission in a perfectly frank and impartial way and without any passionate discussion whatever. I do not see that we can well consent to pass this appropriation upon the argument that the Mississippi River commission is not entitled to credit. We are to abolish it, and yet we are to go in this bill for the immense appropriation that is being made for the Mississippi River commission. If the Senators from Minnesota are right in their estimates of these gentlemen, we ought to at once recall that appropriation until a commission can be organized with gentlemen of sufficient skill in their profession that we can trust to their professional judgments when they bring them here to us, and that we can at least save their personal characters from the imputations that to get a large appropriation for one part of the river they are discrediting an improvement on another.

The Mississippi River commission did not grasp at this subject. It was not until Congress laid it upon them as a public official duty to investigate the reservoir system and to report their views to Congress that they meddled with it at all. Here the very Congress of the United States that constituted the commission and said to them, "We want your opinion upon the subject of constructing these reservoirs," is now asked in the face of that opinion to make an appropriation which the commission has reported against.

My friend from Minnesota [Mr. WINDOM] undertook utterly to wipe out all the work that had been done by a civil engineer by the name of McMath, simply by informing the Senate that he did not have the honor of an acquaintance with the Senator from Minnesota. That is exactly true. I dare say there is not a Senator on this floor who knows Mr. McMath. While the scope of the acquaintance of Senators does embrace a very large amount of respectability in life and a very large amount of scientific acquirement, I do not think it utterly discredits a man to say that he is not known by a United States Senator either as an individual or as an engineer. That was the purpose of the question when I asked him whether he knew Mr. Zimer. Mr. Zimer was an engineer employed by Major Allen, upon whom the Senator lays so much stress, precisely as Mr. McMath was employed by the Mississippi River commission. There is no gentleman on this floor who does not know that when the Army engineers are sent in charge of public works they do not do the work of surveying themselves, but that they employ skilled civil engineers who do the work and make their reports to them, and that the reports of the officers are very largely based upon the reports of the civil engineers thus made to them. You can take the reports of Major Allen, and if you will read them you will find not one but five or six such reports from subordinates who made the very surveys for Major Allen upon which the Senators rely.

Mr. WINDOM. He is on the ground himself.

Mr. HARRISON. I will venture to say that Major Allen has spent the smallest possible fraction of time on the site of any one of these reservoirs.

Mr. McMILLAN. The Senator from Indiana will permit me to call his attention to the fact that Mr. McMath never made any survey in that locality.

Mr. HARRISON. I agree that Mr. McMath never made a survey, but Mr. McMath was a civil engineer who took these thousand pages of reports that the Senator says are so conclusive, and went over them, verifying the calculations, seeing where there were errors in them, and made a report of his opinion as an engineer, based upon all that information which the Senator says is so conclusive to us.

Mr. McMILLAN. That is the opinion of the Mississippi River commission.

Mr. HARRISON. Thus it is that such engineers as Quincy A. Gillmore, General Comstock, Major Suter, Mr. Harrod, and Mr. Mitchell, of the United States Coast Survey, are all to be whistled down the wind.

Mr. McMILLAN. Made upon such data, if the Senator will allow me.

Mr. HARRISON. Made upon such data! They had before them all the data the Senator from Minnesota has. Every calculation, the report of every survey, from General Warren to Major Allen's last report, was before them. Does the Senator tell me that the opinion of such a board, having all these facts upon which the conclusions of Major Allen were based, is entitled to no credit because they did not stand on the ground where the reservoir was built to look over the prairie? Suppose they had stood there, what would anybody know? What does the engineer know who runs a level until he goes to his office and works up a diagram of the basin in which the water is to be impounded? What does he know until he has prepared the gaugings of the channel? Nothing whatever.

I say it is not a strong appeal to the intelligence of the Senate when it is argued that because the Mississippi River commission did not go and stand on the site where these dams are to be located therefore they know nothing about them. The Senator from Minnesota [Mr. WINDOM] has not a larger, heartier, truer interest than I have in moving the wheat from those great fields in his State and in Dakota cheaply to market, but we are here administering the public revenue. The exact condition of this thing is this: the engineers of the United States, not alone the Mississippi River commission, but Captain Mackenzie, who is in charge of the improvement on the river, reported to Congress that the works being constructed in the channel of the river will give you six feet of navigation to Saint Paul. They have said to us that as to this project for auxiliary aid by reservoirs there are not sufficient data to justify Congress in entering upon the construction of the work. The Senator from Minnesota who spoke first [Mr. McMILLAN] said Captain Eads reached the conclusion that he did not have sufficient information to form an opinion, and that is to be an authority in favor of reservoirs.

Mr. President, I am not going to occupy the time of the Senate one minute longer. I intended to endeavor to go through with this discussion without any heat in the world, but simply that the Senate might settle the question, and I expected it would be settled against me, because this river and harbor bill is bound together by such intricate and invisible ties that it is scarcely possible that any proposition not reported formally will succeed here. I intended simply to let the Senate know that the proposition in the bill was one which had been reported against by the Mississippi River commission, composed of such engineers as I have named.

Mr. WINDOM. The Senator refers to heat in this discussion. I was a little earnest in my remarks, but manifested no heat whatever.

Mr. HARRISON. I understood that; I spoke of myself.

Mr. WINDOM. The Senator from Indiana has undertaken now to carry his amendment by asserting that its rejection would be a defeat of the report of the Mississippi River commission. I have put it upon no such ground. I have simply said and intended to show what the Mississippi River commission knew about it, and what they had learned by conferring with other people. I have no doubt of the great skill and good judgment of those gentlemen when they have given a thing proper attention, and I certainly did not undertake to discredit them in any other way than in this matter to show that they had not the money or the time to attend to it, and that they did not understand it as well as the engineers who reported upon it.

Mr. ALLISON. I ask unanimous consent to apply the five-minute rule to this proposition.

Mr. FRYE and others. To the bill.

Mr. ALLISON. I will say the bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. FARLEY in the chair.) The Chair hears no objection.

Mr. SHERMAN. Let it be announced from the Chair, so that everybody will understand it.

Mr. ALLISON. I ask unanimous consent to apply the five-minute rule of debate to this bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The request has been made that the five-minute rule shall be enforced in the further discussion upon this bill. Is there objection?

Mr. ANTHONY. That involves the right of each Senator to speak but once, I understand.

Mr. ALLISON. Whatever the rule is.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair hears no objection, and it is so ordered.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, I shall vote for the amendment of the Senator from Indiana, and if it is agreed to I shall vote against the proposition as amended. I am always willing to vote the public money for any improvement that promises any legitimate practical benefit to the country, but of all the propositions I have ever known presented to Congress this in my judgment is the most visionary. It is a great deal worse than the Hennepin Canal. I do not care what those engineers have said. After all, they differ as doctors usually do; but men of practical sense have opinions which are sometimes as valuable as those of the most learned men of science. The idea of telling me that dams built at the head of the mighty Mississippi can impound and hold water enough to keep its navigation open through the dry season of the year is ridiculous in the extreme. Three hundred thousand dollars is asked for this novel proposition, for this is but an entering-wedge. If the dams are of any considerable size they must submerge hundreds of thousands of acres of valuable land. A gentleman familiar with that country has told me that it would not only submerge a vast amount of public land, but would require the submergence of houses and of cultivated farms and even of small villages. Sir, it would take millions of dollars.

Mr. WINDOM. There are no villages in that country anywhere near there.

Mr. WILLIAMS. If there are no villages or cultivated lands, there is no necessity for it.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. There is no cultivated farm within a hundred miles.

Mr. WILLIAMS. There is no necessity, then, for the improvement, and that is the end of it. I can see nothing to be accomplished by this proposition except that it may afford facilities for getting out big saw-logs when there is not a tide in the river, or it may furnish in the dry season of the year water for grist-mills on the river; but the idea of furnishing water to render the great Mississippi navigable, to raise it below the Falls of Saint Anthony to six feet in dry seasons of the year, is ridiculous in the extreme. The river below the falls is a mile and a half wide, and in dry seasons there are not more than eighteen inches of water in it in places; yet it is proposed to raise it to six feet. My friend from Minnesota said there flowed past Saint Paul 6,000 cubic feet in a second at low water. Below the falls, between there and Keokuk, it is a mile and a half wide, and it would require on a calculation 47,520 cubic feet per second. The idea of building a few important dams away up the headwaters of the Mississippi, trusting to those to furnish water in the dry season of the year to carry on the commerce of that mighty river, is the most ridiculous proposition I ever heard in my life. The Senators ought to be ashamed of it.

I am willing to spend the public money for anything that gives a reasonable prospect of benefiting the country, but I cannot consent to vote for a proposition like this. I have known mills and factories to be supplied with water by building dams across streams and accumulating a head of water there; I have known small canals where the water runs slowly to be supplied by headwaters of that sort; but where in the world is there a great river which is supplied in this manner? The Mississippi River if made navigable through the dry seasons up there would exhaust the whole of Lake Superior. You would have to submerge the whole State of Minnesota to make ponds big enough to supply the navigation of that river during the summer season. I think the whole proposition is ridiculous, and I am against it. I shall vote for the amendment of the Senator from Indiana.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Indiana.

Mr. HARRISON. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. SAULSBURY. Mr. President, I did not intend to say anything on the subject, but as we have to go on the record, and I have to vote on this question, I desire to say that while I know nothing about the feasibility of creating reservoirs that would be of any practical use in supplying a deficiency in the water of the Mississippi River, I do not believe that any such thing is practicable with the amount of money that has been named by the engineers or that is appropriated in the bill.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. Will the Senator allow me to state what has been accomplished in this direction by the lumbermen on the Wisconsin Rivers?

Mr. SAULSBURY. I only wanted to occupy a minute.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. I ask the Senator to let me state that the Wolf River is a stream in the northeastern part of the State, one hundred and fifty or two hundred miles in length. The lumbermen found it very difficult to float their logs down to Lake Winnebago, where they were manufacturing; so they constructed a system of dams upon the river by which they can raise that river two feet one hundred and fifty miles below the dam and maintain it at that stage for thirty days. My colleague [Mr. SAWYER] has lumbered for more than a quarter of a century upon that stream, and he tells me that that is a fact. The town in which I reside is situated at the mouth of Black River, a lumbering stream. The lumbermen there have resorted to the same system for the purpose of getting out their logs. They have resorted to this system upon every lumbering stream in the State, and they have succeeded in maintaining a good stage of water for a sufficient time to get out their logs, which usually occupies from twenty to thirty days.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I have no doubt it is possible for lumbermen to improve the water in the streams upon which it is necessary to float their lumber so that they may be benefited to a certain extent; but this is a proposition to dam up the headwaters of several of the streams or tributaries of the Mississippi River, the Saint Croix and several other streams, and to create a body of water that will at Saint Paul pass some 24,000 cubic feet of water in a second and will raise the navigation of the water of that stream so that it will be from one foot or two feet to six or seven feet. That is the proposition. Now, what must be done to do that? You must construct dams that will hold this vast accumulation of water; that is necessary; and do you tell me that for a few hundred thousand dollars you can dam up the headwaters of the Saint Croix and of the several other streams? Seven of these reservoirs are proposed to be created, and do you say that with a few hundred thousand dollars you can dam up those waters in such quantities that in dry seasons of the year for a hundred days you could pass down the Mississippi River a volume of water equal to six or seven feet?

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. That is the estimate.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I know nothing about engineering; I know nothing about estimates, but we all have a little practical sense. I live in a flat country where they sometimes create dams for the purpose of raising water for grist and saw mills, and yet a thunder-gust sometimes passing over that level country for two or three hours, where drainage is necessarily sluggish and still, will sweep away the dams, and away goes all the work upon which money has been expended. So when you undertake to dam up the Saint Croix River with an ordinary dam the first flood that comes down from the mountains will sweep your dams, and away will go all the water that is held in the reservoir.

In order to do this work successfully, you have got to expend, not only hundreds of thousands of dollars, but, in my judgment, without consulting the engineers, it will take millions upon millions of dollars to accomplish what is proposed in this enterprise. It may be a necessary appropriation for the commerce of that section of the country, but you are wasting money when you appropriate $300,000 for any such purpose. You had as well, if it is to be made a success, appropriate $300,000,000 at once to accomplish the purpose which you propose.

I am called upon to vote on this proposition or I should not have said a word about it, but I want to state this as my reason why I believe it is an idle expenditure of money; yet we are told by the Senator from Indiana it is contrary to the judgment of the Mississippi River commission. I do not place a great deal of reliance upon the engineers. They are scientific men, and in the practice of my profession I have always found that the very worst witnesses on earth are scientific men and experts. Their testimony is the most unreliable and the least to be depended upon of any witnesses I have ever known. So I believe in reference to the engineers connected with the Mississippi River and with all these enterprises. They very frequently make propositions that contradict common sense.

I am not disposed, therefore, to place my vote entirely upon the testimony of these experts in matters of that kind. I shall vote for the amendment of the Senator from Indiana simply because it is a reduction of the amount, but then I shall vote, as the Senator from Kentucky states, against the general proposition afterward.

Mr. WINDOM. I would have great faith in the judgment of the Senator from Delaware if he were speaking upon a subject of which he knew anything, but he admits in the outset that he does not know anything on this subject, and thereupon proceeds to express a very profound judgment about it. The Senator from Kentucky was a little wilder than the Senator from Delaware. He located towns and villages in the swamps of the great lake at the headwaters of the great Mississippi River, and then went to work to describe the possible cost of a work which would require them to be submerged. The Senator from Delaware says that it is naturally impossible to dam up this amount of water, and yet I will guarantee that he has not the slightest idea of the nature of the country where it is proposed that the reservoirs shall be made. I desire to assure him in this connection that it is almost a natural reservoir, and I quote from the language of the engineer who surveyed it:

> The lakes at the source of the Mississippi furnish a compact reservoir system, almost as if laid out by an engineer.

I want to say that the various lakes at the headwaters of the Mississippi are at least a dozen times as large as the great State which the Senator from Delaware so honorably represents on this floor, and that in raising many of these dams to two feet you add the great quantity of water to the stream which the engineers report; and yet the Senator has gone to work to advise the Senate that it is proposed to build a great dam somewhere, in a great gorge of the mountains, I suppose, to dam up some river and let it loose. Here is a vast lake region larger than many of our respectable-sized States, and a dozen times larger than Delaware.

Mr. SAULSBURY. It may be true that I have indulged in very wild speculations in reference to this enterprise, but my association with the Senator from Minnesota naturally leads to a wild course of thought. I remember that ever since I have been in the Senate he has been advocating some of the wildest schemes in getting money out of the public Treasury for some of the most impracticable works of any Senator I have known, among the rest $200,000 I remember to build up Saint Anthony's Falls to improve and benefit navigation.

I assume to know something of the force of water. I have been at the Delaware Water Gap, where the upper edges of the Delaware River were dammed up and flooded a whole section of country, and yet the accumulation of water there forced itself through the mountain-range and the foot-hills of the mountains and made its way to the ocean. I have stood around the Cascades that have blocked up the headwaters of the Columbia River, and yet that great volume of water forced itself through the Cascade Mountains. So, when you dam up the Saint Croix River and dam up other rivers, the great accumulations of water which you must make will ultimately seek an outlet, and the dams will cost millions upon millions if you make them effective.

The application of a little common sense to propositions of this kind is worth, in my judgment, as much as the estimates of the engineers, who upon scientific principles lay out the plans, but when we are called upon to vote money we ought to vote it according to our judgment. I shall vote upon this proposition according to the dictates of my own judgment, and not according to the wishes of the Senator from Minnesota.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Indiana, [Mr. HARRISON.]

Mr. HARRIS. Let the amendment be reported.

The ACTING SECRETARY. It is proposed to strike out all after the word "river," in line 800, down to and including line 852, and to insert:

> Continuing observations and surveys for reservoirs at the headwaters of the Mississippi River and its upper tributaries, under the direction of the Secretary of War, $50,000.

Mr. HARRIS. Does that strike out the whole appropriation for the Mississippi River?

Mr. McMILLAN. No; for the reservoirs.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The yeas and nays have been ordered upon the amendment, and the Secretary will call the roll.

The Principal Legislative Clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. SEWELL, (when his name was called.) I desire to announce my pair with my colleague, [Mr. McPHERSON.]

The roll-call having been concluded, the result was announced—yeas 24, nays 32; as follows:

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. BECK. After line 1531 I move to insert:

> That the Secretary of War shall cause to be made a survey and estimate of the cost of excavating a channel through the Grand and Little Chains in the Ohio River sufficient to pass boats and give a depth of six feet at low water.

This merely provides for a survey. I submitted it to the chairman of the committee the other day. It is a rocky chain between Cairo, Illinois, and Paducah, Kentucky, about which no survey has ever been made except to build a dam to throw the water over it, which has proved to be a failure. We desire to ascertain what the cost of excavating a channel into the rocky basin will be. It gets down sometimes to twenty inches, and of course obstructs the navigation of the Ohio River, which passes through so many States. The only object is to ascertain the fact. It will cost no more, I believe, than is necessary to make the survey. It is an important matter to the Ohio River.

Mr. CONGER. I did not understand the point on the river, or what the proposition is.

Mr. BECK. There is what is called the Grand Chain and the Little Chain, two rocky points that run through just about fifteen miles above Cairo and below Paducah, Kentucky, near the mouth of the river. The amendment is to ascertain what it will cost to deepen the channel there.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Kentucky.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SAUNDERS. At the end of line 916 I move to insert:

Of which sum the following amounts shall be expended at the points named, the same being the sums required by estimates of the Chief Engineer of the War Department for said work: at Brownville, Nebraska, the sum of $80,000; at Nebraska City and Eastport, $100,000; at Plattsmouth, $70,000; at Omaha and Council Bluffs, $100,000; and at Sioux City and Covington, $100,000.

Mr. McMILLAN. That amendment was not referred to the committee. I raise the point of order that it is not in order.

Mr. SAUNDERS. I beg the Senator's pardon; it was referred to the committee, and I drew the attention of the committee to the fact that it was there.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Nebraska will allow the Chair to state that a point of order has been raised by the chairman of the Committee on Commerce that the amendment is not in order, it not having been presented before the committee.

Mr. SAUNDERS. What I am saying is that the Senator is mistaken. He may have paid no attention to it, but it was there. I introduced the bill myself, which was referred to that committee two or three weeks ago. I have the bill here. There is no kind of doubt about the fact that I have done all I can do in the matter to get it before the committee.

Mr. McMILLAN. If the Senator has the amendment, I should like to see it.

Mr. SAUNDERS. If the Senator will allow me a moment—beginning at line 915, the bill reads:

Improving Missouri River, from its mouth to Sioux City, Iowa, $900,000.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is the Senator from Nebraska reading the amendment as requested by the Senator from Minnesota?

Mr. SAUNDERS. I was going to say that after that clause is where my amendment comes in. The amendment was referred to the committee in the form of a bill. This is taken out of the bill.

Mr. HARRIS. I ask the Senator from Nebraska if the amendment was presented in the Senate and referred to the Committee on Commerce?

Mr. SAUNDERS. Certainly; I said I presented it to the Senate.

Mr. HARRIS. I did not hear the Senator, and I desired to know whether that fact was true. When was it introduced in the Senate and referred?

Mr. SAUNDERS. I can tell the Senator.

Mr. McMILLAN. I should like to have the original amendment read which the Senator says was referred to the committee.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair is informed that there is a printed bill, but it was not referred as an amendment.

Mr. ALLISON. I wish to suggest in reference to the point of order that it is generally in order to amend the bill so as to dispose of the appropriation. This in no sense increases the amount of the appropriation, as I understand it. It simply provides that of this sum a certain amount shall be put at these points. Will the Senator read the bill and see?

Mr. SAUNDERS. It is a bill making appropriation for the improvement of the navigation of the Missouri River opposite the State of Nebraska and the State of Iowa.

Mr. McMILLAN. That is not an amendment to the river and harbor bill.

Mr. SAUNDERS. It was introduced and referred to the Committee on Commerce for the purpose of meeting this case.

Mr. COCKRELL. It was an independent bill, not an amendment to the river and harbor bill.

Mr. SAUNDERS. It was an independent bill, but was referred to the committee for the same purpose exactly, and I spoke to some of the members of the committee on the subject.

Mr. HARRIS. I desire to ask the Senator from Nebraska again if it was offered as an amendment to the river and harbor bill in the Senate and referred to the Committee on Commerce?

Mr. SAUNDERS. It was submitted before the river and harbor bill came over, and was referred to the committee for this same purpose.

Mr. HARRIS. But it was never offered in the Senate as an amendment to this bill?

Mr. SAUNDERS. Not strictly to this bill. But it does not increase the appropriation in any way; it only disposes of the appropriation proposed by the Committee on Commerce. The committee have appropriated a certain amount of money for the Missouri River from Sioux City to its mouth. This is a part of that river, and there is a necessity for this work being performed. I propose simply that the reports made by the Secretary of War or the engineers under him on this subject shall be carried out at the points named. They are in the reports made by the Secretary of War.

Mr. FERRY. I wish to ask the Senator from Nebraska whether the amendment which he presents proposes to increase the amount in the bill?

Mr. SAUNDERS. It does not.

Mr. FERRY. As I understand it, it is simply distributing an appropriation reported by the committee. If that be the case, it is strictly in order.

Mr. SAUNDERS. That is it. That is all I propose to do.

Mr. McMILLAN. I have already raised the point of order that no amendment to the bill of that character was referred to the committee. That fact I think is established. Whether the position of the Senator from Michigan is correct in regard to the parliamentary point is another question. The amendment does make a specific appropriation to particular places on the Missouri River, and it is not in pursuance of any recommendation or in pursuance of estimates by the Department. The appropriation is made in pursuance of a recommendation by the Mississippi River commission, and it is appropriated in the manner they recommend, and there is no recommendation by any Department for the appropriation in the mode proposed by the Senator from Nebraska.

Mr. SAUNDERS. I beg the Senator's pardon. If he wants to see the recommendation of the War Department, it is here at hand. I will read it.

Mr. McMILLAN. I have raised a point of order.

Mr. COCKRELL. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will have to rule that a point of order having been raised debate is out of order.

Mr. COCKRELL. I rise to a point of order. I ask the Chief Clerk to read part of Rule 28. I will read it and call the attention of the Chair to it.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. Is not that in the nature of debate?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair holds that debate is out of order when a point of order is raised.

Mr. COCKRELL. I will read the part of the rule I desire to have read instead of asking the Chief Clerk to read it. I read from Rule 28:

In like manner, amendments proposing new items of appropriation to river and harbor bills shall, before being offered, be referred to the Committee on Commerce.

This is a new item entirely.

Mr. SAUNDERS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will state again that debate is not in order when a point of order is raised.

Mr. SAUNDERS. I wish to ask the Chair a question. I wish to know whether it would not be in order to distribute this appropriation over the ground proposed by the committee?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Nebraska must come to order. The question now before the Senate is the point of order raised by the Senator from Minnesota that the amendment is out of order, not having been proposed heretofore and submitted to the Committee on Commerce. The Chair holds that under the twenty-ninth rule it would be proper to submit that question to the Senate. The Chair has no doubt that under a proper construction of the rule the amendment is out of order under the twenty-eighth and twenty-ninth rules.

Mr. JONES, of Florida. What is the fact?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The fact is that no such amendment was offered in the Senate and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. JONES, of Florida. I understand the Senator from Nebraska to state——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will state to the Senator from Florida that the Senator from Nebraska introduced a bill on this subject, a separate measure, which was referred to the Committee on Commerce before the river and harbor bill was considered by that committee.

Mr. FERRY. If the Chair will allow me to say——

Mr. McMILLAN. I rise to a point of order that it is not debatable.

Mr. FERRY. The Chair has submitted the point of order to the Senate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair decides that so far as the rule of the Senate is concerned the point of order is well taken.

Mr. FERRY. Did I not understand the Chair to say that he submitted it to the Senate, but that if he were to rule on it he would rule the amendment to be out of order? If not, I misunderstood the Chair.

Mr. INGALLS. The Senator can appeal.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair understands that under Rule 40 he may submit any question of order to the Senate. Under Rules 28 and 29 the Chair has no doubt as to the point of order being well taken.

Mr. HOAR. Does the Chair submit it to the Senate?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair desides the point of order to be well taken.

Mr. SAUNDERS. I have no disposition to raise any question on the decision of the Chair, although I did in this matter what I understood from some of the committee was my duty in regard to it in order to bring it before the Senate.

Mr. HOAR. I will submit an appeal if no one else does.

Mr. SAUNDERS. I ask the chairman of the committee to allow me to offer the amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Nebraska must allow the Chair to state the question. Does the Senator from Massachusetts appeal from the decision of the Chair?

Mr. SAUNDERS. What is the position taken by the Senator from Massachusests?

Mr. HOAR. That I shall appeal.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair has ruled that under Rules 28 and 29 the amendment is out of order, it not having been offered in the Senate and referred to the Committee on Commerce; from which decision the Senator from Massachusetts appeals.

Mr. HOAR. It is not all amendments to appropriation bills that the rule excludes; it is only amendments which increase an appropriation already contained in the bill or add new items of appropriations. This does neither; it simply provides that an appropriation already in the bill for a river, its entire length or the length of a certain described portion, shall be expended at particular points. It is just as if it was proposed to amend a bill providing for the erection of a new court-house by saying that within the particular year the amount appropriated should all be expended on the foundation or should all be expended on a certain wing or one part on the foundation and another part on the wing, and not all on the whole. It is a destruction of the right of the entire Senate to hold that when the Appropriations Committee or the Committee on Commerce, which is an appropriations committee for this purpose, bring in an appropriation for a specific work you cannot regulate the details by which that appropriation should be applied to that specific work. It puts not only the items which the bill shall contain but all the regulations of the items which they put into the bill out of the power of the Senate. I hope the Chair will submit the question to the Senate.

Mr. McMILLAN. It seems to me that the principle involved in the rule certainly must determine the point of order as the Chair has determined it. The appropriations for particular improvements along a particular river are as distinct as any other different subjects-matter can be. The engineers make examinations——

Mr. HOAR. Before the Senator proceeds he will allow me to see whether we differ about the fact. Is this an appropriation for a particular improvement? The appropriation bill as reported by the Committee on Commerce says that for improving the Mississippi River for a hundred miles, say, of its length, which is described, so many dollars. A Senator comes in and moves an amendment that within that hundred miles so much of this appropriation shall be at two points, which are included. In other words, as the committee have reported the bill, the engineers could expend it exactly as the Senator from Nebraska proposes without any change in the law.

Mr. McMILLAN. That is not from the estimates. The appropriation is made in pursuance of a recommendation of the Mississippi River commission for improving the Missouri River from its mouth to Sioux City the sum of $900,000. The Senator from Nebraska by his proposed amendment says that a portion of this amount shall be appropriated to several particular improvements within those limits.

Mr. SAUNDERS. What objection does the Senator make?

Mr. McMILLAN. If the Senator will permit me, I am arguing the point of order. The Senator proposes to make separate appropriations of specific sums to distinct improvements, recognized as distinct by the War Department, by the engineers, and diverting and changing entirely the character of the appropriations, because the whole gist and object of the report of the Mississippi River commissioners is to make a unit of that improvement, to make it indivisible for the purpose of making it a perfect improvement, so that it shall not be cut up into different portions and separate objects receive a portion of the money. This is making separate appropriations to distinct improvements, and it is against the recommendation of the engineers and against the character and nature of the appropriation in the bill. It is against the recommendation of the engineers.

Mr. VAN WYCK. Will the Senator allow me a word right there?

Mr. McMILLAN. Certainly.

Mr. VAN WYCK. When my colleague stated that the sums suggested in his amendment had been recommended or approved by the Engineer Bureau, did I understand the Senator from Minnesota to say that the sums suggested in that amendment were recommended by the Mississippi River commission?

Mr. McMILLAN. I did not say anything about that.

Mr. VAN WYCK. My colleague stated that the recommendations were made by the engineers or the War Department, and I understood the Senator to reply that they were made by the engineers on the Mississippi River commission.

Mr. McMILLAN. No, the Mississippi River commission made the recommendation for the appropriation in the bill; they made it as a unit, and they expressly discouraged the idea of seperating it, because they say if this amount can be expended on the river by them, under their direction, from the mouth to Sioux City they can make a permanent and beneficial improvement of the river. Now, the amendment of the Senator from Nebraska interferes wholly with the recommendation of that commission; it separates it; it divides it into distinct portions, and it makes a specific appropriation of a particular sum to a particular portion of that improvement, which is not divided by this commission into separate parts.

Mr. FERRY. If this amendment is out of order, it is because Rules 27 and 28 exclude it. Now, if the Chair will allow me, I will read those rules and see whether they do exclude this amendment. I propounded the question to the Senator from Nebraska whether his amendment proposed an increase of the appropriation already in the bill or whether it was a new item of appropriation. If the Chair will observe, Rule 27 says:

> All general appropriation bills shall be referred to the Committee on Appropriations, except bills making appropriations for rivers and harbors, which shall be referred to the Committee on Commerce—> and no amendments shall be received to any general appropriation bill the effect of which will be to increase an appropriation already contained in the bill, or to add a new item of appropriation, unless it be made to carry out the provisions of some existing law, &c.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. This adds a new item.

Mr. FERRY. Now, I will read the other rule. This is not a new item of appropriation, nor does it increase an appropriation already in the bill. Rule 28 reads:

> All amendments to general appropriation bills moved by direction of a standing or select committee of the Senate, proposing to increase an appropriation already contained in the bill, or to add new items of appropriation, shall, at least one day before they are offered, be referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and when actually proposed to the bill, no amendment proposing to increase the amount stated in such amendment shall be received; in like manner, amendments proposing new items of appropriation to river and harbor bills shall, before being offered, be referred to the Committee on Commerce.

It turns simply on this: is the amendment of the Senator from Nebraska a new item of appropriation, or does it increase an appropriation already in the bill? The amendment, in my judgment, is simply a distribution of the appropriation already recommended by the committee and contained in the bill. I do not speak upon the merits of the amendment; that is not my point. I am simply guarding and protecting the rules of the Senate, and believing the amendment proposed by the Senator from Nebraska to be strictly in order, I shall so vote.

Mr. JONES, of Florida. Mr. President, the importance of the question before the Senate extends a little further than the pending amendment. I do not consider that Rules 27 and 28 include the same subjects-matter. I think they were intended to embrace two distinct things; and the first question to consider is whether this amendment falls under Rule 27 or under Rule 28. It is very obvious from the reading of these rules that they were intended to embrace two distinct classes of cases. Let us see. Rule 27 reads:

> All general appropriation bills shall be referred to the Committee on Appropriations, except bills making appropriations for rivers and harbors, which shall be referred to the Committee on Commerce; and no amendments shall be received to any general appropriation bill, the effect of which will be to increase an appropriation already contained in the bill, or to add a new item of appropriation, unless—> unless it be made to carry out the provisions of some existing law, or treaty stipulation, or act, or resolution previously passed by the Senate during that session, or unless the same be moved by direction of a standing or select committee of the Senate; or proposed in pursuance of an estimate of the head of some one of the Departments.

That is all that is necessary to sustain an amendment proposed here to increase an appropriation or to add a new item to the bill, that it shall be made in pursuance of an estimate already made by the head of one of the Departments.

Rule 28 does not touch this class of cases, but it refers to amendments moved by order of committees, and this I do not understand to fall within that case.

Mr. ALLISON. Mr. President, the particular amendment suggested by the Senator from Nebraska has the advantage suggested by the Senator from Florida, namely, that it is estimated for, because each of these items, as I understand, is found in the regular Book of Estimates in the report of the board of engineers. But I want to suggest another thing with regard to this amendment. It certainly cannot be because the Committee on Commerce have made an appropriation here in particular language, that we are bound to sustain that language and no other. This item of appropriation is:

> Improving Missouri River from its mouth to Sioux City, Iowa, $900,000.

That comprehends the river from its mouth to Sioux City. The Senator from Nebraska proposes that a portion of this sum shall be expended at particular places on this river, thus defining more clearly the appropriation itself, instead of leaving that whole question to the engineers.

By way of illustrating what I mean, I find right at the top of this page 38, an appropriation of $5,500, "of which sum $500 for annual expense of gauging the waters of the Columbia River from Astoria to the bar."

If the ruling of the Chair be correct it would be out of order for any Senator to propose to strike out that last proviso, because the Committee on Commerce has said this money shall be expended in a particular way. Cannot the Senate change that way, change the method within the reasonable provisions of the paragraph itself? It seems to me nothing can be more clear than that.

Now one word with reference to this appropriation itself. My friend from Nebraska——

Mr. INGALLS. Is that in order under a discussion of a point of order?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It is very doubtful. Does the Senator make the point?

Mr. INGALLS. Is discussion of the merits of the appropriation in order on an appeal?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator make the point of order?

Mr. INGALLS. Yes, sir. I may want to say something about them myself.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair thinks the point of order well taken.

Mr. ALLISON. For the moment, to gratify the Senator from Kansas, I waive the suggestion I intended to make in reference to the merits of this appropriation.

Mr. INGALLS. Not to gratify me, but to obey the rules.

Mr. ALLISON. For both purposes. Mr. President, it is a most remarkable thing if we have here a procrustean bed with reference to these moneys that we cannot change, that we cannot dot an i or cross a t with reference to these sums of money as suggested by the Committee on Commerce. That may be the rule of the Senate, but if so, I confess an absolute want of knowledge with reference to the rules.

Mr. HARRIS. I think this question of order has been quite sufficiently debated, and I move to lay the appeal from the decision of the Chair upon the table.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It is moved that the appeal from the decision of the Chair be laid upon the table.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. CALL. I have an amendment to offer, which is at the desk.

The ACTING SECRETARY. After the word "dollars," on line 590, page 25, it is moved to insert:

That $2,000 of this sum shall be expended for the improvement of the river above Geneva to Newton, Alabama, and $2,000 of the balance for the improvement of the La Grange Bayou from its mouth up to the town of Freeport, Florida.

Mr. ALLISON. That is out of order, of course, if the amendment just voted down was out of order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will rule if the point of order is made——

Mr. CALL. One word, sir. I suggest to the Senator from Iowa to wait just one moment.

Mr. ALLISON. I do not make any point on the Senator from Florida.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The point of order is not made. The Senator from Florida will proceed.

Mr. CALL. This is an amendment which relates to an appropriation entirely within the States of Alabama and Florida, and it is made by agreement with the two Senators from Alabama, and does not in any wise alter or increase the amount, and it is in conformity with the estimates of the Department.

Mr. McMILLAN. No such amendment was referred to the Committee on Commerce, and I am not advised that such a recommendation has been made by the Department.

Mr. CALL. I can advise the chairman of the committee, for I have it here before me.

Mr. McMILLAN. I shall have to raise the point of order.

Mr. CALL. I see no reason why the Senate should not agree to the amendment. Both of the Senators from Alabama and the Representatives in the House from that district have assented to this distribution.

Mr. McMILLAN. I think it comes within the point of order just decided.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Minnesota raise the point of order?

Mr. McMILLAN. Yes, sir.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair decides the point of order well taken.

Mr. CALL. I appeal from the decision of the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair has sustained the point of order under the rule on which the previous decision was made. The amendment proposed was not offered in the Senate and referred to the Committee on Commerce. For that reason the Chair decides that it is not in order. From that decision of the Chair the Senator from Florida takes an appeal. The question is, Shall the decision of the Chair stand as the judgment of the Senate?

Mr. PUGH. I think the chairman of the committee who has charge of this bill will withdraw his point of order on the statement that induced this agreement. This Bayou La Grange and Freeport on that bayou at the mouth of Holmes Creek are on the line of navigation and are touched by the boats from Geneva to Pensacola. This is, in fact, a part of the same navigation. An estimate was made for the bayou and for Holmes Creek; but it was separated from the estimates for the Choctawhatchee River. For the reason that the boats going through and coming from Pensacola to Geneva touch at Freeport through this Bayou La Grange we think it important that a part of the appropriation should go to opening the channel through Bayou La Grange up to Freeport, which is about three miles.

These are facts with which I was not acquainted at the time I objected to the proposed division of this appropriation on a former day. We now understand the subject. The amendment does not vary the estimate made by the engineer. It just diverts $2,000 of this money to opening a channel up to a town that is touched by boats on this line of navigation.

I hope the Senator will not insist upon the point of order. It is a small matter and one about which we ought to be allowed to agree when it does not increase the appropriation.

Mr. HARRIS. I hope the Senator from Minnesota will withdraw his point of order. The Senators from Florida and the Senators from Alabama, the only ones interested in the appropriation, having agreed about the matter, I think the Senator from Minnesota ought to withdraw the point of order and allow the matter to be determined by those Senators immediately interested in it.

Mr. JONES, of Florida. It is only a distribution of the appropriation; it is not an increase.

Mr. BUTLER. I suggest to the Senator from Florida and the Senator from Alabama that they withdraw this appeal for the present and make this motion when the bill is in the Senate, for I have no idea the point of order will then be insisted upon.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the appeal taken from the decision of the Chair.

Mr. CALL. I withdraw the appeal, but I should be very glad to have the amendment made.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The appeal is withdrawn.

Mr. MORRILL. I offer the following amendment, to come in at the end of the bill:

Provided, That only one-half of the aggregate amount appropriated in this act shall be expended during the year ending June 30, 1883, and the whole or any part of the different items herein mentioned may be expended at the discretion of the President, but not exceeding one-half of the aforesaid aggregate amount.

Mr. President, I am desirous to see a bill pass that shall become a law. It will be remembered that during the administration of General Grant a bill much less than $10,000,000, somewhere about five or six millions, I think, was vetoed; and it will be also remembered that under a bill of only a little over $5,000,000 there was only expended a little over $2,000,000. The largest bill that has ever been appropriated in any year was that of last year, and that amounted to only ten or eleven millions. It is now proposed to double up the whole sum and to pass a bill of over $20,000,000.

I desire to read a word or two from the brilliant young statesman who sits beside me, [Mr. CAMERON, of Pennsylvania,] who then occupied the position of Secretary of War, in relation to a bill under which only $2,200,000 was expended. The House made inquiry why the whole sum was not expended, and here is the answer of the Secretary:

The act was signed on the 14th of August, 1876, and on the same day the President sent a special message to the House of Representatives, stating that he did not consider it obligatory upon him to expend all the money appropriated in the bill; and that during his term of office no money should be expended on works not clearly national; and that owing to a contemplated loss of revenue it might be unadvisable to expend any money upon new works.

Again another paragraph:

In conclusion—

Said Secretary Cameron—

In conclusion, I submit, with all respect, that while the Legislature, with the approval of the Executive, appropriates the money and specifies the purposes for which it is given, the Executive Departments of the Government are always held responsible for the expenditures, not only as to the manner but the amount of them; and that they violate no law if they keep the expenditures within the amount appropriated, and apply them to the purpose for which they are designated.

I make this proposition of amendment in order to keep the appropriations within reasonable bounds; and also for another purpose, to obviate the passage of a river and harbor bill another year if this amendment should prevail, for it leaves one already standing on the statute-book to the amount of over $10,000,000.

Mr. President, it is quite certain that if we allow this bill to go through with an expenditure doubling up the amount from what it was last year, next year we shall have an appropriation bill of perhaps $10,000,000 more, amounting to $30,000,000. There is no break in the matter unless we change the Committee on Commerce and put in another that is already gorged with the different items in the bill. I hope that this amendment that I have proposed will meet with the approbation of the Senate.

Mr. BECK. Mr. President, I think this is an abominable bill, and I think we ought to refer it to the tariff commission, and then ought to hold a Republican caucus and order the Senator from Vermont to except from the operations of the act such matters as appertain to Vermont and a few other States.

Mr. McMILLAN. Mr. President, there is no appropriation in this bill for Smith's Shoals. The engineers reported against it, and notwithstanding the earnest desire of the Senator from Kentucky, the Committee on Commerce could not insert that appropriation in this bill.

Mr. President, I appreciate very well the view which the Senator from Vermont takes of this measure, but I think he is mistaken in regard to the nature of the bill somewhat. These appropriations, as I understand, are not mandatory upon the Secretary of War. There is a large discretion as to the mode of his executing the provisions in this bill; and when you come to consider the bill itself with reference to the improvements that are embraced in it it is, so far as I have been able to discover, when reported by the Committee on Commerce of the Senate, a reasonable bill.

Senators seem to forget that within two or three years there have been added to the public improvements to be incorporated in this bill all the improvements on the Pacific coast. It has only been within two or three years that California has asked the General Government for an appropriation for any of her rivers or harbors, and there is the harbor of her great commercial city, the center of the commercial transactions of the Pacific coast, to be attended to, and there are great rivers entering into the Pacific Ocean in that State which must receive the attention of Congress and receive some of the appropriations made by the General Government.

Then there are the improvements in the State of Oregon and the Territory of Washington, embracing the Columbia River, one of the greatest streams on the continent, one that comes in competition with great railroad lines, and which bears upon its bosom the commerce of that whole western portion of the continent. All this is comparatively new, so that there are embraced the improvements upon the Pacific coast within this bill, and they add to it more than a million of dollars. Then there are the improvements of the great harbors of Texas, a million more; then for the harbors on the Gulf of Mexico there is an addition; then for the harbors along the Atlantic coast there is $300,000 at the harbor of Charleston, there is the Savannah Harbor, there is the harbor at Baltimore, $400,000; then there is the improvement of the waters of New York Bay and Harbor, great waters that must receive the attention of Congress, for which we give nearly a million dollars. Then for a harbor of refuge on the New England coast we put in $52,000. Then go to the interior: the Mississippi River commission has an appropriation of $5,000,000 for that river from the passes to Cairo, $1,000,000 in round numbers for the Missouri River, a million on the Upper Mississippi River. These are some of the larger items in this bill.

Mr. VAN WYCK. Will the Senator allow me right there to put a question? In regard to the $5,000,000 for the Mississippi River, I should like to get the understanding of the Committee on Commerce of the way the $5,000,000 is to be spent. Is it for the purpose of building up artificial embankments to restrain the current of the stream? Is that the idea of the committee?

Mr. McMILLAN. The only explanation as a member of the Committee on Commerce I can give to the Senator is that it is to be expended by the Secretary of War under the direction of the Mississippi River commission, in accordance with their recommendation.

Mr. VAN WYCK. Then does not the Senator know, if it be left to the river commission, that the $5,000,000 is to be spent in building banks or artificial arms to hold the channel? Does he not know that fact?

Mr. McMILLAN. That is a matter which has been a subject of discussion in the Senate. It has been discussed very fully. So far as I am concerned, my understanding is that it is not to be so spent, that it is only to be used where necessary for protecting the channel by protecting the banks of the river; but that is a matter upon which as a member of the Committee on Commerce I cannot be certain. The appropriation is made to be expended by the Secretary of War.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator's five minutes are up.

Mr. McMILLAN. I ask to be indulged for a moment or two. If this reduction is made, if you reduce the bill to one-half, I ask the Senator from Vermont what will he do with the appropriation for the Potomac flats? Have we not heard that the health of this city depends upon that improvement? All that improvement, if only $250,000 is spent on it, will be impaired by the amendment of the Senator to that extent, so as to amount to nothing.

Mr. MORRILL. The Senator will see that the President may expend at his discretion the whole or any part of any appropriation, judging between what is really of national importance and what ought to be considered local.

Mr. McMILLAN. In view of the fact that the revenues of the Government are so great, this bill is not greater in proportion to the revenues of the country now than any of the former bills were at the time they were passed.

Mr. HARRIS. I should like to have the amendment of the Senator from Vermont read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be read.

The Acting Secretary read the amendment of Mr. MORRILL.

Mr. HARRIS. If I understand that amendment, it means no more nor less than this, that the President of the United States shall determine where river and harbor improvements shall be made to the exclusion of the representatives of States and the Representatives of Congressional districts. It is to make the autocrat of the White House the judge and the sole judge as to where these improvements shall be made, and the extent to which they shall be made within the limits of one-half of the aggregate of the whole appropriation contained in the bill. Is the Senator from Vermont ready and willing to commit himself to a principle such as that?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from Vermont, [Mr. MORRILL.]

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. JACKSON. I offer the following amendment, to be inserted after line 699:

For continuing to completion the work on Obey's River, in Tennessee, a tributary of the Cumberland, $5,000.

Mr. McMILLAN. I raise the point of order on that amendment.

Mr. JACKSON. The item was estimated for in the report. The amendment is proposed in pursuance of an estimate made in the report, and in addition to that the amendment was offered on the 8th instant and referred to the Committee on Commerce, so that it is in order under the rules.

Mr. RANSOM. And it was appropriated for last year and it ought to be appropriated for this.

Mr. McMILLAN. There was an amendment offered to the bill, but I think the bill had been reported to the Senate before the amendment was offered.

Mr. HARRIS. That would make no difference. The Committee on Commerce is a continuing and existing committee. The Senate on last Saturday ordered that committee to consider this amendment. If it has not considered it, it is not a matter of consequence under the rule. The amendment, under the letter and spirit of the rule, is in order, and my colleague has a right to have the judgment of the Senate upon its merits. It is in order beyond all controversy.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Minnesota make the point of order?

Mr. McMILLAN. Yes, sir. Before this amendment was offered in the Senate at all the bill was in the possession of the Senate and out of the jurisdiction of the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. INGALLS. Order, Mr. President.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will state the rule:

All amendments to general appropriation bills moved by direction of a standing or select committee of the Senate, proposing to increase an appropriation already contained in the bill, or to add new items of appropriation, shall, at least one day before they are offered, be referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and when actually proposed to the bill no amendment proposing to increase the amount stated in such amendment shall be received.

The Chair will ask the Secretary if this amendment was offered in the Senate and referred to the Committee on Commerce one day before being offered here?

The ACTING SECRETARY. It was referred to the Committee on Commerce July 8.

Mr. HARRIS. That was three days before.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. This amendment was offered on the 8th of July. This is the 11th of July.

Mr. McMILLAN. The bill had been reported prior to the time the amendment was offered, and the committee could not then have considered it.

Mr. HARRIS. I ask the Senator from Minnesota if the Committee on Commerce has not been in existence from the 8th day of July until now? And if it has ignored the order of the Senate to investigate this amendment, it is no fault of the gentleman who offered it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will have to hold under this rule according to its language (while the position is a new and delicate one for him to occupy) that the amendment is in order. It has been offered in the Senate and referred to the committee one day before it is now presented here. The Chair holds that the point of order is not well taken. The question is on the amendment.

Mr. JACKSON. The engineer's estimate for the improvement of this stream was $11,869. The engineer's report, parts first and second, show that in 1880 $4,000 was appropriated for the improvement of the stream; in 1881 $2,500 was appropriated, and the engineer says now that the remainder of the estimate can be judiciously and properly expended for the next year. It is a very desirable improvement. The stream runs on the borders of Tennessee and Kentucky, and it is the only outlet for the commerce of the counties of Tennessee and Kentucky bordering on the stream. The engineer's estimate is that $5,000 will complete the improvement, and not to do so will practically be to lose that which has been expended.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from Tennessee.

Mr. McMILLAN. This bill, as it came from the House, contained no such appropriation, and the bill, as we received it, amounted to seventeen and a half million dollars. The House of Representatives have gone very thoroughly through the estimates, and have allowed for everything that could have been properly embraced in the bill, and have provided for the rivers quite fully. I hope the Senate will not add this item, and I trust Senators will not offer amendments to this bill, but will let us get through. It is large enough now, and has occupied a long time.

Mr. JACKSON. This is an improvement estimated for and reported by the Chief of Engineers, and he says:

Amount that can be profitably expended in fiscal year ending June 30, 1883, $5,400.

We ask for but $5,000. I hope the Senate will give it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from Tennessee, [Mr. JACKSON.]

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SLATER. I move, in line 337, to insert, after the word "improving," the words "entrance to;" so as to read:

Improving entrance to Yaquina Bay, Oregon.

This merely makes it conform to the former bills, and identifies the place where the money is to be expended. It is a mere verbal amendment.

Mr. McMILLAN. Does that expend the whole amount at the entrance to the bay?

Mr. SLATER. Yes, sir. There is where the works are projected and where the appropriation is proposed to be expended, and it is in conformity with former appropriations.

Mr. McMILLAN. I have had experience enough to suggest to me that I ought to oppose the amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Oregon, [Mr. SLATER.]

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. GORMAN. I offer the following amendment:

On page 19, line 454, after the word "and," strike out "Little Deal's Island" and insert "the mainland on Dame's quarter;" so as to read; "Improving upper water-passage or thoroughfare between Deal's Island and the mainland on Dame's quarter, Maryland, $5,000."

Mr. McMILLAN. That amendment, I think, was not offered in the Senate and referred to the committee. I have no record of it.

Mr. GORMAN. It does not change the appropriation at all; it only describes more accurately the point where the money is to be expended.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from Maryland, [Mr. GORMAN.]

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. FERRY. I send to the desk an amendment which I offer, to be inserted after line 1320, on page 55.

The ACTING SECRETARY. After line 1320, it is proposed to insert:

For the purchase and laying of a cable, and for the construction of the necessary land line to connect old Fort Mackinac, Saint Ignace, and the island of Mackinac, in the State of Michigan, for equipping the line with the necessary instruments, battery, &c., and for maintaining and operating the same for one year, $25,000.

Mr. FERRY. The object of this amendment is to lay a cable from Mackinac City, at the straits, to the island of Mackinac, so that vessels that pass can be signaled. I send to the Chair a letter from the Chief Signal Officer, which will explain it. It is in the interest of commerce. It is just like the case of the cable between Newport and Block Island, where a cable was laid by the Government in the interest of commerce.

Mr. McMILLAN. I raise the point of order that that is not germane to the bill.

Mr. FERRY. I ask that the letter be read. I have the floor, I believe.

Mr. McMILLAN. I withdraw the point of order until it is read.

The Acting Secretary read as follows:

WAR DEPARTMENT,
OFFICE OF THE CHIEF SIGNAL OFFICER,
Washington, D. C., June 26, 1882.

SIR: In reply to your letter of the 24th instant, asking the views of this office upon the importance of a cable from old Fort Mackinac to Saint Ignace and thence to Mackinac Island, I have the honor to say that the proposed cable would be of great advantage to this office in the meteorological work, affording additional facilities in giving warning of the approach of storms to shipping on Lakes Michigan, Superior, and Huron. Its importance to commerce cannot be overestimated. The establishment of display stations on the Straits of Mackinac has been requested by numerous boards of trade.

For the purchase and laying of a cable and for the construction of the necessary land line to connect old Fort Mackinac, Saint Ignace, and the island of Mackinac, for equipping the line with the necessary instruments, battery, &c., and for maintaining and operating the same for one year, an appropriation of $25,000 will be required.

I am sir, very respectfully, your obedient servant,

W. B. HAZEN,
Brig. and Bvt. Maj. Gen., Chief Signal Officer, U. S. A.

Hon. T. W. FERRY,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

Mr. FERRY. We are all familiar with the straits, of course, and know that the shipping from Chicago and Milwaukee passes the straits, and that shipping upward bound as well as from Lake Superior passes Mackinac Island, and in the judgment of the Chief Signal Officer it is important to the commerce of the country that there should be a signal station there, and it cannot be there in communication with the mainland without a cable. It is for that reason that I offer the amendment in good faith. It is in the interest of commerce. Vessels passing to and fro on their way to Buffalo and Cleveland, engaged in the iron trade as well as in the grain trade, pass that point necessarily and cannot get through without. There they can be signaled to their owners, and storms can be signaled, so that the interests of commerce are served.

I think the amendment is a proper one. It is a small amount of appropriation, and inasmuch as Congress has done the same thing between Newport and Block Island, I do not see why here, where great vessels pass, larger shipping, that greater interest should not be provided for as well.

Mr. McMILLAN. I raise the point of order that this amendment is not germane to the bill. This is a bill making appropriations for the improvement of the rivers and harbors of the country.

Mr. FERRY. And for other purposes.

Mr. McMILLAN. But all in the interest of commerce and navigation, and there is no authority to lay cables in a river and harbor bill.

Mr. FERRY. In the interest of commerce?

Mr. McMILLAN. In the interest of commerce in a river and harbor bill we improve the harbors and rivers; but in the interest of commerce and navigation we do not lay cables. The Signal Bureau perhaps does not feel quite so much interest in commerce as it does in the meteorological observations that its officers make, and there are a variety of other bills upon which this amendment would be germane. No doubt Congress has power to appropriate for the purpose.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator make the point of order?

Mr. McMILLAN. Yes, sir.

Mr. FERRY. Before the Chair announces a ruling on the point of order, I desire to correct my friend, who has the system of rivers and harbors at heart, and I commend him in it. I have stood by him all through. I think this is the only amendment that I have offered to this river and harbor bill in open session. I think I have been quite modest on that score, and I am not liable to the point of order. I would rather that the Senator should not make it on me.

The Chief Signal Officer has charge of this whole system of signals which is in the interest of commerce largely on all these lakes, as well as on the coast; and certainly it ought to come within this bill, which is in the interest of commerce, as well as the improvement of any river or harbor. It is not only to facilitate commerce but to insure its safety. What better method could be devised than this system of signaling? This is a point where vast shipping passes, and a most important point that cannot be reached except by cable.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Under Rule 29 the Chair decides that the point of order is well taken.

Mr. FERRY. I believe on the question of relevancy the rule is mandatory that the question shall be submitted to the Senate. Will the Chair have the rule read?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair can direct that; and under that rule the Chair will submit the question to the Senate. The Chair decides that the amendment is out of order. Rule 29 provides that—

No amendment which proposes general legislation shall be received to any general appropriation bill; nor shall any amendment not germane or relevant to the subject-matter contained in the bill be received.

The point of order is well taken.

Mr. FERRY. I think if the Chair will read further he will see that the question of relevancy must be submitted to the Senate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair decides that under the same rule he must submit it to the Senate. The question must be submitted to the Senate without debate. Those who are in favor of sustaining the point of order made by the Senator from Minnesota will say "ay;" those of the contrary opinion will say "no." [Putting the question.] The noes seem to have it.

Mr. McMILLAN. I call for the yeas and nays.

Mr. FERRY. I do not think the Senate understood the question. I did not myself. I supposed the Chair put the question whether this was in order or not.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The point of order was raised by the Senator from Minnesota that the amendment was out of order. The Chair put the question to the Senate, Is the point of order raised by the Senator well taken?

Mr. FERRY. I thought the Chair put it to the Senate, "Is the amendment in order or not?"

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will put it in that way, Is the amendment in order?

Mr. FERRY. That is it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is, Is the amendment in order?

The question being put, there were on a division—ayes 10, noes 30.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment is held to be out of order.

Mr. RANSOM. I beg leave to offer an amendment, to add to the surveys a little item for a survey in the State of Delaware that I ought to have called the attention of the committee to before, and it is my fault that I did not do it. After line 1471 I move to insert:

Leipsic River, Delaware, from the Delaware River to the town of Leipsic.

Mr. McMILLAN. It is merely for a survey.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. JONES, of Florida. On line 156, page 7, I move to strike out "twenty-five" and insert "seventy-five;" so as to read:

Improving harbor at Pensacola, Florida: Continuing improvement, $75,000.

Mr. President, I have never yet offered an amendment to this bill that did not have for its purpose at least the advancement of a national work. In looking over this bill and considering the number of places provided for, utter astonishment will be created when their commercial importance comes to be analyzed.

The harbor of Pensacola is unquestionably the best harbor south of the Chesapeake Bay. It has not required much. The estimate for it now does not contemplate any great gap for the sinking of the public money. I showed to the Senate the other day that in consequence of the great change in the tonnage of our ships there was a revolution in our carrying trade, and while this harbor in former years was ample for all purposes of commerce, and having a tonnage now but little below that of the largest port in the Gulf, the inconvenience to commerce arising from the little obstruction in the inner harbor has required a little aid from the Federal Government.

It is also the only naval station in the South. It is the place where we keep large supplies of stores for our Navy, where our ships of war on that frontier must enter if they enter anywhere for the purpose of supply and repair; and in consequence of the little obstruction in this harbor our flag-ship of the Gulf squadron has been compelled to pass by our only naval station in the Gulf time and again because, while she could cross the outer harbor, she could not get into the navy-yard in consequence of this little interruption in the inner harbor. Here is what the engineer says:

The inner bar across the main channel is a great obstacle to the commerce of this port, as it causes loss of time and considerable expense to vessels having to wait days, and sometimes weeks, before a sufficient depth of water on the inner bar will permit them to go to sea.

The removal of this obstruction will permit this port not only to retain its already large trade, but no doubt to considerably increase it; it will also enable our vessels of war to reach Pensacola navy-yard without detention.

Now, to give an idea of the commerce of the port, for this is no little stream, the engineer says:

Five hundred and nine vessels cleared, with a tonnage of 303,910 tons.

There is hardly another port in the Gulf of Mexico that can make that showing; and the little sum of $75,000 has been asked for as part of an aggregate of $150,000 to do this little work, to take care of this fine harbor, the best, I say, on the Southern coast.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator's time has expired.

Mr. JONES, of Florida. I do not know when a rule has been applied limiting debate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. If there be no objection, the Senator will be allowed to proceed. The Chair hears no objection.

Mr. JONES, of Florida. If this was a huge work, contemplating the expenditure of millions, it would be another thing; but it is a substantially important improvement, necessary to be done now in order to relieve the commerce of that port. When you come to look at the tonnage of ports that have obtained millions and put them beside this they sink into insignificance. They may not be here on account of their local consequence, but I speak as respects the commerce of the country, and we have no authority to provide public money except to advance the interests of the country.

But, I think, Mr. President, I have said enough at this time to indicate to the Senate the importance of this amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from Florida, [Mr. JONES.]

Mr. MCMILLAN. I find the amendment was offered and referred to the committee, and therefore no point of order will lie against it perhaps; but this improvement was very fully considered by the Committee on Commerce. The House allowed one-third of the amount recommended by the engineers, and that was the basis of action in framing this bill. The increase to Florida on the Saint John's River was such that the committee did not see that they could increase this item, and after full consideration the committee determined to disallow the amendment. The amount of this bill is so great that it will not do to increase it, and the committee adhere to that view, and I think the Senate should support them in that conclusion.

Mr. CALL. I think it would be very unfair to object to this increase for the port of Pensacola. Contrast it with half of the harbors appropriated for in this bill—with the port of Wilmington, with the port of Galveston, with the increase of the appropriations for Michigan, with the general provisions of this bill, and the ports in Florida have been discriminated against, and the rate of appropriation there has not been one-third of the estimates. There has been upon this bill an increase of $125,000 above the estimates in reference to the Sacramento River in California.

In reference to Wilmington the increase is $125,000, nearly two-thirds of the estimate of the engineer. If there is to be any show of reason or justice in the disbursement of this money it should be done with some regard to the equality of increase and of appropriation of the amount estimated for by the Chief Engineer.

Now, the port of Pensacola is of greater importance compared with many of these ports in the amount of its foreign commerce. I have the statistics here before me, and I do not speak with mere idle assertion as has been often done in regard to this bill. The discrimination against these ports in Florida does not concern the State of Florida so much as it concerns the thousand millions of dollars of commerce that goes along the coast of Florida. There has been an increase of two-thirds of the estimates in the amount allowed to other ports, and the amount allowed to Pensacola and the Florida ports bears no such proportion to the amount estimated for, but does not reach more than one-third, and in some cases not a tenth part of the estimate.

Let us contrast the claims of Pensacola with those of other ports. This is an important matter to us. The five-minute rule was adopted without my knowledge, and I hope we shall be allowed to say something on the subject, even though we may take a greater time than five minutes.

The port of Pensacola during the past year, according to the returns made by the Chief of the Bureau of Statistics for 1880, received foreign vessels from the Argentine Republic, Belgium, Brazil, Equador, France on the Atlantic, France on the Mediterranean, French possessions in Africa and the adjacent islands, Germany, England, Scotland, Ireland, British West Indies, Honduras, Caribbean Sea, continental Italy, Sicily and Sardinia, the Netherlands, Dutch East Indies, Portugal, San Domingo, Spain on the Atlantic, Spain on the Mediterranean, Cuba, Sweden and Norway, the United States of Colombia, and Uruguay; over five hundred foreign vessels entered and cleared at the port of Pensacola; $2,000,000 and upward of American exports were exported from the port to European and other countries and exchanged for gold.

In the number of vessels the port of Galveston does not exceed the port of Pensacola much over twice, say three times. The appropriations for Galveston are some $300,000, taking them all together. The appropriation for Wilmington was increased $125,000 in the Senate, and there is not half that difference in the foreign trade of Pensacola and Wilmington. The fact is that the foreign trade of Pensacola approaches that of Wilmington, if it is not as great or greater. I have the figures before me, but have not time to read them.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator's time has expired.

Mr. JONES, of Florida. It far exceeds Wilmington.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Will the Senate consent that the Senator from Florida may proceed with his remarks? The Chair hears no objection.

Mr. CALL. I hope that inasmuch as the river Sacramento in California has been increased $100,000 above the estimate of the engineers, not here increased, but so reported in the House, some portion of the increase above the estimates of the engineers allowed by the committee in other States may be given to the foreign commerce of this country. This bill appropriates about $4,000,000 to the foreign commerce of the United States, about $7,000,000 to the Mississippi and its tributaries and its reservoirs, and the balance of this large sum of money to the little rivers and streams throughout the country, while Florida, with her fourteen to fifteen hundred miles of coast and her thousand million of dollars of commerce going around along her coast, receives—what? The sum of $320,000, or one-seventh or one-tenth of the amount estimated by the engineers, while other places are provided for in this bill above the estimates of the engineers. Wilmington has $125,000 added. The estimate, if I am not mistaken, was $300,000. The House put it at $100,000; $125,000 increase is made here, so that it is $225,000 in the bill now.

Mr. MCMILLAN. I wish to state to the Senator from Florida that in regard to the Sacramento River there was a special report from the War Department making the estimate $500,000.

Mr. CALL. Then $225,000 is half even of the special report which has come in here within a few days, and without being put on the general report.

I ask, then, Mr. President, that for the port of Pensacola, which is a naval station, which is a rendezvous for all the large vessels in the Gulf, which exports $2,000,000 of gold value every year, which is connected by rail with the coal-fields and the mineral region of Alabama, where the report of the engineer shows that the naval defenses actually demand and are being injured for the need of adequate appropriation, that this little sum amounting to $50,000 shall be appropriated in the interest of the commerce of the nation and for its naval and military defenses.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from Florida, [Mr. JONES.]

The amendment was agreed to; there being on a division—ayes 33, noes 10.

Mr. MCMILLAN. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were not ordered.

Mr. GEORGE. I offer the following amendment——

Mr. CONGER. There was a call for the yeas and nays on the Pensacola amendment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator just occupying the chair said there was not a sufficient number rising to second the call.

Mr. CONGER. I heard no call for a showing of hands on that. I should like to have the question put.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The vote can be taken again in the Senate. The recent occupant of the chair says there were not a sufficient number up to second the call for the yeas and nays.

Mr. CONGER. If this is a precedent, we shall hardly ever reach a time when we can vote on this amendment in the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. But the recent occupant of the chair stated that there were not a sufficient number up.

Mr. CONGER. But I make the statement that I heard no call for a second for the yeas and nays. The occupant of the chair then was leaving it, and the present occupant of the chair was approaching it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The present occupant of the chair will decide according to what his predecessor has stated.

Mr. FARLEY. I wish to state that I called for a second and I only noticed three hands up; there were not one-fifth of the Senators present seconding the call for the yeas and nays.

Mr. GEORGE. I now offer my amendment. After line 627, page 26, I move to insert:

For improving Big Black River in Mississippi, from its mouth to the point in Madison County where the Chicago, Saint Louis and New Orleans Railroad crosses the river, $10,000.

I desire to say simply in favor of the amendment that it is less than one-third of the estimates of the engineer; that the river is susceptible of improvement, and that it runs through a rich and well cultivated country. It never has had a dollar from the Government. I do not know why the amendment was rejected by the Committee on Commerce. It is certainly a river that needs the appropriation, and deserves it as much as any river that is appropriated for in the bill.

Mr. MCMILLAN. If every item embraced in the volume of recommendations of the Chief of Engineers were inserted in this bill, there would be an appropriation bill here of about $75,000,000. I trust the Senate will not change this bill by adding to the bill as it now stands.

Mr. GEORGE. I should like to know why the appropriation was rejected by the Committee on Commerce. The river is a navigable stream, which runs through a rich and well cultivated country, and over which has been shipped, and would be shipped now with a little improvement, a large amount of cotton and other products. I should like the Senator to inform me why this river was rejected, while others were included that are smaller?

Mr. MCMILLAN. The House refused to insert this improvement in the bill, and when the bill came to the Senate the amendments offered by the Senator from Mississippi were very fully considered, and those that we thought were of the most urgent necessity were allowed, and this was not deemed such, and the committee thought they must refuse the amendment.

Mr. GEORGE. They allowed one-half of what I asked for in the amendment for the Bay of Biloxi, and what I asked was about one-third of the estimate of the engineer. So I get about one-sixth of that.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Mississippi, [Mr. GEORGE.]

The question being put, there were, on a division—ayes 28, noes 18.

Mr. MCMILLAN. I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. SHERMAN. I have voted with the chairman of the Committee on Commerce on this bill right along, and it does seem to me that if we are going to close it, it is about time that amendments which are merely supported because they are reported favorably by a board of engineers should stop. The most painful bill that can be considered in the Senate is the river and harbor bill, because everybody interested in a proposition is expected by his constituents to get all the money he can. There is always three or four times as much estimated for by the engineers as can possibly be appropriated. There must be an end some time to the adoption of these amendments.

Mr. GEORGE. Do not make the end right here after passing the others.

Mr. SHERMAN. I have been telling my friend from Minnesota occasionally that he ought to get angry, that he ought to swear a little, do something or other to show that he is tired out; and I know he is. Now, it seems to me that Senators must have a little forbearance and let him off. This is the last day he has to act on the amendments to this bill, and it does seem to me that after the committee have gone over the labor that this Committee on Commerce have, with seventy-odd millions of estimates of appropriations and three volumes of these estimates, now to have to fight all over again all these various amendments merely because he cannot possibly give more than one-third of the estimates is a labor that he ought to be relieved from. It seems that there are now twenty millions on this bill, which is ten millions more than any river and harbor bill I ever knew of before. What is the highest one?

Mr. HAWLEY. Eleven millions.

Mr. SHERMAN. This is twice as much as any river and harbor bill passed heretofore. It seems to me we had better let up on the Senator from Minnesota; let him have his bill, and take the chances next year and be a little earlier in getting before the Committee on Commerce with your estimates, and making there your speeches about the local importance of these very important navigable rivers that I must confess I never heard of till I read the bill.

I hope the Senate will come to a vote on the bill. I shall vote with the chairman against every appropriation if he will get a little out of patience about it, show a little more temper and a little more determination to close the matter. I shall vote with him on any question if he requires me to do so.

Mr. LAMAR. I concur with the Senator from Ohio that there ought to be a limit to the appropriations for the improvement of rivers and harbors. Applying his rule, what discrimination ought to be made? I think he has not very judiciously timed his suggestion in applying it to the amendment offered by my colleague. This river is a navigable river, and it runs through a very important part of the country. The commodity which it bears to market and the centers of trade constitute largely the basis of our foreign commerce. It is no insignificant stream, but a large river, and I regret very much that the Senator's zeal for economy comes in just at this point.

The Principal Legislative Clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. PLATT, (when his name was called.) I am paired with the Senator from North Carolina, [Mr. VANCE.] How he would vote on this particular amendment I do not know, and therefore I withhold my vote. I should vote "nay" if he were present.

The roll-call was concluded.

Mr. ROLLINS. The Senator from North Carolina [Mr. VANCE] is paired with the Senator from Louisiana, [Mr. KELLOGG.] The Senator from Connecticut [Mr. PLATT] announced his pair with the Senator from North Carolina.

Mr. PLATT. I can only say that the Senator from North Carolina came to me and said that he was necessarily compelled to leave the Chamber, and inquired of me how I should vote on this bill, and I told him I should vote against it. He said he wanted to pair with me on this bill as he was in favor of the bill, and I made the pair with him, and I must respect it.

Mr. RANSOM. That is a very reasonable pair on this bill, for it is known that my colleague [Mr. VANCE] is for it, and the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. KELLOGG] is for it. Hence it was very proper for my colleague to pair with a gentleman who was opposed to the bill.

The result was announced—yeas 32, nays 21; as follows:

So the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BUTLER. Is the Senator from Minnesota, the chairman of the committee, going to try to get a vote on the bill to-night?

Mr. MCMILLAN. I desire to have the bill disposed of, and I trust Senators will withhold further amendments and let us get through with the bill.

Mr. VAN WYCK. The Senate seems to think differently and to approve the amendments that are offered.

Mr. GROOME. I offer the following amendment, to be inserted after line 985:

Improving Elk River, Maryland: Continuing improvement, $13,600.

Mr. President, the stream for which it is proposed by this amendment to make an appropriation is that upon which the town in which I reside is situated. That town is the county-seat of Cecil County, which county in population, in taxable wealth, and manufacturing industries is the chief of the nine counties which make up what is known as the Eastern Shore of Maryland.

In the town is a large establishment for the manufacture of artificial fertilizers. In its immediate vicinity are large mills for the manufacture of iron and of cotton goods, and the mills which make the paper that is used in printing the Baltimore Sun, the Philadelphia Ledger, and the Philadelphia Record. There are besides smaller manufacturing establishments.

Already, since I have been a member of this body, two appropriations have been made for this stream, and the object of the appropriation now asked for is to complete its improvement in accordance with the engineers' recommendations. The result of the appropriations already made has been to add very largely to the water traffic of that town and its vicinity; and at its wharves, which before had become almost useless except for the class of very small vessels which traffic during the summer in vegetable produce, and in the winter in oysters, vessels can now be seen very frequently of considerable size receiving and discharging their cargoes. Another result has been that a competition has arisen between water and railroad traffic which has already caused a reduction of freights, and a consequent great advantage to the people of that town and vicinity, which will be largely enhanced when the improvement to that stream is completed.

This amendment was sent to the Committee on Commerce, but owing to the facts of the case not being fully understood by that committee it did not receive favorable action. I know from conversations with individual members of that committee that had they understood the facts as they now understand them and as the Senate understands them after the statement I have just made, that committee would have acted favorably on the amendment. I hope, therefore, that it may pass without any opposition.

Mr. MCMILLAN. I must ask the Senate to vote down the amendment. This is the whole amount embraced in the report of the engineers, $13,600. As I said, if the Senate will go on and put amendments of this character upon this bill and of this amount, the bill will certainly meet with the condemnation of the people generally. The Senate has added whatever has been asked, and it is evident that those who are opposed to the bill are about as desirous of having these amendments granted as are the members of the Senate who propose the amendments. I trust the members of the committee and of the Senate who sustain the bill will vote against the amendment.

Mr. GROOME. It is true this is the whole amount which the engineer estimates will be required for the completion of the work, but it is also true that it is but a small amount, and that not one dollar has been put into this bill by any amendment sent by me to the committee or by any amendment offered by me in the Senate, and that this is the only appropriation which I am now urging shall be added to the bill. Where I have been disappointed in the committee's action I have not, except in this instance, made any effort to reverse it.

I certainly think that in view of the fact that the appropriation asked is for a stream running up to my own town, in view of the fact that the amount asked is a small one, and in view of the fact that the improvement is already nearly completed——

Mr. MCMILLAN. I think the Senator has addressed the Senate once.

Mr. VAN WYCK. I trust there will be no objection to the Senator from Maryland being fully heard.

Mr. GROOME. I am satisfied that I have not occupied the five minutes allowed to each Senator. I was about to say when interrupted that in view of the further fact that if the appropriation needed to complete the improvement is not all made in one year, the ultimate expense of the improvement will be increased, that I trust the Senate may have no hesitation in adopting the amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Maryland, [Mr. GROOME.]

The amendment was agreed to; there being on a division—aye 25, noes 19.

Mr. VAN WYCK. I trust now that my friend, the chairman of the committee, will make no further objection to these small amendments, because in fact the real merit of this bill is in the small amendments that are being put upon it now.

Mr. ALLISON. I desire to make a little correction in reference to the surveys that were ordered for the Illinois and Michigan Canal and the Hennepin Canal by transposing the appropriating part. It is now in the middle of the provision whereas it ought to be at the end.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no objection that transposition will be made.

Mr. ALLISON. I have changed the phraseology, but not so as to alter the sense.

Mr. CONGER. Let the amendment be read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be read.

The PRINCIPAL LEGISLATIVE CLERK. It is proposed to strike out lines 1194 to 1200, inclusive, in these words:

That the sum of $100,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, be, and the same is hereby, appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury of the United States not otherwise appropriated, to carry into effect the provisions of this act relating to the canal connecting the Illinois River at or near the town of Hennepin with the Mississippi River, at or above the city of Rock Island, and the branch thereof.

And at the end of the last amendment adopted relating to the Hennepin Canal to add:

And for the purposes of this paragraph the sum of $100,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, is hereby appropriated.

Mr. PENDLETON. I suggest to the Senator from Iowa that while he is making the amendment there, he strike out the words "and locate," which was declared out of order the other day but afterward other words were stricken out so as to make it proper. These words should come out.

Mr. ALLISON. I trust the Senator will not complicate this matter with that.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Iowa, [Mr. ALLISON.]

Mr. INGALLS. What is the language that this is to apply to? What is the paragraph? Let us hear the paragraph that it applies to. I should like to know something about it.

The Principal Legislative Clerk read as follows:

That the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to survey and locate a canal from a point on the Illinois River, at or near the town of Hennepin, by the most practicable and convenient route, to the Mississippi River, at or above the city of Rock Island, with a branch canal or feeder from the most practicable and convenient point on Rock River to the most practicable and convient point on the main line of said canal. Said canal and said branch shall not be less than 70 feet wide at the water-line, and not less than 7 feet in depth of water, with locks not less than 150 in length and 21 feet in width, and with a capacity for vessels of at least 280 tons burden; and for that purpose the Secretary of War shall have power and authority, by engineers and agents employed by him, to enter upon any lands for the purpose of making the necessary preliminary examinations and surveys. The cost of construction, the annual cost of maintenance, and the economy of use of said canal when completed, shall be estimated and accompany said surveys.

And the Secretary of War shall cause to be made by skillful engineers of the Army a survey of the Illinois and Michigan Canal, connecting the Illinois River with Lake Michigan at Chicago, and estimates of the cost of enlarging the same so as to correspond in dimensions with the proposed canal between Hennepin and the Mississippi River, and to report to the next session of Congress the cost of enlarging said canal, and of the construction of the canal between Hennepin and the Mississippi River and the right of way therefor, and for the purpose of securing the early construction of an ample water-way for all purposes of commerce between the Mississippi River at or near Rock Island and the lakes at Chicago.

Mr. INGALLS. What I want to know is whether the transposition of the appropriating clause changes the duty of the Secretary of War in regard to both those projects?

Mr. ALLISON. The Senator will remember that the Senator from Illinois offered his amendment with reference to a survey of the Illinois and Michigan Canal; and it was inserted after the appropriation instead of before the appropriation. I simply now wish to have the appropriation inserted at the proper place, as it was understood at the time it was adopted.

Mr. INGALLS. So that it applies to the survey of the entire work between the Mississippi River and Chicago?

Mr. ALLISON. That is the object of it, to make a thorough survey of the whole work.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. GROOME. I offer an amendment which only provides for a survey, to come in after line 1233:

Wetipken Creek, Maryland.

Mr. McMILLAN. That is in the wrong line.

Mr. GROOME. Any other place the chairman prefers will be acceptable to me.

Mr. McMILLAN. Put it after line 1539.

Mr. GROOME. Very well.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CALL. On line 149, page 7, I move to strike out "fifty" and insert "one hundred;" so as to read:

Improving Cumberland Sound, Georgia and Florida: Continuing improvement, $100,000.

Mr. McMILLAN. I must ask the Senate to vote this down. All the appropriations have been made in the State of Florida that ought in reason to be made. This improvement is of a proper character for an appropriation, but if you make any appropriation at all it ought to be for one far greater than that. The $50,000 in the bill will do all the good that the larger sum will. I hope the Senate will vote this down. If they do not I take it that they want to load this bill for the purpose of defeating it.

Mr. JONES, of Florida. I do not want to load this bill down.

Mr. McMILLAN. That is the result.

Mr. JONES, of Florida. If there had been any regard paid by the committee to the board of engineers whose authority has been invoked so much, a proper appropriation would have been made. There has not been a case presented here that is to be compared with this. It was stated the other day by the Senator from Michigan [Mr. CONGER] a member of the Committee on Commerce, that the board of engineers was the authority that was to be observed. Now look at these appropriations. I have got the figures here to show what has been done in nearly every place for which an appropriation has been made, and this stands a conspicuous exception to them all.

Place.	Estimate.	Appropriation.	Percentage.
Portland	$110,000	$35,000	32
Portsmouth	55,000	17,000	31
Boston	96,500	96,500	100
Providence	100,000	125,000	125

Mr. ANTHONY. There was a supplemental report in the case of Providence.

Mr. JONES, of Florida. I go on.

Place.	Estimate.	Appropriation.	Percentage.
New York	$360,000	$260,000	72
Philadelphia	383,000	276,000	72
Baltimore	900,000	450,000	50
Norfolk	93,000	75,000	80
Wilmington	300,000	140,000	43
Charleston	750,000	300,000	40
Savannah	350,000	200,000	57
Cumberland Sound, or Fernandina	500,000	50,000	10

There is no other case in the whole bill where it only appropriates 10 per cent. of the amount recommended. That is all the bill does for this extensive harbor which, in a military and naval point of view, is most important, as well as commercially, having had five hundred ships there this last season and a tonnage nearly equal to that of Charleston, according to the statement of the engineers. Wilmington has a tonnage according to this of 227,102 tons; Charleston, 511,209; Savannah, 626,829; Fernandina, 300,642; Jacksonville, 165,000; Pensacola, 303,910; Mobile, 87,422; Galveston, 530,338. This is the commercial tonnage of these places. Surely, upon every consideration, there was no reason in the world, according to the tonnage, the wants of the port, and the necessities of the public, and the recommendation of the engineers, for making the allowance of Fernandina of only 10 per cent.; it stands there as a conspicuous exception to all the appropriations in the bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator's time is out.

Mr. VEST. I just want to say a word, and I may as well say it here as anywhere. It is perfectly useless to enter into any contest as to any individual appropriation. It is very evident that each appropriation is, in the view of its mover, the most important and is absolutely essential to the general welfare of the whole country. I do not propose to go into any discussion of an individual case, but I appeal to the instinct of self-preservation of every Senator; if we desire to pass this bill at all we must stop somewhere. If we go further we imperil the whole bill and every portion of it, and it will inevitably fail all together. We have now swollen it enormously. It is the most liberal, and according to the general opinion of the country, the most exorbitant river and harbor bill ever enacted by Congress; and if we continue to listen to individual appeals there is no end to it, and the inevitable result will be the failure of the entire measure.

I have got another word to say in all candor to my friends from the South. No gentleman here will doubt my affection for that section of the country; and if any one does doubt it, no expression of mine could add to the evidences which my past life has given. A large portion of these appropriations go to the South, and I say to Senators from the Southern States that we must stop somewhere. If we add amendments swelling the appropriations to the Southern States there can be but one end, and that will be a rejection of all applications hereafter. Therefore I appeal to Senators to vote down this and every other amendment; let us stop where we are, and not endanger the whole measure by listening to impassioned appeals in favor of localities and sections.

Mr. VAN WYCK. Mr. President, I fail to see the force of the admonition given by the chairman of the committee and the other member of the committee who has just taken his seat. We are told that the instinct of self-preservation requires the defeat of all amendments. Self-preservation of whom? Self-preservation of what? I do not understand the force of that argument. We are told that we must vote down amendments, however meritorious, however proper they may be, in the interest of self-preservation. A strange argument! The gentleman says we load the bill too heavily. Another strange argument! Why should not a proper amendment be placed here? Gentlemen ought to have thought of the heavy load of this bill when they were considering it in the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. MCMILLAN. So we did.

Mr. VAN WYCK. And the trouble is that you loaded it as you did and you put too much load in one end; it does not hang even. That is the trouble. The Senate is trying to equalize the thing and very properly, because it is all on the principle my friend speaks of, the instinct of self-preservation. Nothing is done with this bill in the committee or in the Senate except on that pretense. The Senator spoke properly when he said "self-protection," and the gentlemen of the committee thought they had gone far enough to protect themselves against raiders on the floor of the Senate.

Certainly my friend from Minnesota was desirous to place the great rivers of the West under the control of the Mississippi River commission; and yet after that was provided for, he was very particular in this bill, which he has brought in, to individualize when, where, and how, the other million and a-half should be spent from Cairo up to the source of the Mississippi River, and he asked this body to make specific suggestions. That has evidently been the course of the committee in this matter. I speak nothing in reproach.

Mr. MCMILLAN. The Senator will bear in mind——

Mr. VAN WYCK. I only want to bring before you the sort of administration we have of these matters.

Mr. MCMILLAN. The Senator evidently has not examined the bill, because there was no amendment to that appropriation made by the Senate Committee on Commerce.

Mr. VAN WYCK. It did not need any amendment, because it was all arranged in committee. That had the whole power in this matter. I say that for the Mississippi River up to Cairo there was $5,000,000 in the bill that he was willing to leave in the hands of the Mississippi River commission. At the same time that you were giving the river commission the power to bury the millions you are appropriating to them the Senate thought you might as well bury $10,000 on Black River, Mississippi, and that is the only reason I had for voting for that amendment. You might as well bury $10,000 in Black River Swamp, in Mississippi, as $4,000,000 or $5,000,000 on the banks of the Mississippi, as you may do by this river commission of yours. Five million dollars is appropriated for the Mississippi River to Cairo, $600,000 from Cairo to the Illinois River, $200,000 from the Illinois River to Des Moines Rapids, and so they go tramping along every mile of the Mississippi River, and they designate how it shall be spent after they get out of the hands of the Mississippi River commission down at Cairo.

Mr. MCMILLAN. That is the House bill.

Mr. VAN WYCK. No matter; it came from your committee in that shape; you approved it, did you not? Two hundred thousand dollars is appropriated from the Illinois River to the Des Moines Rapids; then for improving Des Moines Rapids, to be spent in Iowa and Illinois, $30,000; then for a dry-dock at Des Moines, $30,000; from Saint Paul to Des Moines Rapids, $250,000, $15,000 of which is to improve the channel and banks of the river on the west side of Saint Paul. They are very particular to designate how it shall all be spent there. Then above the Falls of Saint Anthony $10,000 is appropriated; improving the Upper Mississippi River, snag-boats, $25,000, making $345,000 without adding the $600,000 from Cairo to the Illinois River. Then for reservoirs at the headwaters of the Mississippi $300,000 more is appropriated, making nearly a million and a half dollars.

Gentlemen ought to have thought of lightening the load when these appropriations were made. That would have been the time to have done it. I suppose if we can get the appropriations equalized properly, so that they will not careen too much to one side, I may be able to vote for this bill; but I want to say here why I propounded the question to my friend whether the $5,000,000 was to be spent in carrying out the scheme of the Mississippi River commission. I have faith in the members of that body as men, but I have no faith in them as a commission, and I think the gentleman will agree with me.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator's time is out.

Mr. VAN WYCK. One word more. ["No!"]

Mr. VEST. A single word in reply to the Senator from Nebraska, whose style of oratory I do not propose to emulate, nor his criticisms on the bill. The Senator speaks of raiders. He made a raid on the bill this morning with his colleague——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Will the Senator suspend one moment? The Chair does not know whether the rule adopted, like the Anthony rule, is that a Senator shall speak but once and for five minutes only.

Mr. MCMILLAN. That was expressed.

Mr. VEST. I yield to the chairman of the committee.

Mr. VAN WYCK. I trust unanimous consent will be given.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Five minutes are allowed to each Senator on each amendment.

Mr. VEST. The Senator from Nebraska speaks of raids and raiders. He made a raid on this bill this morning and undertook to divert $400,000 of the appropriation for the Missouri River to local appropriations for the State of Nebraska, and he was unsuccessful in it. The result is that the Senator now indulges in an extraordinary philippic and diatribe against the entire bill.

Mr. VAN WYCK. I say to the Senator that I shall probably not have an opportunity to answer him now, but I will do so on the next amendment.

Mr. VEST. The Senator can speak at any length, but, Mr. President, the Senator now attacks the Mississippi River commission and what he terms the scheme of the Mississippi River commission. It has been but a very few days since a separate bill passed the Senate with an appropriation of $5,000,000 for the Mississippi River and $1,000,000 for the Missouri, and that bill passed unanimously and received the support of the Senator from Nebraska, and the Senator was on the committee that reported it.

Now, when he answers me on the next amendment let him put that in with the balance of items in his reply. A change has come over the spirit of the Senator's dream as that which fell on Saul of Tarsus, as we read in Sacred Writ. He changed. When did the Mississippi River commission become so unreliable, when it has been barely two weeks since the Senator, so far from opposition on his part, with his indorsement and his report gave $5,000,000 to the Mississippi, to be expended ad libitum by the Mississippi River commission, according to their report and according to their plans.

Sir, I have nothing else to say in regard to it. If the Senate sees proper to load this bill down and destroy it, let it be done. There is no appropriation in it put on by me as a member of the Committee on Commerce in the interest of the State of Missouri or any portion of it. I only asked, as my colleagues on the committee will testify, that the increase should be upon the Mississippi and the Missouri Rivers and in and upon the Missouri River, in which the Senator from Nebraska is as much interested as myself, and his State as my State; all I asked was that that appropriation should be under the control of the board of engineers, without one word from me. I put in no appropriation; I took the bill as it came from the House; I asked nothing for any portion of the State of Missouri. I do ask now that this bill shall not be butchered here by putting on appropriation after appropriation until the great objects in the bill, the national objects of it, shall be loaded down and defeated.

Mr. SAUNDERS. I hope the commission will do justice to this appropriation and to the work proposed. I do not think I know any of the men that compose the commission; the only one I did know I understand has resigned; but one thing is strange to me. The very place where this commission should be posted, the very place where they should understand what they want to do, is the Mississippi, because they have given more attention to the Mississippi than they have to the Missouri River, as every Senator here knows. Now, on the Mississippi, as has been stated by my colleague, and as the bill shows for itself, point after point and place after place is named, and the amount fixed that shall be expended at each; but when it comes to the Missouri River, where they know nothing about it more than they do of the geography of the moon, we cannot get any place named; we must take our chances.

They say to us, "We, the commission of the Missouri River and the Mississippi River, will fix it to suit ourselves." I think it is a little strange that at the very place where they should be posted, and at the very place where they ought to understand the amount of work to be done, they are limited by this committee, and on the stream they do not know anything about we cannot have a place named in the bill. I must say that I am a little astonished at the action of this committee, and I am free to say it.

Mr. BUTLER. It is perfectly obvious that we are not going to get through with this bill to-night.

Mr. MCMILLAN. I think we can.

Mr. BUTLER. So it looks to me. We are going to stay here until the middle of August, and we might as well discuss this as anything else. I do not see any necessity of punishing ourselves in this hot weather. If the chairman of the committee will permit it, I will move an adjournment.

Mr. MCMILLAN. I hope the motion will not be made. If we are not ready to take the vote on this amendment, I shall move to lay it on the table, and any amendment offered to the bill I shall move to lay on the table hereafter.

Mr. BUTLER. After the bill gets out of Committee of the Whole, it will be open to amendment in the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator move an adjournment?

Mr. VAN WYCK. Let another amendment or two be acted on to-night.

Mr. BUTLER. I move that the Senate adjourn.

Mr. McMILLAN. I hope the Senate will vote down the motion. We can finish the bill soon.

The motion to adjourn was rejected.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Florida, [Mr. CALL.]

Mr. McMILLAN. I move to lay the amendment on the table.

Mr. JONES, of Florida. I hope at this late day no such motion as that will be made after the discussion here, particularly by the chairman of the committee.

Mr. McMILLAN. Is the motion debatable?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is not.

Mr. JONES, of Florida. The Senator from Minnesota took up a whole hour debating the Mississippi matter this morning. After that I do not think he should bring the previous question of the Senate to bear on my colleague.

Mr. McMILLAN. Is the Senator from Florida in order?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair recognizes him as begging the Senator from Minnesota to withdraw the motion.

Mr. JONES, of Florida. I will not beg; but having taking up so much time himself, I do not think the Senator ought to make the motion.

Mr. CALL. I submit to the Senator from Minnesota that it is not fair. I want to say something to the Senate upon this amendment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Minnesota insist upon his motion?

Mr. McMILLAN. I insist upon it.

Mr. INGALLS. It is evident that the merits of this bill are not definitely understood by the Senate, and that debate is far from being exhausted. In order to enable the Senator from Florida to submit what remarks he desires upon his amendment, I move that the bill be indefinitely postponed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. On that motion the Senator from Florida can be heard for five minutes.

Mr. CALL. Mr. President, the amendment, I will state to the Senate, is one that ought not to be objected to by the chairman of the committee. I have sustained the principle of the bill. I am in favor of appropriations for rivers and harbors and for the Mississippi River, not knowing that any question of the South or the North was involved in it. I have sustained the bill upon principle. I would not vote for a dollar in the bill if I did not believe that the commercial interests, foreign and interstate, demanded it. The Senator from Missouri can easily kill the bill by continuing the policy upon which its distribution of the appropriation is founded. Appropriations made without the sanction of the Department of Engineers, appropriations made without reference to the foreign commerce of the country, or the importance of the ports for which it is given; appropriations made for little streams, however worthy of improvement, for which $125,000 and $130,000 and $225,000 are appropriated in this bill by the committee, while the ports of the foreign and coastwise commerce of the country are put off with 10 per cent. of the estimates, and while the most important and the only easily accessible port on the South Atlantic coast as a harbor of refuge for the thousand million dollars of commerce going out and in, and that passes within sight of it every year, with $500,000 recommended by the engineers as the least available appropriation, is discriminated against in the bill and only 10 per cent. of the amount of the estimates allowed.

No Senator, no member of this committee, can give a sound or even plausible reason in defense of this distribution of the appropriation made by this bill. It has not even a plausible pretense of being in any way connected with the real interests of commerce either foreign or domestic.

Sir, there is no principle in such a bill. It is a simple giving from one to another without reference to the public interest and without reference to the authorized reports of the engineers. It would be a hardship upon the country to deprive the rivers and harbors of the country of the appropriations which ought to be made in the bill, but there can be no defense of the policy upon which the bill has been framed, and if it should fail for this reason the committee who reported it must bear the responsibility of the failure.

The facts are that the Chief Engineer has reported $500,000 as the least available sum for the port of Fernandina. Its intercourse with the ships of foreign nations and with the coastwise trade of this country is third and fourth to the most important ports, after New York, Baltimore, Philadelphia, Norfolk, Boston, Galveston, Charleston, Savannah, and New Orleans. More ships, both with cargoes and in ballast, some in distress and others sailing along the coast, are compelled to make a harbor for temporary purposes at Fernandina than any other port after those great places. The Chief of the Engineer Department has reported to Congress that the bar is being filled, becoming inaccessible to large ships, the fortifications there being encroached upon, and that $500,000 is the least available sum.

The chairman of the committee cannot deny these facts, and he cannot deny that the sum for Wilmington has been increased $125,000, over two-thirds the amount estimated for this year; and Galveston and all the ports upon the lakes have been largely increased, and the discrimination has been made against the estimates of the engineers in Florida by giving only 10 per cent. of the estimate in this instance.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator's time has expired.

Mr. INGALLS. The five-minute rule does not apply to the pending motion but only to amendments.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It applies to the whole bill.

Mr. McMILLAN. I understood it to apply to the whole bill.

Mr. INGALLS. I understood it to apply to amendments.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair decides from what he has learned (he was not here at the time) that it applies to the whole bill.

Mr. INGALLS. I appeal from the decision of the Chair, and I ask that the record be read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Kansas appeals from the decision of the Chair.

Mr. ROLLINS. The Senator from Iowa stated distinctly that it applied to the whole bill.

Mr. VAN WYCK. I trust unanimous consent will be given to the Senator from Florida to proceed.

Mr. ANTHONY. I think that if the Reporter will look at his notes——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. They have been sent for.

Mr. ANTHONY. They will show that this limitation of debate was applied to the whole bill.

Mr. INGALLS. The bill is not under discussion. It is a motion to indefinitely postpone the bill that we are discussing.

Mr. ANTHONY. That opens the whole subject for debate.

Mr. INGALLS. Certainly.

Mr. ANTHONY. The Senator from Iowa moved that the five-minute rule be applied to the pending amendment.

"The whole bill" was heard from various parts of the Senate, and the suggestion to include the whole bill was agreed to.

Mr. INGALLS. This is not the bill, but a motion to postpone indefinitely.

Mr. ANTHONY. That involves the whole bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. A motion to indefinitely postpone the bill involves the whole subject-matter.

Mr. CONGER. The rule says:

> And each Senator shall be entitled to speak once and for five minutes only upon any question.

It does not say upon laying on the table or postponing.

Mr. INGALLS. What rule does the Senator quote?

Mr. CONGER. The Anthony rule.

Mr. INGALLS. We are not acting under the Anthony rule.

Mr. CONGER. We are acting under the Anthony rule, I think.

Mr. INGALLS. I appeal from the Senator from Michigan. We are acting under a special motion, and not under the Anthony rule.

Mr. HARRIS. Was there an appeal from the decision of the Chair?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Yes, sir. The Senator from Kansas appealed from the decision of the Chair. Will the Reporter read what occurred?

Mr. MORGAN. I desire to say this: I was not in the Senate today when this rule was adopted; and it took me very much by surprise when I understood that the rule of five minutes' limitation of debate had been adopted. On coming into the Senate I saw some of my friends on the floor, and went to the chairman of the committee and suggested to him that perhaps it would not be fair to have this bill disposed of in this summary way. It is a bill that has too much importance attached to it, it is too new in many of its features for the country to be compelled to receive it under a cloture, something that shuts out any debate. I submit to the chairman of the committee if he wants his bill vindicated, if he wants the principle on which it rests fairly to go before the country, if he wants this new and enormous appropriation placed upon grounds that may justify it in the estimation of the people, it would be very well indeed to dispense with that rule.

I had prepared a few observations upon one point of the bill only, which perhaps would cover twenty minutes for their delivery; and in order that they might be as brief as possible I wrote them out. I would desire an opportunity to submit those remarks to the Senate when we get the bill into the Senate.

Every Senator here has a right to demand a separate vote in the Senate on each one of these amendments, and if your debate of five minutes applies to each one of the many amendments to this bill we can easily occupy time from now until to-morrow morning in debating it.

I think there are perhaps very few Senators who wish to make any general observations on this bill, and I think the committee would do itself justice and the Senate and the country justice by not compelling an application of the five-minute rule to general debate on the bill after it comes into the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the appeal from the decision of the Chair, that the five-minute rule applies to the motion of the Senator from Kansas.

Mr. INGALLS. Let us hear the agreement that was made read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Reporter will read his notes of what occurred in regard to the application of the five-minute rule.

Mr. T. F. SHUEY (assistant to the Official Reporter) read from his short-hand notes as follows:

> Mr. ALLISON. I ask unanimous consent to apply the five-minute rule to this proposition.
>
> Mr. FRYE and others. To the bill.
>
> Mr. ALLISON. I will say the bill.
>
> The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. FARLEY in the chair.) The Chair hears no objection.
> Mr. SHERMAN. Let it be announced from the Chair so that everybody will understand it.

Mr. ALLISON. I ask unanimous consent to apply the five-minute rule of debate to this bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The request has been made that the five-minute rule shall be enforced in the further discussion upon this bill. Is there objection?

Mr. ANTHONY. That involves the right of each Senator to speak but once, I understand?

Mr. ALLISON. Whatever the rule is.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair hears no objection, and it is so ordered.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Those who are in favor of the decision of the Chair standing, notwithstanding the appeal, will say "ay"——

Mr. CALL. I submit whether the rule of the Senate would not be abrogated as respects the members of the Senate not present by a suggestion of that character?

Mr. HARRIS. There is no question about that. Let this question be decided, and I think the Senator from Florida will have an opportunity to be heard.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Shall the decision of the Chair stand notwithstanding the appeal? [Putting the question.] The ayes have it, and the decision of the Chair stands as the judgment of the Senate.

Mr. HARRIS. I ask the unanimous consent of the Senate to hear the Senator from Florida.

Mr. McMILLAN. I am compelled to object, in order to get the bill disposed of.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the indefinite postponement of the bill. The Senator from Florida has spoken five minutes.

Mr. VAN WYCK. I desire to be heard just a moment on this matter.

Mr. ALDRICH. I rise to a question of order. Under the forty-third rule a motion to lay on the table takes precedence of a motion to indefinitely postpone.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The motion is to postpone indefinitely the whole bill.

Mr. ALDRICH. I understand that if a motion to indefinitely postpone could be made pending a motion to lay an amendment on the table, it would open the question for discussion, and the very object of the rule would be defeated. We might as well abolish the rule if, pending a motion to lay on the table, any Senator can make a motion to indefinitely postpone the bill and go on and discuss the question. I submit to Senators that the object of the rule was to cut off debate, otherwise there is no use in having a motion to lay on the table.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair sustains the point of order made by the Senator from Rhode Island.

Mr. INGALLS. That a motion to lay an amendment on the table takes precedence of a motion to indefinitely postpone the bill?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Yes, sir.

Mr. ALDRICH. There is no qualification of the rule.

Mr. INGALLS. My amazement is unbounded.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Minnesota to lay on the table the amendment of the Senator from Florida.

Mr. CALL. I rise to a question——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The motion is not debatable. [Putting the question.] The ayes seem to have it.

Mr. CALL. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Will not a division satisfy the Senator?

Mr. CALL. I think we ought to have the yeas and nays. I have stood by this bill.

The yeas and nays were ordered; and the Principal Legislative Clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. PLATT, (when his name was called.) I am paired with the Senator from North Carolina, [Mr. VANCE.]

The roll-call was concluded.

Mr. HAMPTON. My colleague [Mr. BUTLER] is paired with the Senator from Maine, [Mr. HALE.]

The result was announced—yeas 25, nays 33; as follows:

YEAS—25.

Aldrich,	Farley,	Mahone,	Saulsbury,
Allison,	Frye,	Maxey,	Sawyer,
Anthony,	Hawley,	Miller of Cal.,	Vest,
Cameron of Wis.,	Hill of Colorado,	Miller of N. Y.,	Windom.

So the motion to lay the amendment on the table was not agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question recurs on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Florida.

Mr. CALL. Mr. President——

Mr. VAN WYCK. I desire to say just a few words on this question.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Florida has the floor.

Mr. INGALLS. What became of my motion to indefinitely postpone the bill?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That motion is now in order if the Senator insists upon it. The Chair decided, whether right or wrong, that a motion to lay the amendment on the table takes precedence of a motion to indefinitely postpone. The motion of the Senator from Kansas is now before the Senate, and the question is on the indefinite postponement of the bill.

Mr. INGALLS. I withdraw it now.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The motion to postpone the bill indefinitely is withdrawn, and the question recurs on the adoption of the amendment of the Senator from Florida, [Mr. CALL,] upon which the Senator from Florida has the floor.

Mr. McMILLAN. The Senator from Florida has spoken once.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. On this amendment?

Mr. McMILLAN. Yes, sir.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Florida rose to speak on the amendment, but was cut off by a motion, the Chair understood.

Mr. McMILLAN. He spoke five minutes; his time expired; and afterward I interposed the motion to lay the amendment on the table.

Mr. CALL. I move to strike out the last word of the amendment, if that is in order.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator may make a motion to postpone the bill and speak upon that. To move to strike out the last word of the amendment the Chair thinks is an evasion.

Mr. CALL. I move to strike out the enacting clause of the bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That is allowable. The Senator from Florida is entitled to speak for five minutes upon that motion.

Mr. CALL. Mr. President, I will say a very few words more on this amendment. I wish to call the attention of the Senate to the fact that not one single reason has been given against the adoption of the amendment. The Senator from Missouri speaks of the bill being loaded down. I wish he would tell me how an argument can be made against any measure upon such a fact.

The question is, will it promote the public interest, will it advantage the commerce of the United States? If so, whether it loads the bill down or not, unless it is beyond the means of the country, it ought to be adopted. I have this to say, that if the bill be loaded down by unjust discriminations against meritorious improvements it ought to be loaded down by putting meritorious improvements upon it.

I say that in all these suggestions there has not been one reasonable objection made in opposition to this amendment.

It is not denied that the commerce of this port is the commerce of the whole country, not of the South, not of Florida. It is not denied that its improvement is indispensable to the safety of the commerce of the country, of New York, of Chicago, of the Mississippi River. Will the Senator from Missouri say that the $7,000,000 which this bill contains for the Mississippi River and its tributaries and incidents will be of any advantage unless there are harbors upon the Gulf and the Atlantic coast in which the ships that carry the commerce which it brings to the ocean are to find refuge and protection?

No one has answered those facts. Does the chairman of the committee or any member of the committee deny that this port has only 10 per cent. of the estimate of the chief engineer, and that the chief engineer certifies that there is no more necessary and essential port for the entrance of ships, foreign and domestic, that come upon the South Atlantic coast than the port of Fernandina? There has not been a single reason given why the amendment should not be adopted, and I say to the Senate that it is not right, that it is not fair, that it is not just to the country that the amendment should be denied.

Mr. VAN WYCK. I should like to say a word on the motion of the Senator from Florida to strike out the enacting clause.

Mr. McMILLAN. I think the Senator from Nebraska has spoken once.

Mr. VAN WYCK. Not on the motion to strike out the enacting clause.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Nebraska has not spoken on the pending question, which is to strike out the enacting clause of the bill.

Mr. VAN WYCK. I trust the chairman of the Committee on Commerce will not get nervous just now, because I am inclined to think the Senator from Florida presented some considerations of public benefit which were not presented to or listened to by any members of the Committee on Commerce.

I should like to say just one word in regard to the Mississippi appropriation, to which my amiable friend from Missouri very properly referred, as to my course in the committee of which I have the honor to be a member together with himself. I did vote for that proposition. I differed, however, with some members of the committee, as I think the chairman of the committee will bear me testimony, as to the disposition of the money, which is what I am talking about.

I said these gentlemen will probably bury this money, a good deal of it, on the banks of the Mississippi, and I did differ with Senators in committee as to how the money should be appropriated. While I did vote for the appropriation, I believed it was the duty of this Government to protect the citizens along its banks from the ravages of that stream, and I was in favor of a proposition to protect them. I believe the Government is bound to protect the Upper Mississippi and the Upper Missouri from the ravages of those streams, and the committee has not done it.

My idea is that we have absolute control of these waters. The citizens of Omaha and the citizens of Council Bluffs desire to build a wagon bridge across the Mississippi and they cannot do it. They have to come to Congress by petition and ask the power of Congress to allow them to build a bridge across the Missouri. So absolute is the control and jurisdiction of this Government over these water-courses that the citizens there are not allowed to build a wagon-bridge across that stream, and that bill and the petitions are referred to your Committee on Commerce, and there they sleep. Such is the power of the Government, and hence when the Government exercises control over its water-courses, it belongs to the Government to protect the citizen from their ravages and from their destruction. That was my idea in the committee under which I voted assent to the appropriation of millions for the Mississippi River, and I am in favor of that protection now. But when gentlemen pretend that the expenditure of this money in building up artificial banks upon the sides of the Missouri and Mississippi Rivers will hold the channel within bounds my own judgment has been that it will never do it. The larger proportion of the money that is expended will be a failure. Hence it was that I said you would bury it upon the banks of the Mississippi and the Missouri. I trust that I have made myself plain to Senators.

I have no disposition to criticise the members of the committee in regard to the bill. They undertook to arraign me and the majority of the Senate for the votes we chose to give. Is the committee supreme over us as the Government is over the great waters, that we should be arraigned and chastised, if you please, by that amiable committee because a majority of this body chose to put an amendment in the bill which they did not deem worthy of their attention? That was my position on this matter. I did not like at this time to be subject to an arraignment of that kind, and I did not propose to be so arraigned. Hence it was that I explained how this money had been appropriated along the Mississippi River, and as I told my friends when they said this bill was loaded, that I would try to load it on even balance and load it so as to go through. The committee do not seem to appreciate the motive of gentlemen who are seeking to do good.

Mr. JONES, of Florida. Mr. President, there is one principle which has been announced in reference to this bill that I propose to repudiate in my place in the Senate. It is that the amount of money appropriated by the bill is to be regarded as a fund to be divided among the States. I am not influenced in the vote I give here by the smallness of my State, the number of its people, the taxes it pays, or anything of that kind, because I ignore Florida as a State in this matter. We are not here to divide the public money between the States. We are here to consider their ports as ports of the United States. It is under Federal law that every port exists and that its commerce is protected. If I can show that we have fifty harbors in Florida that are entitled to appropriations of public money because of the importance they bear to the commerce of the country, without regard to the population or the wealth of that State, I claim that I am entitled to appropriations for them. It is upon that principle that I uphold this amendment.

I say that the case of Fernandina stands as an exception to every one on the record; that while the Chief of Engineers of the Government states that in his judgment the interests, not of Florida, not of Carolina, not of New York, but the interests of the Union require that $500,000 shall be appropriated, 10 per cent. of that amount is given, while the lowest percentage given in any other case is 40. Justify it if you can.

Mr. McMILLAN. What amount of import dues was received at that port?

Mr. JONES, of Florida. I have not calculated the import dues; I have calculated the tonnage.

Mr. McMILLAN. There was $7,000.

Mr. JONES, of Florida. We may have very small customs dues and we may have quite a large number of vessels. We have got a tonnage approximating to Charleston. The man who owns a ship worth $1,000 has as much right to go into a harbor as the man who owns a ship worth a hundred thousand dollars. It is not to be estimated by the imports or exports, but the fairest test that you can apply to cases of this kind is the tonnage of the port. That is the test which has been given by the Chief of Engineers.

What is the tonnage of Fernandina? Wilmington, North Carolina, has a tonnage of 227,202 tons; Charleston, 511,109 tons; Savannah, 626,829 tons; Fernandina, 300,642 tons. Is there anything in that difference to make her get but 10 per cent.? Mobile has a tonnage of 87,422 tons; quite a city. Galveston has 530,332 tons. Just look at the amount of the appropriations for those places. Three hundred thousand dollars, $400,000, and you come down to Fernandina, and in the face of the report of the engineers saying the interests of the Union require $500,000 to be spent at that port, $50,000 is given, and it is said "it is Florida." It is not Florida; it is the interest of the people of the United States. It is upon that ground I put it, and it is upon that ground I shall vote for it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Florida, [Mr. CALL,] to strike out the enacting clause of the bill.

Mr. CALL. I withdraw that motion.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The motion to strike out the enacting clause is withdrawn. Then the question recurs on the amendment of the Senator from Florida, [Mr. CALL,] to increase the appropriation for Cumberland Sound from $50,000 to $100,000.

Mr. CONGER. I desire to say a word on this amendment. I think the Senate should understand what this proposition is, that we may vote advisedly upon it. The proposition here has no special relation to Fernandina as a port of entry alone. It is not mentioned in that connection at all. This proposition and the estimate for it is to improve the entrance to Cumberland Sound; a work that will cost something over $2,000,000, according to the estimates; a work on which there is now, or was the 1st of July last, $184,000 unexpended; a work which requires, to improve that great channel several miles wide between the head of Amelia Island and Cumberland Island, many years to complete from the very nature and character of the work. The improvement is to be made by sinking mattresses either of logs or brush, or something of that kind, from the lower end of Cumberland Island out toward the ocean on the shoal, and loading them with stone and allowing the sand drift to cover up against them, and through them to make an artificial island.

As the engineer says, if the Government shall conclude to make such an artificial island or jetty on the south part which would reach Amelia Island in the neighborhood of Fernandina, then the same process will be followed to carry out from Amelia Island to intersect it, and finally to run parallel with it another such improvement. The estimate on which it is supposed $500,000 may be expended is not for Fernandina; it is for the improvement of the entrance to that inner channel of communication between the Cumberland Island and outlet from there to the ocean.

Mr. CALL. Mr. President——

Mr. CONGER. I have only five minutes. There is no interior navigation now between Amelia Island and the main shore which is of any value whatever. That is this improvement, and the amount recommended is for that improvement and not for Fernandina.

Mr. CALL. Will the Senator allow me to interrupt him?

Mr. CONGER. Not at this moment; I have only five minutes. That is the character of improvement for which this amendment is moved. The gentlemen from Florida went before the House committee, and there got a very large appropriation for Saint John's River, and the engineers recommended a large appropriation for Saint John's River, which is some twenty miles south, an appropriation much larger than the proportion, with the understanding that this work which the Government has entered upon, and which it will continue as the engineers say from year to year, as they see the best mode of carrying it on and the probability of its success. That work has received this appropriation.

It could not possibly do in any such bill, after submitting the matter to the committee of the House and the action of the House, and to the committee of the Senate, for Senators to come in here and claim the whole of an estimate or a larger proportion of the estimates than the committees allow to other places. If it did, then it is better for us all to wait with the public works we are interested in until the committee has reported, and then come in and ask all, or as large as can be gotten. No bill ever did and no bill ever can pass with that method of making appropriations. For the harbor of Pensacola there would be appropriated from $40,000 to $100,000. It is a perfect example of this mode of coming in and claiming the whole.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator's time is up.

Mr. CALL. I ask unanimous consent to say one word only. I am not going to make a speech.

Mr. McMILLAN. I cannot consent.

Mr. CALL. Then I move to strike out the enacting clause. I only want to say——

Mr. McMILLAN. What is the motion before the Senate?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Florida moves to strike out the enacting clause of the bill.

Mr. CALL. I wish to say just one word. The Senator from Michigan is entirely mistaken and without any warrant for what he states in regard to the Senators from Florida being before the House committee. I never made any such suggestion either to the committee of the House or the committee of the Senate. I think both of these appropriations are right, and I ask them upon the estimate of the engineers. The Senator from Michigan is entirely wrong in stating that there is any difference between an appropriation for Fernandina and Cumberland Sound. They are the same.

Mr. CONGER. There is my answer, in this volume of reports.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Florida.

Mr. CALL. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered; and being taken, resulted—yeas 18, nays 32; as follows:

YEAS—18.

Brown,	Garland,	Jones of Florida,	Sewell,
Call,	Hampton,	Mitchell,	Van Wyck,
Cameron of Pa.,	Harris,	Morgan,	Walker.
Davis of Illinois,	Ingalls,	Plumb,
Frye,	Jackson,	Saunders,

NAYS—32.

Aldrich,	Coke,	Hill of Colorado,	Pendleton,
Allison,	Conger,	Lapham,	Ransom,
Anthony,	Davis of W. Va.,	McDill,	Rollins,
Bayard,	Farley,	McMillan,	Sawyer,
Blair,	Ferry,	Mahone,	Slater,
Cameron of Wis.,	Gorman,	Maxey,	Vest,
Chilcott,	Harrison,	Miller of N. Y.,	Williams,
Cockrell,	Hawley,	Morrill,	Windom.

ABSENT—26.

Beck,	Groome,	Jones of Nevada,	Pugh,
Butler,	Grover,	Kellogg,	Saulsbury,
Camden,	Hale,	Lamar,	Sherman,
Dawes,	Hill of Georgia,	Logan,	Vance,
Edmunds,	Hoar,	McPherson,	Voorhees.
Fair,	Johnston,	Miller of Cal.
George,	Jonas,	Platt,

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. HARRIS. In order to test the sense of the Senate I move to indefinitely postpone the bill; and I ask for the yeas and nays upon the motion.

Mr. MORGAN. I think the bill ought not to be indefinitely postponed. We have got to pass some bill.

Mr. PLUMB. I move that the Senate do now adjourn.

Mr. HARRIS. I am so urged by Senators all around me to withdraw the motion that I shall not insist upon it. I withdraw the motion.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The motion to indefinitely postpone is withdrawn.

Mr. PLUMB, (at six o'clock and thirty-five minutes p. m.) I move that the Senate adjourn.

Mr. McMILLAN. I hope the Senator will not insist on that motion. We can finish this bill to-night.

Mr. BROWN. Mr. President——

Mr. PLUMB. I will waive the motion for a moment, in order that the Senator from Georgia may be heard.

Mr. BROWN. I have not taken the time of the Senate one moment——

Mr. PLUMB. I supposed the Senator from Georgia intended to offer an amendment to an appropriation bill. It seems he has risen for some other purpose, and I insist on my motion to adjourn.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Kansas, that the Senate adjourn.

The Senate refused to adjourn; there being on a division—ayes 20, noes 27.

Mr. BROWN. I have one very small amendment which is the only one I propose to make. In line 1015 I move to strike out "ten" and insert "fifteen." It is the appropriation that is made to widen the channel through Romley Marsh, the inland channel between Savannah and Jackson, off the coast of Georgia.

There is a regular line of steamers running off that coast, and whenever the tide is out and a steamer is caught there it has to lay several hours until the tide rises before it can pass through. Northern people going to Florida pass through that inland channel, and the Northern and Southern people suffer great inconvenience from it. The engineers estimate for $31,700. The bill as it now stands gives $10,000. Being in the marsh where the tide goes back and forth, it would take three or four years in cleaning it out, it filling up as cleaned.

Mr. RANSOM. I hope the amendment will be adopted; it is a small matter.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CONGER. I wish to make a remark in regard to the amendment of the Senator from Georgia.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is adopted.

Mr. CONGER. It is adopted, but the name of the place in the report of the engineers is called "Romerly Marshes," and in the bill it is called "Romley Marsh." I suggest that the name in the bill be the same as in the engineer's report.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That will be understood.

Mr. BROWN. The name is correct in the bill.

Mr. MILLER, of New York. I desire to make a correction in line 84. I move to amend by striking out in that line, after "improvement," the words "by removal of sunken rock;" so as to read:

Improving harbor at Port Chester, New York: Continuing improvement, $15,000.

This amendment was agreed to in the Committee on Commerce, but was omitted by a mistake in printing the bill.

Mr. CONGER. That amendment was agreed to in committee, but did not happen to be printed.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MILLER, of New York. In line 73 I move to increase the appropriation for "improving harbor at New Rochelle, New York, continuing improvement," from $10,000 to $15,000. Permit me to say that that was presented to the committee and agreed to, but was temporarily passed over. I went away before the bill was reported, and it was a mistake in not reporting it as an amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. RANSOM. I offer a little amendment. If there is any objection to it in the world I shall not press it. I move to add, after line 544:

For the improvement of Harlow River and Newport River, North Carolina, on the line of navigation from New Berne to Beaufort Harbor, $10,000.

Mr. PLUMB. If there is any other Senator who has not anything on the bill, I hope his amendment will come in, so that the division may be made approximately correct to all of us.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from North Carolina.

Mr. CALL. Mr. President——

Mr. RANSOM. The Senator from Florida does not know that I have an amendment pending?

Mr. CALL. Yes, I do. The Senator from North Carolina has $422,000 upon this bill, and he reported against giving 20 per cent. to the most important port upon the Gulf and the Atlantic Ocean. When the estimate of the chief engineer was only $300,000 he increased the estimate $125,000 while refusing one of the most important ports of commerce of the United States by the report of the chief engineer more than 10 per cent. of his estimate. I do not know if he will make out a good case, because I vote upon principle for the advantage of the whole commerce of the United States, and as a Senator of the United States, careless whether it is $30,000,000 or $50,000,000 that is necessary for the foreign and interstate commerce of this country. If the Senator will make out a good case for his little town of Beaufort I will vote for it, but I want the attention of the Senate called to the fact that this is a bill of unjust and wrongful distribution of the public money.

Mr. RANSOM. Question.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from North Carolina.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. PLUMB. At the end of the bill, I move to add as additional sections the following:

SEC. —. That John Cowdon, with such others as may be associated with him and his and their assigns, be, and he and they are hereby, authorized, on the conditions and terms herein set forth, to construct an outlet for the flood-waters of the Mississippi River from a point about ten miles below the city of New Orleans to Lake Borgne, on such lands as they or any of them may now own or may hereafter acquire, such outlet to be not less than one-half mile in width and of sufficient capacity to discharge, when the Mississippi River is at its greatest height, at least two hundred thousand cubic feet per second, and the outlet to be provided with proper levees or embankments to preserve the lands above and below it from inundation.

SEC. —. That as compensation for the land acquired and used for the construction of said outlet, and for the work, and labor, and expense of constructing said outlet, the said John Cowdon, his associates and assigns, shall receive from the United States, and shall be paid by the Secretary of War, the sum of $1,000,000: Provided, That the flood-line of the Mississippi River be lowered four feet at New Orleans within the first sixty days after the outlet may be made; this to be determined by reference to the stage of the water on the water-guages kept by the Government at or near that city. Notes to be taken just before the outlet may be opened and any time within sixty days thereafter.

SEC. —. That when said outlet is made, if it shall be found that the flood-waters of the Mississippi River have been further lowered thereby, the said John Cowdon, his associates and assigns, shall be entitled to be paid the sum of $250,000 for each and every foot that said waters may be lowered from the highest known water-mark, on an average at New Orleans, Bayou Sara, Natchez, Vicksburgh, the mouth of White River, and Memphis, within the two first high-water periods, one of which periods to be by which the outlet is made, and the other the first after said outlet is made; the fact of the lowering of said river from high-water mark to be determined by a board of engineers consisting of five persons, to be appointed by the Secretary of War. The report of said board, or a majority of them, to the Secretary of War, of the actual number of feet that the average flood-line of said river at said points has been lowered from the said highest known water mark shall be conclusive evidence of the fact; and it shall be the duty of the Secretary of War, upon the filing of the report of said commissioners in his office, to issue to said John Cowdon, his associates and assigns, his warrant upon the Treasurer of the United States for the amount of money so found due them, or this may be determined by reference to the published report of the Government water-guages kept at the above-named points.

SEC. —. That the said outlet when complete, so far as the same may be utilized for navigation, shall be free as a channel for the use of any steamboats or other water-craft of any kind that may choose to pass through the same.

I am not tenacious of the terms of this amendment. It is offered in its present terms because it had been submitted by the Senator from Texas [Mr. COKE] and referred to the committee, and so I think avoids the point of order. I desire to say now——

Mr. McMILLAN. I rise to a point of order.

Mr. PLUMB. I have the floor, I thank the Senator.

Mr. McMILLAN. I rise to a point of order.

Mr. PLUMB. I think I cannot be taken from the floor by a point of order.

Mr. McMILLAN. I rise to a point of order.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Minnesota will state his point of order.

Mr. McMILLAN. I object to this amendment, that it is not in order, because there has been no estimate for this improvement or any recommendation from any Department, and it is new legislation.

Mr. PLUMB. It was offered by the Senator from Texas as an amendment to this bill and referred to the Committee on Commerce within the time required by the rule.

Mr. McMILLAN. There is no estimate for the improvement.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The point of order takes precedence of everything else. This is general legislation.

Mr. PLUMB. Is the Senator from Minnesota entitled to take me off my feet on a point of order?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator rises to a point of order, and by the parliamentary rule the point of order has precedence. This is general legislation and is forbidden. That is the ground upon which the Chair decides that the amendment is not in order.

Mr. PLUMB. I move to strike out line 1331, and upon that question I wish to say——

Mr. ALLISON. Let it be read.

The ACTING SECRETARY. It is proposed to strike out line 1331, in the following words:

Harbor at Cedar Keys, Florida.

Mr. PLUMB. I think the Senator from Florida will not take offense at that, because I shall probably oppose it myself before I get through.

I desire to say that the general proposition which we have proceeded upon in this bill is to carry out the theory upon which the channel of the Mississippi was closed by the Eads jetties. In other words, we made the mouth of the Mississippi River a funnel and we are pouring into that funnel about five or six times as much water as the mouth will carry out. In so doing we are submerging the lands that lie above, we are increasing the height of the natural channel of the river, and compelling this Government in point of fact to create levees along the bank of that stream. While the effect of that is not going to be so immediate as some might suppose, within a short period of time, calculating the life of this country as the life of a nation, we shall be compelled to constantly increase the embankment of that stream in order to prevent the overflow which we have invited by a contraction of the mouth of the stream. Sooner or later we shall be compelled, as something which will be required of us to meet an emergency, to make an artificial outlet for the waters of the Mississippi River.

I desire to put that simply upon record as my opinion, as the opinion of a layman upon that subject.

I want to say further in regard to this bill generally that I shall vote against it. I have voted for every proposition to enlarge it. I desired to make the dose just as much as I thought the stomach of the American people would contain, and a little more, in order that next year when we come to consider this measure we may come to our senses. We appropriate five, ten, or fifteen thousand dollars each for little harbors upon six or seven thousand miles of coast. The sand we take out this year is washed back during the winter and spring, and the necessity of the appropriation is just as evident next year as it was last year, and the accomplishment by the appropriation is just the same as that which resulted from the previous appropriation, and no more.

If we could have a river and harbor bill which required the completion of improvements and inaugurated only such improvements as could be completed by a continuous expenditure of money, and no others to be undertaken until those were completed, we should do the sensible thing. Twenty-five per cent. at least of this bill is absolutely thrown away, as much as though it were put into a sack and pitched into the Atlantic Ocean. It is kept up for the purpose of promoting local interests and keeping the clam-eaters along our coast line in place, and we are doing the unwise, the impolitic, the extravagant, the outrageous thing.

I withdraw the amendment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment is withdrawn. If there are no further amendments as in Committee of the Whole, the bill will be reported to the Senate.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Will any Senator specify an amendment upon which he wishes a separate vote?

Mr. PLUMB. I desire to reserve the amendment of the Senator from Vermont [Mr. MORRILL] for a separate vote.

Mr. HARRIS. The amendment of the Senator from Vermont was not adopted in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. PLUMB. Then I give notice that I shall renew the amendment in the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That the Senator can do.

Mr. CALL. I desire to offer an amendment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. After the vote is taken upon concurring in the amendments made as in Committee of the Whole further amendments may be offered.

Mr. PENDLETON. In line 1075 the word "locate" was inserted as in Committee of the Whole, which I wish to have stricken out. I moved to strike it out, but it was ruled to be out of order upon the ground that it had been inserted as in Committee of the Whole. I desire so much of the amendment then made retained for a separate vote as will allow me to test that matter.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Ohio will allow the Chair to suggest that every amendment made as in Committee of the Whole has to be voted on first, and after those votes are taken the Senator can move to strike out the word "locate."

Mr. PENDLETON. I simply desired to reserve my right to do that.

Mr. HARRIS. The Senator from Ohio reserves that amendment in order that he may amend it before it is voted upon.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That he can do.

Mr. HARRIS. Let all the other amendments be acted on and that reserved.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That amendment, being the amendment in relation to the Hennepin Canal, will be reserved.

Mr. MORGAN. I desire to make an inquiry of the Chair. As I read Rule 26, all amendments to the bill which have been adopted as in Committee of the Whole must be acted upon in the Senate one after the other, unless the Senate unanimously consents that the amendments shall be adopted in gross, and when a proposition for unanimous consent is made then it is for a Senator to say whether he wants to make an exception.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will state what is the usual custom.

Mr. MORGAN. I know the custom.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The usual custom, and that is all the Chair knows anything about, is that each Senator specifies the amendments upon which he desires a separate vote, and then the question is taken on concurring in gross in the amendments on which no separate vote is asked.

Mr. MORGAN. The comment of the Manual, if the Chair will allow me to call attention to it, on page 276, on the twenty-sixth rule, is as follows:

The bill is then before them as it would have been if reported from a committee, and questions are regularly to be put again on every amendment, which being gone through, the President pauses to give time to the House to propose amendments, &c.

Therefore I insist that whatever the custom may have been the rule is that when the bill comes out of committee and enters the Senate the question then is upon each of the amendments that have been passed upon; and they are to be concurred in each separately. Now, I do not wish——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If the Senator insists upon that technicality of the rule, of course it can be done. It never is done. Any Senator who wants a separate vote upon a particular amendment can have it taken; but it would take such a long time to have a separate vote upon all the amendments that it is never required.

Mr. MORGAN. I understand that.

Mr. FERRY. What rule does the Senator read?

Mr. MORGAN. Rule 26.

Mr. HARRIS. There can be no doubt about the fact that any Senator has a right to demand a separate vote upon every amendment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Of course he has that right.

Mr. HARRIS. If the Senator from Alabama demands a separate vote, that settles the question.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Of course it does. The Chair understands that.

Mr. MORGAN. I have neither done that nor have I resorted nor intended to resort to any technical obstruction of this bill. I merely wanted to have an understanding of the rule and of the time necessary to make the reservation.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator ought to make the reservation when it is asked if any Senator desires a separate vote on a particular amendment.

Mr. MORGAN. I distinctly stated that I rose to make a parliamentary inquiry of the Chair, not to make a proposition, obstruction, or objection.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator desire a separate vote?

Mr. MORGAN. I do at the proper time.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Now is the proper time.

Mr. INGALLS. This bill appropriates an unknown sum of money. The condition of the amendments is intricate and obscure. I venture to say that no Senator can state what additions have been made to the bill in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. McMILLAN. I can answer the Senator.

Mr. INGALLS. I think it is essential to the public welfare that the subject should be thoroughly ventilated, and that the country should know what action has been taken in Committee of the Whole, and I shall ask that the amendments may be separately reported to the Senate.

Mr. McMILLAN. So far as regards the statement of the Senator that no person can tell the present status of the bill or the amount appropriated in Committee of the Whole, he is mistaken.

Mr. INGALLS. The bill is the annual shame and scandal and disgrace of American legislation.

Mr. McMILLAN. Have I the floor, Mr. President?

Mr. INGALLS. The oftener that is said and the plainer it is stated, the better it will be for the Congress of the United States.

Mr. McMILLAN. Upon that question there is a difference of opinion.

Mr. INGALLS. None whatever.

Mr. McMILLAN. The Senator assumes that fact and the people will determine it. So far as the statement of the Senator in reference to the amount of the bill is concerned, he is mistaken. I can give it. The present amount of the bill is $20,247,575, and all the items of addition I have before me with the particular amounts, which I can read if the Senator desires.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. How much?

Mr. McMILLAN. Seven hundred and sixty-three thousand six hundred dollars.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Kansas says he will insist upon every amendment being voted upon separately on the question of concurring. The Chair informs the Senate that it will take pretty nearly till midnight to do that.

Mr. HARRIS. Does the Senator from Kansas demand a separate vote upon each and every amendment in the bill?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. He does.

Mr. RANSOM. Will the chairman of the committee hear me a second?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Tennessee [Mr. HARRIS] had the floor and made an inquiry of the Senator from Kansas.

Mr. HARRIS. I was simply asking if the Senator from Kansas demanded a separate vote upon each and every amendment in the bill?

Mr. INGALLS. I do, sir.

Mr. RANSOM. Now, let me say one word, and I hope to have the attention of the chairman of the committee. I understand, I think—and if I am mistaken about it I know Senators will correct me—that gentlemen this evening, especially my friend from Alabama and my friend from Kansas, desire an adjournment, and that this objection of theirs indicates their purpose to have an adjournment. Anxious as I am to have this bill finished this evening, (and no person can be more anxious,) when I see Senators manifest opposition in that way, I think the Senator from Minnesota, who has charge of the bill, had better consent to an adjournment, and move it himself, and then to-morrow, when we take up the bill, dispose of it. I have heard that suggestion expressed by so many gentlemen around me, that I think some deference should be shown to it. I hope the chairman will make the motion.

Mr. McMILLAN. I am willing to remain here and discuss this bill and vote upon every amendment, and under the circumstances I shall ask the Senate to proceed with the bill. So far as general debate on the bill is concerned, if there are gentlemen who desire any further extension of time than the five minutes, if unanimous consent is asked I do not know that I shall interpose any objection.

Mr. INGALLS. Mr. President, I move that the Senate do now adjourn.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Kansas moves that the Senate adjourn.

Mr. SAUNDERS. I ask that the unfinished business be laid before the Senate.

Mr. McMILLAN. I ask for the yeas and nays on the motion to adjourn.

PRESIDENTIAL APPROVALS.

A message from the President of the United States, by Mr. O. L. PRUDEN, one of his Secretaries, announced that the President had on the 8th instant approved and signed the following acts:

An act (S. No. 121) to authorize the construction of a railroad bridge across the Sainte Marie River; and

An act (S. No. 2033) to authorize the sale of certain lots in the city of Hot Springs, Arkansas, to the Woman's Christian National Library Association;

And that he had on the 10th instant approved and signed the act (S. That he had on this day approved and signed the act (S. No. 1825) making appropriation for the purpose of macadamizing a road from the city of New Albany, in the State of Indiana, to the national cemetery near said city.

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. MCPHERSON, its Clerk, announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the enrolled bill (H. R. AMENDMENTS TO BILLS.

Mr. FERRY, Mr. PLUMB, and Mr. VOORHEES submitted amendments intended to be proposed by them to the bill (H. R. No. 6716) making appropriations for sundry civil expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1883, and for other purposes; which were referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. MILLER, of New York, submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the bill (H. R. No. 5538) to reduce internal-revenue taxation; which was referred to the Committee on Finance, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. VANCE and Mr. VEST submitted amendments intended to be proposed by them respectively to the bill (H. R. No. 5538) to reduce internal-revenue taxation; which were ordered to lie on the table, and be printed.

Mr. SAUNDERS. On the 8th instant I proposed an amendment to the bill (H. R. No. 6616) making appropriations for the naval service for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1883, and for other purposes, which by mistake was referred to the Committee on Appropriations. I submit a similar amendment, which I move be referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs, and printed.

The motion was agreed to.

TERRITORY OF PEMBINA.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will lay before the Senate the unfinished business, which is the bill (S. No. 2114) establishing the Territory of Pembina and providing a temporary government therefor.

Mr. McMILLAN. I ask for the yeas and nays on the motion to adjourn.

The yeas and nays were ordered; and being taken, resulted—yeas 28, nays 25; as follows:

YEAS—28.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

TUESDAY, July 11, 1882.

The House met at eleven o'clock a. m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. F. D. POWER.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. HISCOCK. I call for the regular order.

The SPEAKER. The regular order is the call of committees for reports.

Mr. KELLEY. I desire to make three reports from the Committee on Ways and Means, but if we are to have a morning hour that will cover my case.

Mr. HISCOCK. I move to dispense with the morning hour.

Mr. KELLEY. Before the gentleman presses that motion I ask him to allow me to submit three reports from the Committee on Ways and Means.

The SPEAKER. The Chair cannot recognize that request if the motion of the gentleman from New York is insisted upon.

Mr. HISCOCK. I think I ought to consent to let these reports come in from the Committee on Ways and Means.

A MEMBER. There are a great many other reports.

Mr. HISCOCK. I am told that there are a great many more reports which gentlemen would like to present. That being the case, I must insist on my motion.

The motion was agreed to, two-thirds voting in favor thereof.

SUNDRY CIVIL APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. HISCOCK. I now move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the sundry civil appropriation bill.

The motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, Mr. KASSON in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is now in Committee of the Whole for the further consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 6716) making appropriations for the sundry civil expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1883, and for other purposes.

Mr. ANDERSON. I desire now to submit the amendment of which I gave notice yesterday, with a modification by inserting after the word "survey" the words "and by the further sum of $5,000."

The CHAIRMAN. The amendment will be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 60, after the word "lines," in line 1448, insert:

"Provided, That in the event of the repayment to the United States of moneys advanced and expended by it in surveying and selecting public lands granted to certain railroad companies under 'an act to aid in the construction of a railroad and telegraph line from the Missouri River to the Pacific Ocean,' &c., approved July 1, 1862, and the act amendatory thereof, approved July 2, 1864, the said companies or parties in interest being by such acts required to pay 'into the Treasury of the United States the cost of surveying, selecting, and conveying' lands so granted, then and in that event such sums to be paid into the Treasury shall, without further appropriation, be used for surveying the public lands; and in this latter event, but not otherwise, the sum of $400,000 herein appropriated shall be diminished by the aggregate sum so paid into the Treasury and so used for the public survey, and by the further sum of $5,000.

"And the Kansas Pacific Railway Company, or its assigns, shall forthwith pay into the Treasury of the United States all the cost, as determined by the Secretary of the Interior, of surveying, selecting, and conveying public lands granted to it by said acts and situated either in the State of Kansas or in legally organized counties of the State of Colorado, and upon which such costs shall not have been already paid. And in the event that any such costs shall remain unpaid on the 1st day of October, 1882, the Attorney-General of the United States is hereby authorized and directed to institute forthwith, in the name of the United States of America, in the circuit court of the United States for the district in which the tract or parcels of land are situated upon which such costs remain unpaid, any and all proceedings against said company or party in interest that he may deem necessary and proper and that can be maintained to secure the prompt payment of such unpaid costs and of the further cost of all such legal proceedings."

Mr. HISCOCK. I reserve a point of order on this amendment. I desire to inquire of the gentleman at what line he proposes to insert this?

Mr. ANDERSON. After the word "lines," in line 1448.

Mr. HISCOCK. If it is to come in at all it would be more properly inserted at the close of line 1475.

Mr. ANDERSON. Very well; I modify my motion so as to move that these words be inserted after line 1475.

Mr. RYAN. I suggest that my colleague [Mr. ANDERSON] withhold his amendment until the section is perfected. There are some amendments——

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is not aware of any amendment pending. One was offered by the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. ATKINS] touching the rates to be paid, but was withdrawn.

Mr. ATKINS. I tacitly agreed yesterday with the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. ANDERSON] to waive my amendment and let his be offered.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is upon the point of order.

Mr. HISCOCK. I wish to inquire of the gentleman from Kansas whether this same proposition is now pending before the House and being considered by any committee.

Mr. ANDERSON. No, sir. The state of the case is this—and I am addressing myself to the point of order—I hold in my hand all the bills which refer to this subject. The first is bill No. 345, which was introduced by me and referred to the Committee on Pacific Railroads.

Mr. HISCOCK. I withdraw the point of order.

Mr. ANDERSON. My sincere belief is that the amendment is not liable to a point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. There being no point of order, the Chair will listen to the gentleman from Kansas on the merits of the amendment.

Mr. HAZELTON. I renew the point of order for the present, until we ascertain whether the substance of this amendment is not contained in some bill pending before the House.

Mr. HISCOCK. I understood that it was not.

Mr. HAZELTON. If the gentleman from Kansas will read his own bill the Chair will be able to determine whether it contains the substance of this amendment. I am satisfied that it does—that the amendment is almost in the exact language of the bill introduced by him and known as the Anderson bill.

Mr. HISCOCK. I withdrew my point of order upon the assurance that the amendment was not the same as that bill.

Mr. ANDERSON. House bill No. 345 is a bill to compel payment by the Kansas Pacific Railway Company of the cost of surveying, selecting, and conveying "certain" lands granted to it. A reference to the first section of that bill will show what those lands are. The first section of House bill No. 345 provides:

That the said Kansas Pacific Railway Company, or its assigns, shall, within ninety days from the passage of this act, pay into the Treasury of the United States all the cost of surveying, selecting, and conveying all such lands "situated in the State of Kansas," and upon which such costs shall not have been already paid.

Now, that bill No. 345 relates simply and exclusively to lands situated in the State of Kansas, and there is no other bill before the House of which that same statement is not true.

As the Chair will perceive upon examination, the amendment I submit relates to lands situated in the State of Kansas and in legally organized counties of the State of Colorado. And for the purpose of showing to the committee, and especially to the Chair, how much difference there is between those two propositions, I will simply state this: that this road is six hundred and thirty-nine miles long; that the grant of land to it embraced every alternate section in a belt forty miles in width; that four hundred and thirty-one miles of the road are in the State of Kansas and two hundred and eight miles in the State of Colorado. In other words, the lands granted to the road and covered by bill No. 345, or any other bill before the Pacific Committee or before the House, embraced four millions of acres.

If the Chair please, I should like to call his attention to the fact that the grant of land in the State of Colorad o embraces 2,000,000 acres additional. In other words, out of a grant of 6,000,000 acres the bill 345 related simply to the 4,000,000 of them situated in the State of Kansas, whereas this bill covers in addition that portion of the 2,000,000 acres situated in legally organized counties in the State of Colorado.

In illustration, Mr. Chairman, suppose there should be a bill before the House vacating a military reservation, say in the State of Rhode Island, and providing certain steps by which that vacation should be made, enjoining the Attorney-General to do certain things in respect to the military post in the State of Rhode Island—suppose that bill to be pending, and then suppose an amendment to be offered vacating the military posts in all of the New England States, not simply in Rhode Island, but in the five other New England States, and in addition in the State of New York. Now, then, could anyone hold, because such a bill was pending in respect to a military post in Rhode Island, that such fact ruled out this other bill covering New England and New York?

Why, sir, the State of Kansas is larger than all the New England States together, and the State of Colorado is about half as large as the State of Kansas, and these two propositions are just as different as any two things can possibly be.

Mr. RYAN. I wish to ask my colleague whether the substance of this is not very largely in devoting the amount due for these surveys from the company to the survey of the public domain and the reduction to that amount of the $400,000 appropriated for that purpose in this bill?

Mr. ANDERSON. I am exceedingly obliged to my colleague for calling my attention to that fact. The bills I have introduced and which are before committees simply relate to compelling the company to pay the costs of surveys, but this amendment, on the other hand, provides for the diminution of the sum of $400,000 appropriated in this bill for public surveys by such amount as shall be repaid by certain of the Pacific railway companies, and then provides for the repayment by the Kansas Pacific Railroad of the cost of the survey of these lands situated in the States of Kansas and Colorado. The two things are entirely distinct.

Mr. HAZELTON. Let me ask the gentleman from Kansas a question. I ask him whether the bill from the Senate does not also contain the substance of his amendment in this case?

Mr. ANDERSON. No, sir; it does not. I have the bill here somewhere, but cannot lay my hand on it just at this moment. That is a bill to waive the payment of all these costs.

Mr. RYAN. That is, to give it to them.

Mr. ANDERSON. That provides these lands shall be taxable as if the costs had been paid. It does not require the companies to pay these costs. It permits the Kansas Pacific Company to keep in its pocket $203,000 which are lawfully due to-day to the United States, and is in no possible degree the substance of this amendment.

Mr. HAZELTON. Mr. Chairman, I am unable to see that the gentleman is asking for any different relief in this bill, and I see no motive for asking any different relief from that embodied in his general bill. This question is embraced in the two bills I have sent up to the Chair, and the relief is substantially what he asks in this bill. The only difficulty about the question is that the Committee on Pacific Railways appended an amendment to the bill under consideration there bringing these roads under the provisions of the Thurman act. The question involved in the bill which passed the Senate unanimously is involved in the provision to allow the companies to invest in first-mortgage bonds instead of investing as they do now. That question is before the committee being considered.

The gentleman from Kansas is opposed to that last provision, and therefore fights the general bill as in the committee. He comes now under this sundry civil appropriation bill and asks to put on the very proposition; practically he may change the language a little, but it is practically the whole question which is embodied in those two bills, as the Chair must see if he examines carefully, now before that committee, and of course the consideration of those other bills, so far as the original purpose is concerned.

His object is this: first, to make these roads pay up the delinquent dues for surveys; and that is all right enough. His object, furthermore, is to force the roads to pay all taxes on land-grant lands, whether patents have been issued upon the lands or not. That is practically what he is after. If he cannot get the Government to force the patents and compel the companies to take the patents of all the lands surveyed, whether the Land Office has time or opportunity to issue them or not, then he insists that they shall be taxed whether the patents are issued or not as land-grant lands under the issue to the railroad companies by the Government.

Now, Mr. Chairman, it is manifest that this amendment can be nothing else than the substance of the pending bills; and of course, being the substance of the pending bills, (the object and intent to be accomplished being the same, although possibly there may be a slight modification in the verbiage,) it makes the amendment subject to the point of order. And it would be to impeach the intelligence of my friend from Kansas, which certainly no man can impeach upon this floor, that he would ask to offer an idle amendment differing from that which is proposed in these two well-considered, well-prepared, and thoroughly-matured bills which he has presented here.

I want to state, further, that I do not care about this particularly; but in view of the fact that these questions are now being carefully investigated before the Committee on Pacific Railroads or a subcommittee, it is hasty, and, in my judgment, it is not safe to force such a question upon this bill without full consideration and to take it from the careful consideration which it can alone receive before that committee.

Mr. ANDERSON rose.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Kansas will suspend for a moment, as the Chair desires to make a statement with reference to the argument, which he would like to have applied to the point of order.

Mr. ANDERSON. Inasmuch as the Chair has permitted the gentleman from Wisconsin to make an argument and statements as to my object and motives, I hope the Chair will not decide the point of order before I can have an opportunity of replying to him.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is not about to decide the point of order; but the Chair desires to call the attention of gentlemen to the fact before proceeding further with the argument upon this point of order that the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Kansas is divided into two separate paragraphs——

Mr. ANDERSON. No, sir; that is a mistake. The intention was to offer it as a single proposition without paragraph.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair, however, calls attention to the difference that exists in the terms of the two clauses of the proposed amendment, regarding it, of course, as a single amendment. There are two distinct paragraphs with two distinct objects, and the Chair desires gentlemen, with reference to this point of order, to enlighten the Chair as to the second paragraph. The first paragraph of the amendment is "that in the event," that is, that if a certain thing shall be done, a conditional paragraph; and in case such sums so paid into the Treasury, &c., they are by this clause appropriated as an additional sum to be used for the expense of surveying the public lands, and the amount so received from the companies, if received, is to diminish the appropriation of the bill, &c. That is the substance of the first paragraph, showing it to be conditional only.

The next clause is a compulsory one, not conditional, but is a paragraph which requires in the first instance the railroad company to pay certain sums into the Treasury; and in the second place, in the event of a failure to pay such sums, requiring the Attorney-General in such cases to bring suit in the name of the United States. Therefore there are two distinct paragraphs to which arguments are to be applied, and in further speaking to the point of order the Chair would like to hear gentlemen upon this distinction.

Mr. ANDERSON. I desire to say, Mr. Chairman, that I offered that as one indivisible, continuous paragraph, for the simple reason that the first provision is made for the reduction of this aggregate sum of $400,000 appropriated in this bill, provided this company shall make certain repayments. As a part of that provision, not as something to be divided or separated from it, the second part is offered. The two should not have been separated. That is a mistake of the printer in setting up the amendment, the idea being that it should be a continuous paragraph and the latter part being an essential, integral part of the first, not so much as separated from it by a period, instead of by a paragraph, as has been done here.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair thinks the gentleman from Kansas misapprehended the point to which the Chair desires to call attention. Of course this is to be accepted as an entire amendment. That the Chair understands, but if the point of order is good against any part of the amendment, the Chair would hold that it would apply to the whole amendment, regarding it as a single amendment for that purpose.

Mr. ANDERSON. The object is to offer it as a single amendment.

Mr. HASKELL. Since the Chair has called attention to this feature of the bill, I desire to ask the attention of the Chair to certain facts——

Mr. ATKINS. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry. I wish to ask if the Chair has not already decided the point of order?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair has not decided the point of order, but simply calls the attention of gentlemen to the provision to which the point of order is applicable.

Mr. HASKELL. Upon that point which has just been stated by the Chair, that there are two distinct paragraphs or propositions, I want first to say a word. If there are two propositions, as apparently there are in this, they simply bear upon their face an independence from each other, but as a matter of fact, and in design, they are the same, for the moment the Kansas Pacific Railroad Company pay back that survey money then the patents issue and the taxes under the State accrue. It is all a part and parcel of the one process. They are looped together, and it would be hardly possible to separate them. If you undertake to separate the amendment of my colleague, then you destroy the purposes for which he submitted it, and that is impossible. The whole proposition is a unit; and by existing law upon the statute-book when the sums of money are paid then the rest of the procedure follows by law, and a portion of that amendment which is offered is in effect a repetition only of the phraseology of the statutes now in force.

In my judgment no point of order can lie against that amendment. In the first place it is not the substance of a pending bill, since it involves two States, whereas the pending bill refers only to one. Moreover it presents a new proposition and makes the rest of the amendment contingent upon that new proposition.

But whether it does or not it is a new proposition. It accomplishes the object by new processes. It reaches it by a new course and by a new procedure entirely novel, and contained in no bill pending before the House. If it should be ruled by the Chair that it was new legislation, which it is not, for the statutes of the United States now provide for this procedure, and the railroad company are refusing to comply with them—if it should be found, however, to partake so much of the character of new legislation or a change of law as that the Chair would be puzzled to construe it otherwise, then I say to him that does not hold under the rule; because under the provisions of the amendment over $200,000 of money appropriated by this bill will be subtracted from the bill.

Mr. ANDERSON. And $5,000 additional.

Mr. HASKELL. Yes; and $5,000 additional. There is a sum for surveys appropriated by the bill. Adopt this amendment and over $200,000 less money will be required, and the appropriation is that much less. So that if it is new legislation it retrenches expenditures in the amount of money covered by the bill. It is not new legislation; neither is it two separate propositions, because if you detach one from the measure you destroy the effect of the amendment. If you adopt one of the propositions then the other proposition follows as a natural sequence of statutory law.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. Would the gentleman not also embrace the Northern Pacific and other roads in the same amendment?

Mr. HASKELL. I think not.

Mr. HAZELTON. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. HASKELL. Yes, sir.

Mr. HAZELTON. I ask the gentleman to read the second paragraph of this amendment and tell me in what its language differs from the exact provisions of the bill introduced by his colleague.

Mr. HASKELL. I would be willing to admit for argument's sake it is the same, verbatim. But the amendment goes further. And if the amendment contains much more matter than the pending bill—and this is true—it does not matter if a portion of it is the substance of another bill. In this case the amendment contains much more matter than the pending bill. It cannot be ruled to be identical or to contain the substance of that bill, since it contains much more matter embracing new and novel propositions.

My colleague will have to decline to admit any other amendment concerning any other Pacific railroad simply because such an amendment would be new legislation and if offered with reference to the Northern Pacific or the Union Pacific it might be amenable to the point of order. This is not. It is in accordance with the present statutes.

Mr. ANDERSON addressed the Chair.

The CHAIRMAN. If no other gentleman wishes to speak to the point of order, the Chair will again hear the gentleman from Kansas, [Mr. ANDERSON.]

Mr. ANDERSON. I now have in my hand the other bill, the Senate bill to which the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. HAZELTON] has referred. It is a bill "to declare certain lands subject to taxation." And the provision of it is that these lands "shall be subject to all legal taxes imposed under authority of any State or Territory in which such lands are located, to the same extent as they would have been had such costs been paid and the lands conveyed to said railroad companies." That is the only other bill bearing on this subject that is now pending. It is Senate bill No. 255.

I wish to say one word in regard to the difference between the amendment I have offered and the bills which I have introduced, and with respect to which I admit that the machinery provided for bringing of suit by the Attorney-General is the same as in this amendment. I wish to call the attention of the Chair to this, that in the bills heretofore introduced, only the lands in the State of Kansas were the subject. In this amendment lands in the State of Colorado are also included. You might provide the same machinery with respect to fifty different things, and that machinery would have nothing to do with this point of order.

I would like to call the attention of the Chair to one other thing; that is, that this amendment is exactly in accordance with the existing law of 1864, which law provided that when these fees were repaid by the company, then they should stand without further appropriation for use by the Land Commissioner in the public surveys; that it does not change existing law; that it is exactly germane to this clause; that if it did change existing law, it then would be reducing expenditures, and so would come in under that head. But it does not change existing law. More than that, I state that it is not the substance of any bill pending before this House. I believe that just as firmly as I believe anything.

Mr. Chairman, I am somewhat obliged to the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. HAZELTON] for making reference to my object in this matter. I introduced a bill relating to this subject, and there has been such deliberation in the consideration of that subject by the Pacific Railway Committee that it was only on the 2d day of June, although that subject had been argued by the company's attorney, had been agued by me, had been pressed time and again, and again, that it was brought in. And then what? After the bill was brought in with an amendment attached to it that the Kansas Pacific and two other companies should be placed under the Thurman act, it was then recommitted to the committee to be further amended by so changing the Thurman act as to permit the Secretary of the Treasury to invest in the bonds of the Union and Central Pacific companies. And since the gentleman has been volunteering statements as to my object I may say that I rather fancy that the object of that latter amendment was to put a pair of thumbscrews on me. And I very quietly say that if that be the object there is not power enough this side of Heaven to make me submit to any such process by any system of bulldozing. I say this because the gentleman has attacked my object and motives.

Mr. HAZELTON. I have not attacked the gentleman at all. I leave it to the Chair if I have attacked him one particle.

Mr. ANDERSON. This amendment is germane; it does not change existing law. And if it did change existing law, it reduces expenditures. It is not the substance of any bill before the House, and I ask for a decision on the point of order.

Mr. HAZELTON. It is not fair——

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will hear the gentleman on the point of order.

Mr. HAZELTON. Yes, on the point of order. The whole question in this case, of course, is whether the two bills now pending before the Committee on the Pacific Railroads contain the same provisions as, or are substantially identical with, this amendment.

My friend from Kansas [Mr. ANDERSON] has no right to state on this floor here what he has stated on this point of order. If ever a committee in the world nursed a proposition, and gave a man a chance to be heard, made his business their special business, the Committee on the Pacific Railroads have done it for him. At three or four different regular meetings of the committee the gentleman has been permitted to come before the committee and make his argument.

I appointed a sub-committee of that committee, composed of the best members of the committee, favorable to his bill. That sub-committee, after fair and just consideration, agreed to some of the provisions of his bill, probably the only provisions that would have been passed by any committee of this House.

I understood his eagerness, which was all right. It was just before the convention met which was to nominate him; and this railroad runs right through his district. This, Mr. Chairman, is on the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. That is the mystery to the Chair.

Mr. HAZELTON. On the point of order I want to say that the gentleman brought copies of those very resolutions before our committee, to "prick the sides of our intent" and move us on.

The CHAIRMAN. The quotation is excellent, but it does not enlighten the Chair on the point of order.

Mr. HAZELTON. It is on the point of order. No man has more respect for the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. ANDERSON] than I have. But what are the facts? The sub-committee, consisting of the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. BUTTERWORTH,] the gentleman from Tennessee, [Mr. HOUSE,] and one other member, I have forgotten his name, considered his bill in the light of all the statutes which you, Mr. Chairman, are now perhaps having in your mind on the point of order. In the light of those statutes they reported in favor of one or two provisions of his bill; for instance, in favor of enforcing the collection of the amounts of money that were due for these surveys. Then they provided that these roads should come in under the Thurman act, and he was perfectly willing that they should do so and acquiesced in it.

It was at the request of the Government; it is in the interest of the Government itself that these roads were put under the Thurman act. Is not that so?

Mr. ANDERSON. I would like to answer the gentleman.

Mr. HAZELTON. You have been answering and talking a great deal all the way through. But all I ask on this point of order is that no man shall impeach the good faith of this committee; that is all I ask.

In regard to the other proposition, I say it was recommitted to our committee in order that we might supply an omission which it was understood was in it. We did so, and the gentleman says that is where we applied the thumbscrews to him, providing for a bill which passed the Senate the other day by a unanimous vote and is now on the Speaker's table.

Mr. ANDERSON. That bill is worth $5,000,000 to the holders of the railroad bonds.

Mr. HAZELTON. I am not considering that. That bill is ready to be brought up here to be acted on to-morrow. And for the gentleman to stand here and say that the Senate of the United States is to be impeached by him; for the gentleman to stand up here and say, on this point of order, that his judgment on a proposition is so good against the unanimous vote of the Senate that he is justified in impeaching the good faith of my committee, or to charge me with bad faith, is certainly, on this point of order, far-fetched and very unfair.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is ready to decide the point of order if no gentleman desires to be heard further upon it.

Mr. SPRINGER. After the lucid explanation of the law by the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. HAZELTON] the Chair is no doubt ready and able to decide the point of order.

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. If the Chair is ready to rule, I do not desire to say a word.

The CHAIRMAN. If the gentleman desires to speak on the point of order the Chair will listen to him.

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. Only a single word. Undoubtedly the Kansas Pacific Railroad is indebted to the Government of the United States in a certain sum for land surveyed and located under the terms of the grant to that road. This proposition, in a nutshell, simply suggests that in case that money is paid in this appropriation shall be reduced $5,000. In the first place, the money is due to the Government of the United States, and the Committee on the Pacific Railroads reported in favor of requiring the Secretary of the Interior to demand its immediate payment, or on failure to pay that he institute proceedings to collect the amount. Now, my friend from Kansas proposes (and he will correct me if I state his proposition erroneously) that in case this money is collected or paid in the amount appropriated by this bill shall be reduced $5,000, the money so collected being utilized in place of the amount appropriated by the bill.

Mr. ANDERSON. That is correct. The difference is that while the bill applies simply to lands in Kansas the amendment applies to lands in Colorado, as well.

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. Then there is a difference in the two propositions. I have correctly stated the mode in which the reduction of expenditure is made. It all hinges upon the $5,000. Of course the other sum, being the money of the Government, from whatever source derived, would still be in the nature of an appropriation; but the reduction of $5,000 is, as I suppose, a reduction of the amount to be so expended. The point seems to me to hinge upon that.

Mr. RYAN. If the Chair has already determined upon his ruling, I do not wish to occupy time; but if he cares to listen to further argument I should like to be heard.

The CHAIRMAN. If the gentleman will speak to the point of order, the Chair will listen with pleasure.

Mr. RYAN. I desire to speak to the point of order. I do not often speak, and when I do I try to speak to the point. The point of order raised here is that there is a bill pending before the House which is in substance like the amendment. There is a bill pending before the House, introduced by my colleague, [Mr. ANDERSON,] and I wish to call the attention of the Chair to the object of that bill. In 1864 the Kansas Pacific Railway Company came to Congress to secure an act amendatory of the act of 1862. It has been the uniform decision of the Supreme Court of the United States that where there is anything remaining for a grantee of lands to do before becoming entitled to a patent, the lands are not subject to taxation by a State. In view of this decision, that company came here and obtained the enactment of a provision requiring them to pay the insignificant sum necessary to survey their lands before they would be entitled to a patent. Those lands were all surveyed—every acre of them, I believe—as long ago as 1875. The company has always refused to pay one dollar of the cost of those surveys, in order to defeat taxation; and under the ruling of the Supreme Court the company may convey those lands to individuals, and those individuals obtain a perfect title against the civilized world and the lands never be subject to taxation.

Now, a bill was brought in here by my colleague to remedy this injustice, to compel this company to pay into the Treasury the amount due from them for the survey of these lands. But this amendment is a very different proposition. The bill of my colleague related to Kansas alone; this amendment relates to the State of Colorado as well, and while one of its objects is the same as that of the bill it goes further and has as its primary object the utilization of the sum due to the Government from this company.

It seems to me that because this amendment embraces something which is in a pending bill, while it goes much further, making as its principal object the purpose I have indicated, it cannot be maintained that this amendment is the substance of the pending bill.

Mr. ROBESON. Mr. Chairman, this amendment, if I understand its scope and object, provides that certain sums of money owing to the Government but not yet due shall by this provision be made immediately due and collectible, and shall be collected; that the amount thus collected shall be applied to the purposes of this bill, and the appropriation made by the bill shall be to this extent reduced. If this is, as I believe it to be, a fair statement of the proposition, the provision does clearly in its scope and effect reduce the amount of money carried by the bill. As I understand, the amendment makes a change of existing law entirely consistent with the requirements of the rule.

Another point is raised against this proposition—that there is already pending before this House a bill covering this same proposition. It has been shown by the gentlemen from Kansas, [Mr. ANDERSON and Mr. RYAN,] as I understand, that the bill now before the committee of this House is by no means as far-reaching in its provisions or as extensive in its reductions. If so, the amendment is not liable to the point of order. Therefore, I submit we have here presented as an amendment a provision which, if put into effect, will, by the application of money not now in the Treasury, but which the machinery of this bill seeks to put into the Treasury, reduce by many thousands the amount of money carried by the bill.

Mr. DUNN. Mr. Chairman, I have hardly had time enough to make a careful comparison of this amendment with the bill referred to; but there are some statements made by the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. ANDERSON] which I, as a member of the Pacific Railroad Committee, am not willing shall go unchallenged, and I trust the Chair will indulge me a moment in giving a history of this matter.

Mr. ANDERSON. I wish to say that no part of my remarks was intended to reflect at all upon the gentleman.

Mr. DUNN. But as the gentleman's statement has been made, I deem it necessary to reply. There has been no purpose on the part of that committee to put any "screws" upon him. The sub-committee to which his bill was referred, and of which I was not a member, found that the bill did not fully accomplish the purposes it sought. It aimed to do two things—to place the Kansas Pacific Railway Company's lands within the reach of the taxing power of the State, and to compel the payment of the cost of survey. The committee found that one of these objects the bill did not accomplish; that in their estimation it was not the duty of the Government to interfere in the matter of taxation between the railroad company and the State so as to bring the company properly within the reach of State taxation; that the Government had no interest in that matter, but was interested in requiring the company to pay for the survey of the lands.

As to a thumbscrew which he finds there tacked on to squeeze him, that was done in the whole committee, and on my motion, bringing that road and another road under the operation of the Thurman bill. We found these two roads, for some unknown reason, had been left out from the operation of the Thurman bill, and I moved in the committee, after the sub-committee had reported, that the bill be further amended so as to completely cover all the claims and all the demands of the Government against those roads for surveying lands and for the bonds which had been issued in aid of their construction. The object of the committee was to protect the interests of the Government and not legislate in aid of the State of Kansas. I think it would be well to do so. I believe these two roads were relieved and placed out of the reach of taxation by a trick of legislation procured by the railroad companies after they had seen the operations of the law. I would vote for a bill remedying that mischief when brought directly and squarely to the purpose if it is necessary and can be accomplished with the aid of Congressional legislation. There is no purpose to put thumbscrews on the gentleman.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair thinks the gentleman should confine himself to the point of order.

Mr. DUNN. The committee had no other object except to protect the interests of the Government in that legislation.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair hardly feels authorized to hear anything but on the point of order. If no gentleman wishes to be heard the Chair is ready to pass on the question.

Mr. POUND. I wish to make a suggestion.

Mr. ALDRICH. Let us have a decision.

Mr. POUND. It strikes me the gentleman from New Jersey and others who have spoken relative to the effect of the first paragraph have fallen into an error. Now, it is the policy and practice of the Government, as I understand it, in disposing of revenue received from public lands to cover it into the Treasury. This paragraph provides, instead of covering the receipts from railroad companies for these surveys into the Treasury, that they shall be used directly for the survey of the public domain to the amount here appropriated. It radically changes the policy and practice of the Government in this regard, but it does not change one dollar or one cent of the amount of money actually to be expended by the Government. It does not matter whether it is paid into the Treasury so far as the expenditure is concerned, or at least directly for surveys. It seems to me there is not one dollar of change in the expenditure of the Government, while the paragraph radically changes the policy of the Government as to the disposition of these revenues, first by covering them into the Treasury of the United States, and then by appropriating them in definite amounts.

I wish to be indulged in a remark to the Chair to express the hope that he will exercise his functions as a presiding officer to decide this point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will ask the Clerk to read the first paragraph as appended to the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 60, after the word "lines," in line 1448, insert:

"Provided, That in the event of the repayment to the United States of moneys advanced and expended by it in surveying and selecting public lands granted to certain railroad companies under 'an act to aid in the construction of a railroad and telegraph line from the Missouri River to the Pacific Ocean,' &c., approved July 1, 1862, and the act amendatory thereof, approved July 2, 1864, the said companies or parties in interest being by such acts required to pay 'into the Treasury of the United States the cost of surveying, selecting, and conveying' lands so granted then and in that event such sums so paid into the Treasury shall, without further appropriation, be used for surveying the public lands; and in this latter event, but not otherwise, the sum of $400,000 herein appropriated shall be diminished by the aggregate sum so paid into the Treasury and so used for the public survey, and the further sum of $5,000."

The CHAIRMAN. The committee will observe that this does not necessarily or probably as far as appears on its face reduce the amount covered by this bill. It is simply appropriating out of a special fund instead of out of a general fund in the Treasury the amount required for the service up to the sum of $400,000, less, as the last modification would seem to indicate, the sum of $5,000.

On the other hand it is a permanent appropriation which it makes out of the Treasury of the sum that may be paid into the Treasury from this source. The effect therefore may be that the clause appropriates a still larger sum than that which is covered and appropriated in this bill.

So much for the first paragraph. The second paragraph, which the gentleman from Kansas desires to be treated as an integral part of the amendment, and the Chair distinguishes it in that form because it presents a different topic, is positive legislation, and has for its object the compulsion of a railroad company to pay immediately into the Treasury of the United States the sum which the first clause of the paragraph appropriates from the Treasury in the event of its being paid, and instructs the Attorney-General to institute proceedings in court. But this appears to the Chair to be new legislation and the principal object of the amendment, and on that point his attention is called to two bills. One is House bill No. 345, which recites the act that compels the company to pay certain funds into the Treasury, and certain other acts which require the same payment of costs of survey, selecting, &c., and have certain provisions for the payment of costs of such legal proceedings as the Attorney-General is by that bill authorized to institute; and the additional point, the substance of which is not included here, is that it subjects the lands to certain State taxes.

The other bill referred to, namely, House bill No. 5648, is entitled a bill "to declare certain lands subject to taxation," and is not, in the opinion of the Chair, relevant in this connection, and therefore will not be considered by the Chair with reference to the point of order. But this bill, (House bill No. 345,) covering as it does the substance of the second paragraph of the amendment, with one additional subject, the Chair thinks has clearly reference to the point of order, and the Chair accepts the title of the bill as indicating the substance of it. The Chair finds the title of the bill to be: "To compel the payment by the Kansas Pacific Railway Company of the cost of survey, selecting, and conveying certain lands granted to it, and for other purposes." The Chair thinks he is justified, in looking for the substance of a bill, to regard that which is set forth by the bill as its title as the substance; and in this instance the title of the bill, indicating the substance of it, is identical with the provision of the latter branch of this amendment, which is to compel the same company to pay the same costs, with the limitation simply as has been stated by the gentleman from Kansas to four millions of acres instead of six millions. In other respects it is the same.

The Chair, however, prefers, without entering upon the consideration of the text of the bills pending or either of them, to rule the point of order upon this clause of the rule, that it is new legislation, modifying existing law, though covering the same objects contemplated by existing law in different terms, and does not reduce the amount of money covered by the bill; and for the reason that it reappropriates the moneys derived from the railroad company, making it a permanent fund out of which these surveys are to be made. The Chair therefore feels compelled to sustain the point of order.

Mr. ANDERSON. With the very highest respect for the opinion of the Chair, I desire to appeal from that decision, and suggest to the Chair one fact which was perhaps not sufficiently brought out in the discussion of the point of order.

Mr. HAZELTON. I would ask if an appeal from the decision of the Chair is debatable?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will indulge the gentleman briefly upon the point.

Mr. ANDERSON. I simply desire to say that under the act of 1864, which is existing law to-day, the sum repaid into the Treasury of the United States in the shape of costs by these railroads is made a standing appropriation, and therefore there is no change of existing law. The Chair will find that in section 21 of the act of 1864.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair hardly supposes that there is really any object in re-enacting identically the old law, and even if there be a change of a word or two, or several words, it is not in totidem verbis existing law.

The Chair submits the appeal to the judgment of the committee, as it has been his object to prevent as far as possible the introduction of new subjects of legislation upon appropriation bills. Shall the decision of the Chair stand as the judgment of the committee?

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 80, noes 7.

So the decision of the Chair was sustained.

Mr. ANDERSON. I now present the amendment which I send to the desk.

The CHAIRMAN. The amendment will be read.

Insert after line 1475:

"Provided, That in the event of the repayment to the United States of moneys heretofore advanced and expended by it in surveying and selecting public lands granted to certain railroad companies under 'an act to aid in the construction of a railroad and telegraph line from the Missouri River to the Pacific Ocean,' &c., approved July 1, 1862, and the amendatory act approved July 2, 1864, the said companies or parties in interest being by such acts required to pay 'into the Treasury of the United States the cost of surveying, selecting, and conveying' lands so granted, then and in that event such amounts so paid into the Treasury shall without further appropriation be used for surveying the public lands; and in this latter event, but not otherwise, the sum of $375,000 herein appropriated shall be diminished by the aggregate sum so paid into the Treasury and so used for the public survey. And each of the several railroad companies named in said acts, or its legal successor, successors, assign, or assigns, shall forthwith pay into the Treasury of the United States the cost, as determined by the Secretary of the Interior, of surveying, selecting, and conveying the public lands so granted to it, and upon which such costs shall not have been already paid. And in the event that any such costs shall remain unpaid on the 1st day of October, 1882, the Attorney-General of the United States is hereby authorized and directed to institute forthwith, in the name of the United States of America, in the circuit court of the United States for the district in which is situated the land upon which such costs remain unpaid, any and all proceedings against said company or party in interest necessary and proper to secure the payment of all said costs and of the further cost of all such legal proceedings.

"That all money received into the Treasury by reason of the provision hereof is hereby appropriated for the purpose herein named in lieu of and to the extent of the amount so paid in, and shall be deducted from the amount herein appropriated for such surveys."

Mr. HISCOCK. That is subject to the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the Chair understand the gentleman as raising the point of order?

Mr. HISCOCK. I do; I make the point of order upon it.

Mr. ANDERSON. What point of order?

Mr. HISCOCK. It is the same amendment substantially as the one just ruled out.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will hear the gentleman from Kansas briefly upon the point of order.

Mr. ANDERSON. I would like to know what the point of order is?

Mr. HISCOCK. It is new legislation all the way through.

Mr. ANDERSON. The amendment I first introduced related to lands of the Kansas Pacific road in the States of Kansas and Colorado. This amendment relates to all of the railroads obtaining grants under the acts of 1862 and 1864 which have not as yet paid the costs of survey of their lands. And there is no bill before this House, nor does any gentleman pretend there is any bill before this House, touching this question. Therefore, it is not the substance of legislation now before the House.

Then I wish to call the attention of the Chair to this, that it is in accordance with existing legislation. That existing legislation, as I said before, is contained in the act of 1864, which provides that—

Before any land granted by this act shall be conveyed——

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair understands that provision. The Chair has the same understanding of the existing law as the gentleman from Kansas.

Mr. ANDERSON. Then I need not speak of that.

The CHAIRMAN. Not of the existing law.

Mr. ANDERSON. Then this does not change existing law for the reason that this amendment is applied to certain railroad companies which obtained grants under that act. Of these railroad companies the Union Pacific and Central Pacific were great leading corporations, and these companies have paid these costs of survey and are not affected by this amendment.

The central branch of the Union Pacific, my understanding is, has also paid these costs, although as to that I am not quite positive. The only companies that have not, according to my information, are the Kansas Pacific, the Western Pacific, and the Sioux City and Pacific. The existing law required these companies, all of them, to make this payment. The great through corporations have made it. But here are these three smaller corporations which have not made it. The fact that those leading corporations have made these payments shows that this is in accordance with existing law.

I submit to the Chair another thing: that this amendment proposes to reduce the sum of $400,000 to $375,000; that therefore it is a substantial amendment, the reduction not being contingent. Secondly, that it does not make a permanent appropriation any further than the existing act of 1864 makes a permanent appropriation. Third, that it is not the substance of any legislation before this House.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair understands the points made by the gentleman from Kansas. The gentleman will recollect that the previous decision was not made upon the contents of the pending bill, though that raised some doubts in the mind of the Chair; but the Chair is perfectly clear he would not be justified in allowing a main object of new legislation to be accomplished under the form of adding in some way to that a reduction of a few dollars or a few thousand dollars. The main object of this legislation, it appears evident to the Chair, as it must to the committee, is to make a new regulation touching the various railroad companies that are named.

Mr. ANDERSON. I would like to be heard upon that point.

The CHAIRMAN. In a moment. The Chair thinks the committee have expressed their opinion upon the previous point, that they do not wish to ingraft general legislation on this bill as an appendage to a proposition to reduce expenditure. As the Chair understands the rule a proposition must be germane, and, secondly, must retrench expenditures in the manner specified by the rule. That is, it must be a sequence direct and necessary of the proposition adopted that it does retrench expenditures. The opinion of the Chair is that the rule intended to bring members offering amendments and the Committee on Appropriations equally to a very close construction in the addition of general matter to an appropriation bill. And it is so evident that this proposition to reduce, which is again made upon the condition that the funds come into the Treasury from certain sources, is simply a means of getting at the general legislation instead of the general legislation being a means of reducing expenditure, that the Chair is obliged to sustain the point of order.

Mr. HAZELTON. It would be in the nature of such riders as the gentleman from Kansas fought in the extra session of Congress.

Mr. ANDERSON. I wish to make a suggestion to the Chair, and will reply to my friend from Wisconsin afterward. I would respectfully suggest to the Chair, with the heartiest good will, that the Chair has only to take the face of the amendment. The Chair, in my judgment, is not justified in reasoning out what my object may be. The simple question is what appears on the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair did not speak of the gentleman's object, but of the object of the amendment.

Mr. ANDERSON. The object of the amendment is simply to execute existing law.

The CHAIRMAN. If the gentleman from Kansas were to sit down and copy a chapter of existing law verbatim et literatim, and offer that as an amendment, the Chair would rule it out of order as new legislation, unless it has the effect, direct and immediate, required by the rule. In other words, the mere re-enactment of existing law is no more in order without having that effect than the enactment of new law. The Chair has given its decision, and no appeal being taken, the Chair is ready to entertain a further amendment.

Mr. ANDERSON. I again respectfully appeal. I shall not call for a vote, but I wish to put on record my protest against this decision of the Chair.

The CHAIRMAN. An appeal having been taken, the question is submitted to the committee: shall the decision of the Chair stand as the judgment of the committee?

The question being taken, it was decided in the affirmative; and the decision of the Chair stood as the judgment of the committee.

Mr. ATKINS. I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

In line 1440, strike out "nine" and insert "eight."
In line 1441, strike out "seven" and insert "six."
In line 1442, strike out "five" and insert "four."
In line 1446, strike out "thirteen" and insert "twelve."
In line 1447, strike out "eleven" and insert "ten;" and also, in line 1447, strike out "seven" and insert "six."

So that it will read:

"For surveying the public lands, $400,000, at rates not exceeding $8 per linear mile for standard and meander lines, $6 for township, and $4 for section lines, except that the Commissioner of the General Land Office may allow for the survey of standard and meander lines through lands heavily timbered, mountainous, or covered with dense undergrowth a sum not exceeding $12 per linear mile for standard lines, $10 for township, and $6 for section lines."

The CHAIRMAN. These propositions will be taken together if no objection is made.

Mr. ATKINS. I offer that as a whole. I will not detain the committee by any elaborate remarks on this subject. I want to make but one or two observations.

It is fair to say to the Committee of the Whole that the figures reported by the Committee on Appropriations in this bill work a reduction of the amount granted for this purpose in the last appropriation bill. But I undertake to say that that reduction is not sufficient.

It is because of the very large amounts that were allowed to these surveyors that the enormous frauds have been perpetrated upon the Government of which the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. WASHBURN] spoke yesterday. It is because these sums are so large which surveyors are allowed for surveying the public lands that they have been enabled to sell the certificates of surveys often at a large discount, in some instances at 50 per cent. discount or more, and then realize large profits. It is within the experience of practical surveyors that even the figures indicated in my amendment are too high, and that under them these surveyors would make very large profits.

I hope it will be the sense of this Committee of the Whole to strike at the root of this fraud. And that root is the large sums which have been allowed these surveyors for surveying the public lands. It has cost the Government at least $7,000,000 for the surveying of worthless public lands. You have to-day 120,000,000 acres of public lands surveyed in excess of the demand, 100,000,000 of which are worthless.

Mr. WILSON. Surveyed now?

Mr. ATKINS. Surveyed now; lands utterly worthless and the surveying of which has cost this Government $7,000,000.

Now, I say it is the duty of this Congress to cut down the figures for these surveys, so that there will be no inducement to the surveyors to survey worthless lands and then assign these certificates. As the law is now, as you were told yesterday, a surveyor can survey public lands in any portion of the country and go outside of the township and outside of the land-office district and locate the certificates of surveys. And in so doing large frauds have been perpetrated upon the Treasury.

It is the duty of this House to cut these figures down, because when you cut them down to something like reasonable rates there will be no inducement to survey large bodies of lands that are worthless and then assign the certificates.

Mr. VALENTINE. I hope that this committee will not do a hasty and unwise thing under the influence of the cry of "mad dog" raised by the gentleman from Tennessee, [Mr. ATKINS.] If the gentleman lived in a region of country where lands need to be surveyed, I think he would understand this question better than his language to the committee indicates that he now does.

Mr. ATKINS. I can only say that if the cry of "mad dog" was raised upon the floor of the House, it was raised by the gentleman from Minnesota, [Mr. WASHBURN.]

Mr. VALENTINE. Oh, no; that to which I refer, with all due regard to the gentleman from Tennessee, [Mr. ATKINS,] was raised by himself.

Mr. ATKINS. I beg to say that I certainly have not used any stronger language, nor have I added any force to what was said by the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. WASHBURN] yesterday.

Mr. VALENTINE. The Committee on Appropriations have in this bill reduced the price of surveys per linear mile $3 per mile upon every class of these surveys. That proposition has been practically passed upon by the House and the action of the Committee on Appropriations confirmed.

It is now sought by the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. ATKINS] to reduce the price $1 more upon each of the several classes of surveys; so as to strike off $4 per linear mile from what the law now allows. And in order to get this committee to support his amendment he used what I claim was the "mad-dog" cry, by reference to the deposit system.

Now, what are the facts touching that system? The same Committee on Appropriations has placed upon this bill a provision which in my judgment was clearly obnoxious to the rules, and the point of order upon it should have been sustained. But believing the deposit system to be an obnoxious system, I said nothing whatever on the point of order when it was before the committee.

I believe that system has been abused; I believe lands have been surveyed that will not be used by actual settlers for half a century. But we have lands in the States of Nebraska and Kansas and in the Territories lying in that region that are agricultural lands, and we want them surveyed, and we want them surveyed properly.

Mr. RYAN. I want to correct my friend. There are no unsurveyed public lands in Kansas, and only 5,000,000 acres in Nebraska.

Mr. VALENTINE. I am glad to learn that the gentleman has got over that difficulty in his State.

Mr. BRENTS. From his speech yesterday I supposed they had no public lands in that State.

Mr. VALENTINE. The gentleman from Washington Territory [Mr. BRENTS] very wisely says that he supposed from the remarks made by the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. RYAN] yesterday that they had no public lands in that State to be surveyed. As soon as they have got out of the scrape they are willing to abandon the system and to let it go. But we in Nebraska and in the Territories adjoining have public lands to be yet surveyed. For one I want to see a sufficient sum paid by the Government of the United States to secure the making of good and sufficient surveys, so that when settlers come to the West from the State of the gentleman from Tennessee, or from any other State to settle there, they can go out and find a Government corner actually made, and one that will remain there.

I say that the price as reported by this bill for surveying the public lands is not too much. A provision has been placed upon this bill which practically repeals the deposit-system law. Under the provision as it is now in the bill I dare say that you never will have another single quarter section of Government land surveyed under the deposit system. And with that I am content. Therefore that crime, which the gentleman says has been committed against the United States of surveying lands which were not needed for settlement, has been wiped out by this bill.

Now, why strike down the legitimate price for surveys where it is necessary that public lands should be surveyed? We want men competent to make these surveys. It is true that you get men to swear, as they are required to do under the law, that they are surveyors, and contracts will be awarded to them by the surveyor-general to make surveys. Yet when they get through their surveys are absolutely worthless; and you provide no system of inspection, no way of determining whether the surveys are properly made or not. I hope the amendment will not prevail.

Mr. PAGE. I offer an amendment in the form of a substitute for the entire paragraph.

Mr. ATKINS. Is that in order before the text is perfected?

The CHAIRMAN. The text should first be perfected. If the amendment of the gentleman from California [Mr. PAGE] is a substitute for the whole paragraph, the Chair would advise him to withhold it until the text of the paragraph is perfected.

Mr. ATKINS. My amendment is to perfect the text.

Mr. PAGE. I will withdraw my substitute for the time being, and in order to say a word will move pro forma to strike out the last word.

Mr. Chairman, the ruling of the House yesterday, of which I do not complain, was in effect, in my judgment, an abolition of surveys under the deposit system. Now, the question is whether you will have any surveys of the public lands at all. It was asserted yesterday by the gentleman from Minnesota, [Mr. WASHBURN,] and the remark met a response from my friend from Nevada, [Mr. CASSIDY,] and the gentleman from New York was glad to have him bear witness to the fact, that these surveys under the deposit system are all wrong. Mr. Chairman, I have resided on the frontier of the United States for thirty years, and I know something about the surveying and settlement of the public lands in the western country. There are three or four classes of people who are benefited by not having the public lands surveyed. Who are they? The men who have built saw-mills and are engaged in plundering the public lands of their valuable timber—those who can now go upon the public lands and take timber because the lands are unsurveyed are opposed to surveying the timber lands of the United States. Another class of men opposed to surveying the public lands are those who have cattle ranges embracing from 5,000 to 20,000 acres in Dakota, in the Black Hills, in Wyoming, in Idaho, and in the State of Nevada, where they have their cattle roaming all over Uncle Sam's domain, and do not pay a dollar in the way of rent. The men who are engaged in mining, who, if I may use the expression, have gobbled up five times the amount of land they are entitled to under your mineral laws, do not want your lands surveyed. Of course the men along the line of the Union Pacific Railroad, men handling large amounts of foreign capital, men who have invested hundreds of thousands of dollars in stock-raising, do not want your public lands surveyed. They want them to remain as they are now, so that they may use them without paying the Government one dollar and may exclude everybody else from occupation. These are the classes of men who cry most loudly against the survey of the public lands. I do not say that any motive of this kind actuates my friend from Tennessee, for I know it is not the case. He has no interest in the matter one way or the other. But men representing western constituencies, portions of the country that invite settlement, that have large quantities of public lands unsurveyed and unsold, ought to have some influence in this House in reference to the survey of these public lands.

Mr. BLACKBURN. I desire to say only a word in support of the amendment offered by the gentleman from Tennessee. I am sure that the action of the committee in doing away with the deposit system, under which the certificates issued upon deposits have been used as the current money of the country, will be sustained by the House and the country.

In reference to the rates of pay for these surveys, I believe the gentleman from Tennessee is right in the amendment he has submitted. The committee acted very advisedly and very carefully in recommending to Congress a reduction of the rates of pay. They took the opinion of the Land Office itself; they took the opinion of men in this House best posted upon the question, such as my colleague on the committee, the gentleman from Kansas, [Mr. RYAN.] They took the opinion of another member of this House, who I am sure, like my friend from Kansas, enjoys the confidence of the House, the honorable gentleman from Minnesota, [Mr. WASHBURN,] who was for years surveyor-general of his State. The concurrent testimony of every witness that we called before us was to the effect that the rates of pay at present prevailing tended to produce fraud; that these certificates were sold at a discount of 10 per cent., and yet so large was the margin of profit——

Mr. VALENTINE. The gentleman talks about the sale of those certificates; that is now all wiped out.

Mr. BLACKBURN. It is whenever this bill becomes a law.

Mr. VALENTINE. Exactly.

Mr. BLACKBURN. I have passed from that question and am now discussing the rates of pay for these surveys. The testimony before the committee satisfied us that frauds were perpetrated by reason of the very large sums of money paid for this service; that after paying this discount a profit of 50 to 100 per cent. could be made upon every survey, thus inducing frauds upon the public revenue in this, that the surveys were made in the office instead of the field——

Mr. VALENTINE. I was just going to ask the gentleman whether that was not the fact. But if the officers had actually gone into the field and made correct, accurate, honest surveys, was there any testimony before the committee that the pay would then be too large?

Mr. BLACKBURN. Yes, sir; any quantity of testimony. It was the concurrent testimony from the Land Office and from the gentlemen whom I have named, who were most conversant with this subject, that the pay was too large even if the service was rendered fairly and honestly; that this system simply put a premium upon dishonesty; and where the surveys as a rule were made in the office when the surveyor himself had never seen the land, because 100 per cent. profit was his in the face of the discount he had to stand. [Mr. VALENTINE rose.] And more, sir, if the gentleman will permit me. Such were the profits accruing to him that in many instances, if not constituting the rule, that officer of the Government to pay the money advanced the money in order to get surveys made that he might have the profits thus accruing.

The Committee on Appropriations insisted they would ask this House to enact such legislation as would put a stop to such practice. The committee acted very wisely; they acted very conservatively; they adopted a scale of pay, not the minimum but the maximum rate recommended by all the parties testifying from the Land Office.

Mr. BLOUNT. Will the gentleman from Kentucky permit me to ask him a question for information?

Mr. BLACKBURN. Certainly, sir.

Mr. BLOUNT. I wish to ask whether the Land Office does not say the rate suggested by my friend from Tennessee [Mr. ATKINS] will be ample?

Mr. BLACKBURN. I will answer that. I will say this: the Committee on Appropriations adopted, not the minimum, but the maximum rate suggested for these surveys. They did afterward reduce that sum $1. The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. ATKINS] offers an amendment to reduce it $1 more.

Mr. VALENTINE. Did not the committee pass on the question and determine the rate now fixed in the bill?

Mr. BLACKBURN. Yes; the committee did, and the committee determined, and what the committee determined was, to say it was within the limits and boundary of safe law, because the committee adopted, not the minimum, but the maximum rate of reduction suggested. The gentleman from Tennessee proposes to reduce that $1 more.

Mr. ATKINS. Let me ask a question to satisfy my classical friend from Nebraska.

Mr. VALENTINE. Thank you, sir.

Mr. ATKINS. Was not the evidence before the committee to the effect that these sums could be safely reduced to the point I have indicated?

Mr. BLACKBURN. I assume it to be so. I say yes. Now, Mr. Chairman, as the gentleman has taken up so much of my time, I wish to add that, in addition to the testimony I have already cited, the committee had before it a Delegate from one of the Territories, himself now present on the floor of the House, a practical surveyor, and we took his counsel; we took the advice of every man in this House and out of it, the Land Office included, and the committee determined to recommend a reduction to the figures in this bill, and I tell you they were the minimum instead of the maximum figures for reduction, and from the testimony submitted to that committee, from opinions expressed by the members of the House and Delegates on this subject, I am sure we are not trenching on dangerous ground if we adopt the amendment offered by the gentleman from Tennessee to reduce it $1 more.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. HISCOCK. Mr. Chairman, a single word. I am opposed to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Tennessee——

The CHAIRMAN. There being no objection, the pro forma amendment will be withdrawn and renewed by the gentleman from New York.

Mr. HISCOCK. As has been said by the gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. BLACKBURN,] this matter was carefully investigated, and there has not been an intention on the part of any member of the Committee on Appropriations, in my judgment, in the least to impair the service. We proposed to give a fair compensation for the survey of the public lands. And more than that, Mr. Chairman, having struck down the deposit system as called for, lest we cripple the service, I am in favor of a liberal compensation for surveys, and we have given in this bill, I admit, more than we believe to be necessary. I am not sure it is not necessary; but I am sure we should not cripple the service, that we should not experiment on this question. And, Mr. Chairman, we were confronted with the fact, and I commend this to the gentleman from California, that during the year 1881 $2,000,000 in the public lands were stolen. That is the fact to be confronted—stolen, because under this system they were turned in for surveys which were never made, and for which excessive prices were paid when they were made.

Two million dollars have been stolen during the last year in the same way, if the statement of the Commissioner of the General Land Office is to be relied on. But, gentlemen, we need not rely on the statement of the Commissioner of the General Land Office, when you take the State of Colorado, with over 7,000,000 acres of land, nearly 8,000,000, and less than 250,000 acres sold; and in the State of Nevada the same condition of things.

Mr. VALENTINE. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him, while they were legislating on this question to better the condition of affairs, they did not provide for inspectors of surveys?

Mr. HISCOCK. We have.

Mr. VALENTINE. In what bill?

Mr. HISCOCK. In this bill.

Mr. VALENTINE. That is the very thing we want.

Mr. HISCOCK. In this very clause which is now before you. That proposes $50,000 of this money shall be appropriated for that purpose, and in the legislative bill there will be still further provision made. Now, take the State of Nevada——

Mr. VALENTINE. All we want is to have our surveys properly made.

Mr. RYAN. You will have them made; there is a provision here of $50,000 for that purpose.

Mr. HISCOCK. Take, I say, the State of Nevada, to which attention was called a short time ago by the gentleman representing that State. There were 4,524,000 acres of land surveyed in that State last year and only 88,000 acres sold. The surveyor-general tells us that they have been over these rocky districts which have been surveyed and no lines can be traced and no monuments fixed. The report of the Commissioner of the General Land Office and his letter, which is indorsed by the late Secretary of the Interior, Mr. Kirkwood, show that this system was fruitful of fraud, and that substantially this $2,000,000 in value of the public lands was squandered.

Mr. DUNN. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. HISCOCK. Yes, sir.

Mr. DUNN. I wish to ask the gentleman from New York if in the legislative bill and in this bill together $160,000 about is not appropriated for the surveyor-general's office and for the contingent expenses of his office?

Mr. HISCOCK. Yes, sir; that is about the amount.

Mr. DUNN. They have been reduced in proportion to other reductions——

Mr. HISCOCK. No, sir; there has been no reduction there.

Mr. DUNN. We spend, then, $160,000 in order to dispose of the $400,000 for surveys.

Mr. HISCOCK. I cannot help it. There may be an error in that. I am not going to discuss the question of whether there is or not. But it was not a matter with which we had any concern. We were not called on to change from the laws existing upon the statute-books. In 1879 this abuse to which the gentleman now calls attention crept into legislation, and we are not responsible for it. This Congress is not responsible for it, and we have sought, so far as was in our power, to correct it. I do not mean to be understood as charging the abuse upon any party or any committee. I know very well that when these rates were fixed by bill not one cent more than was necessary would have been given by the gentleman from Georgia, who presented it, and every one present will indorse that statement.

Mr. HEPBURN. I desire, Mr. Chairman, now, in lieu of the amendment of which I gave notice on yesterday, to ask leave to offer a substitute.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will suggest to the gentleman from Iowa that there is a pro forma amendment now pending, which, when disposed of, will enable the Chair to recognize the gentleman from Iowa to offer his proposed substitute.

Mr. BRENTS. Mr. Chairman, two years ago frauds were discovered in the postal service of the country, and a cry went up from this House, and in fact from all over the country, against appropriations for the postal service in that part of the country where these frauds occurred. To a great extent these were the feelings that prevailed with reference to the star-route service, and in the appropriation bill of that year there were great efforts made to cut down and destroy absolutely these portions of the postal service in the West. Now, then, frauds have been also discovered in the system of surveying the public lands in some instances, and gentlemen jump to the conclusion that the fault is in the law instead of its execution, and demand that we strike down the whole surveying system. Gentlemen get excited when they hear the cry of fraud here.

Now, if any frauds have been perpetrated in this service they should be ferreted out and the perpetrators punished according to the law; but we must not go heedlessly to work and repeal every law which is susceptible of fraud being perpetrated under it simply because there is an apprehension that such a thing will at some future time be done. All laws, Mr. Chairman, operate upon facts which must be ascertained, and in the ascertainment of the facts deception is often practiced, and of course abuses follow. So it has been here in this case. Men have committed perjury and have deceived the land officer and had surveys authorized which perhaps should not have been made. But it was not the fault of the law. It was because frauds and perjuries were committed and deception practiced successfully upon the officers. Now, to avoid that let us give the remedy proposed by the Secretary of the Interior, namely, inspectors to look after these matters, to detect, report these frauds, and bring the perpetrators to punishment. We say that these surveys which have been made indicate that we have been paying too much for the surveys, and we have cut down the amount at least 25 per cent. since last year. It is passing strange that the Committee on Appropriations a year ago did not discover that we were paying too much for this service. The gentleman from Tennessee is always very economical and always on the alert to discover fraud, when there is any, and it is strange that he has just now found out that the price proposed by this bill, which is so much below that of last year, is too much and that so much fraud can be and is being perpetrated under the present law.

Sir, I only want the price to be sufficient to insure the surveys. I would pay a dollar more than is reasonable and right and necessary for that purpose. We are already reducing it far below the price which the honorable gentleman from Tennessee thought was right and reasonable last year. The present committee, after an examination of the matter, think we can do that and still get the surveying done. If we now go with my economical friend from Tennessee, who has undergone this great change of heart since last year, in his proposed further reduction, we shall probably fail to get the contracts taken and the surveying done. I am not willing to take this risk, as the result of failure in this would be most disastrous to the western country where these surveys are so much needed. I hope the amendment will be voted down. [Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. BLOUNT. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from New York in charge of this bill a few moments ago stated that the rates paid for the surveys of the public lands had been increased by myself in the sundry civil bill which I reported.

I wish to correct the gentleman as to that, and to say that the compensation in the last sundry civil bill and for several years was simply in pursuance of the law which existed prior to the reduction of those bills and which had been continued for several years.

Mr. RYAN. Will the gentleman allow me to interrupt him for a moment?

Mr. BLOUNT. Yes, sir.

Mr. RYAN. I think the gentleman is in error. In 1881, by provision in the sundry civil bill, the rates of compensation were raised above what they had been for the four preceding years very largely. That is the fact and I am ready to give the figures if it would not interrupt the gentleman.

Mr HISCOCK. There is no doubt about that.

Mr. BLOUNT. I am very sure there was no report of an increase of compensation to surveyors from the Committee on Appropriations.

It is possible, when it came into the House, the bill was amended in that way. But I am quite sure there was a struggle on the part of the Land Office to increase the compensation, which we resisted. There was likewise an effort on the part of the Land Office to extend the deposit system to all of the lands. That effort was made before the committee by the Commissioner and by the friends of the measure not only in the committee but in this House. It was resisted, and there was, I must say, no change at all coming from the committee. I will not say that before the bill finally became a law there might not have been an amendment here or in the Senate. My impression is that I stated any increase of the item not only in the committee but in this House; and if an increase has occurred, I think my friend will find it was made in the Senate. I am very sure I recommended none, nor did the committee.

The pro forma amendment was withdrawn.

Mr. HASKELL. I renew the pro forma amendment. There is no possible doubt but what this reduction is just. I think there is no man familiar with the surveys of the prairie countries of the West but will admit that in the years past the profits on the surveying contracts have ranged from 50 to 75 per cent. of the gross amount collected. The price of surveys in mountainous districts or in those sections of the country covered with underbrush and timber where lines of sight have to be cut, are sometimes more expensive to run than is provided in this bill twice over. You can find some localities of that sort. But in the great mass of the surveys of the public lands of the United States to-day there is not a possibility of a doubt but what you can secure all the surveyors you want at a moment's notice at the lowest price indicated on this floor. There is not any doubt about that. In the prairie countries alone the price heretofore allowed by Congress has been enormously large. There is no danger of striking down the surveying system by the reduction proposed by this bill, or even by the amendment offered.

If the Committee on Appropriations will give money enough to survey a sufficient amount of lands and provide for the immigration that is coming into the country, they will have cared for the surveys of the public lands of the United States. The price paid is ample, and any man familiar with the facts will know that a five-thousand-dollar contract or a ten-thousand-dollar contract under the old rates would yield a profit to the contractor of from 50 to 75 per cent., and his season's work would not be over four months long; and that, too, in days when they had to rig up teams and hire more men than they needed, and hire arms to protect themselves against the Indians. The fear, therefore, that the survey system of the United States is going to be injured by this reduction is a baseless one.

Mr. CASWELL. I desire more particularly to call the attention of the committee to the effect of the amendment proposed by my colleague on the committee, the gentleman from Tennessee. I heartily sympathized with him, and I think the whole committee did, in fixing these amounts at a rate as low as the surveys could be well and effectually made. But his reduction to $4 per mile for section lines is a reduction of one-half of the amount now allowed by law. The survey of section lines embraces the great portion of the survey, and a reduction of one-half of the present rate is extreme.

Mr. ATKINS. To meet the objection of the gentleman from Wisconsin, who I know is very sincere about this matter, I am willing to modify my amendment by leaving the rate as it is in the bill as to section lines.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Tennessee modifies his amendment by proposing no amendment in that part of the paragraph.

Mr. CASWELL. I think that decidedly improves the amendment of the gentleman from Tennessee. But I think if the Committee of the Whole understood the work and labor and attention given to this subject by the Committee on Appropriations they would leave this paragraph as it is now in the bill. We cannot suppose that any one, any member of the committee, or any other gentleman on this floor can understand this subject as well as the Commissioner of the General Land Office. We consulted him on this question, and he fixed amounts which were regarded as reasonable, and we have reduced his figures $1 per mile and put those reduced rates into the bill.

I say we should avoid extremes upon this question. We should not fix the price at so low a rate that we would fail to obtain efficient surveys. A medium ground was thought to be more feasible and much safer, because while in some portions of the country, it is true, surveys may be made cheaply, yet in hilly, rough portions it costs very much more. And the language of the bill is that the amount paid shall not exceed the amount fixed here; and the Commissioner of the General Land Office should grade that amount down if it is too high. I believe the amounts named in the bill are the wisest and the best for the committee to adopt.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is upon the amendment of the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. ATKINS] as modified by him.

The question was taken; and upon a division there were—ayes 28, noes 32.

Mr. ATKINS. I call for tellers. I make the point that no quorum has voted.

Tellers were ordered; and Mr. ATKINS and Mr. CASWELL were appointed.

Mr. ATKINS. I will withdraw my point that no quorum voted.

Mr. McMILLIN. I renew it.

Mr. ATKINS. Do not do that.

Mr. McMILLIN. Very well; I will withdraw it.

So the amendment was not agreed to.

Mr. CONVERSE. I desire to move an amendment to the pending paragraph.

Mr. PAGE. I have an amendment on the Clerk's desk.

The CHAIRMAN. That the Chair understands is a substitute for the paragraph. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. CONVERSE] moves to amend the paragraph.

Mr. CONVERSE. I move to amend by inserting, in line 1471, after the words "Land Office," the words "and in the township;" and in line 1472, after the word "are," insert the words "situate and;" so that it will read:

That no certificates issued for a deposit of money for the survey of lands * * * shall be received in payment for lands except at the Land Office and in the township in which the land surveyed for which the deposit was made are situate and subject to entry.

Mr. HISCOCK. I reserve all points of order on that amendment; I did not hear it distinctly.

Mr. CONVERSE. No point of order can lie against that amendment.

Mr. HISCOCK. I presume not; but I want to reserve any that do lie against it.

The CHAIRMAN. The points of order will be regarded as reserved.

Mr. CONVERSE. I have offered this amendment for the purpose of requiring those who deposit money for surveys to take their pay in lands in the township where the survey is made. If I understand the bill as it now is, it allows this scrip to be located within the land district where the survey is made. And gentlemen claim that that is an end of the deposit system.

Mr. VALENTINE. So it is.

Mr. CONVERSE. That I apprehend is an entire mistake. For instance, in the Territory of Montana there are but two land districts. In that Territory there are but about 20 per cent. of the lands that is fit for pasturage, including 7 per cent. that is arable; so that there is from 75 to 80 per cent. of the land in that Territory that is utterly valueless, at least for the present.

Now, under this bill any one who may desire to deposit money for the purpose of getting land scrip in that Territory would have no trouble in finding townships of land, indeed whole counties of land, almost valueless for settlement, but which could be surveyed under this system, and scrip obtained to be located upon the rich valleys in the Territories, and thus the best portions of the land in that Territory could be secured. If I apprehend the bill aright as it now stands, it does not interfere at all with the deposit system. Surveys may be made under this bill in the land district of worthless land to any extent.

Mr. RYAN. Yes; but under the law as it now exists the scrip could be used anywhere in the United States. By this bill it is restricted to the land district, and the amendment of the gentleman would restrict it to the township.

Mr. CONVERSE. But of what practical advantage is it to restrict it to a land district? A land district may extend two hundred miles on either side, and under this bill worthless lands could be surveyed in that district, and the scrip could be used to locate good lands in any part of the district.

Mr. RYAN. This scrip is not located on any and all lands; it is simply received as so much money in payment of land.

Mr. CONVERSE. Certainly, that is what I mean. A man can go and select the best land in the Territory. Affidavits may be made by straw-men, which my friend knows about as well as I do, and the next thing that would be done would be to pay this scrip for land, and the man would be entitled to his deed from the Government. Under this provision the scrip is assignable, so that speculators can get control of the best land in the land district. And the land districts in which to accomplish all of this work are large enough to still continue the evil complained of, and the limiting the use of the scrip to the land district does not practically work an abandonment of the deposit system.

Mr. RYAN. I suppose my friend understands very well that this scrip cannot be used on all lands.

Mr. CONVERSE. Certainly.

Mr. RYAN. Practically none of it can be used in homestead lands, because in those cases there is nothing to pay but the fees, and it is only pre-emption land to which it can materially and practically apply.

Mr. CONVERSE. But my friend is aware that if a homesteader has been there and acquired his land he can pay for it by this scrip.

Mr. VALENTINE. That is true.

Mr. CONVERSE. I will call the attention of my friend to the fact that this bill does not remedy the evil at all.

Mr. CASWELL. Let me show how it does.

Mr. CONVERSE. The location may be made in the land district, and the land district is so large that the evil would still continue.

Mr. CASWELL. I know the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. CONVERSE] wants to be correct. Let me show him how this provision does work a remedy. For instance, in the State of Colorado last year there was located only a little over 200,000 acres of land by this scrip.

Mr. CONVERSE. I understand that.

Mr. CASWELL. While there was surveyed in that State 6,000,000 acres. Now, if the scrip had been confined to the land district of Colorado it would not have been available for lands in other districts.

Mr. CONVERSE. There might not have been so much of it available, but I claim that the fraud would have been as great in that event as it is now.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. CONVERSE. I desire to have a minute or two longer, because my time has been so taken up by interruptions. I want to make one or two more suggestions on this point.

The evil complained of is the surveying of worthless lands. According to the old law the scrip had to be located in the township when the survey was made. These surveys under the law were authorized upon the theory that the settler is already there and wants his own land surveyed so that he may locate it and define the boundaries. Now, if that be so, and the settler puts up his money for that survey, what objection is there to limiting him in the use of the scrip to the township in which the survey is made?

Mr. RYAN. This is the objection: the man who goes upon unsurveyed Government land and desires to take it under the homestead law, and who has a right to a Government survey, would not put up his money unless he could get some part of the scrip beyond the township. [Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. WILLITS. I have a word to say in reference to the amendment. There is of course an evil to be abated if we can reach it. The evil as the law once existed was that nothing less than a township could be surveyed. In that township there might be not more than one hundred and sixty acres of valuable land. The man settling upon those one hundred and sixty acres would want it surveyed, but in order to get a survey he was obliged under the law to deposit money sufficient to pay for the survey of the whole township, which might cost $800 or $1,000. What was the result? The man lost the excess that he had paid for the purpose of obtaining a survey. That was the evil sought to be cured.

Mr. CONVERSE. Now I desire to put to the gentleman this question: if there were only one hundred and sixty acres of good land in a township, why should the Government pay $1,000 or $1,500 for surveying the entire township?

Mr. WILLITS. That is a legitimate question. I will say to the gentleman that this whole subject came up in the Forty-fifth Congress. Under the lead of the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. ATKINS] an effort was made to revise this whole system of surveys. I stood with the gentleman from Tennessee in that effort, but we received comparatively little support in that effort to establish a system by which nothing but the good land should be surveyed. For various reasons—as I thought largely because there were so many surveyors and deputy surveyors, contractors, &c., all over the West—our Western friends voted down the proposition. In order to cure the evil complained of, they said, "Let the man who is obliged to pay for the surveying of a township sell his certificate to somebody who wants to settle elsewhere." So the law was amended by allowing these certificates to be used all over the United States.

It is manifest, Mr. Chairman, that very great frauds have been committed in respect to this matter. The Committee on Appropriations now seek to prevent such frauds. [Here the hammer fell.]

The question being taken on the amendment of Mr. CONVERSE, it was not agreed to; there being—ayes 26, noes 31.

Mr. HOLMAN. I move to amend by adding to the paragraph these words:

But such certificates of deposit issued hereafter shall not be assignable.

Mr. HISCOCK. I make a point of order upon this amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. It would seem to be a change of existing law——

Mr. HISCOCK. Further than that, it is not germane to the subject-matter of the bill.

Mr. HOLMAN. I would remind the Chair that the question as to whether this whole provision was in order or not was submitted to a vote of the Committee of the Whole. The provision did not in terms retrench expenditures nor was it strictly germane, but the Committee of the Whole held it to be in order. Inasmuch as this provision now stands before the committee, I submit that an amendment which is germane to the proposition must be in order. My amendment is germane. I understood the gentleman from New York to say in a previous part of this debate that these certificates are not assignable—that the act of March 3, 1879, which virtually repealed——

Mr. CASWELL. No, sir——

Mr. HOLMAN. The gentleman will excuse me. He must remember that the Commissioner of the General Land Office tells us that under the act of March 3, 1879, making these certificates assignable, these frauds have been perpetrated.

Mr. HISCOCK. That is correct; he does say that. The evil is to be remedied in two ways: one by repealing the assignability of these certificates; the other by limiting the area within which the lands shall be situated for which these certificates are received in payment. We have adopted the latter method—not repealing the assignability of the certificates at all, but limiting the area within which they may be received in payment for lands to the land district. The whole question before the committee now is upon the limitation of that area.

Mr. HOLMAN. I cannot yield further to the gentleman. My proposition is that where a provision is pending before the Committee of the Whole in an appropriation bill, having been declared to be in order, an amendment to that provision, if germane, is from the very necessity of parliamentary law in order. I concede that the original proposition was of questionable regularity on this bill; but the Committee of the Whole held it to be in order; and here is an amendment germane to that provision. How is it possible that it should not be held to be in order?

The CHAIRMAN. The Committee of the Whole having decided the point of order yesterday upon the main proposition, it is the duty of the Chair to submit this question, if the gentleman from New York insists on his point of order, to the decision of the committee. The question is, Shall the point of order made by the gentleman from New York be sustained?

The question being taken, there were—ayes 34, noes 31.

Mr. HOLMAN. No quorum has voted.

The CHAIRMAN appointed Mr. HISCOCK and Mr. HOLMAN as tellers.

The committee again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 67, noes 36.

So the point of order was sustained, and the amendment ruled out.

Mr. HOLMAN. I move to add to the paragraph the following:

The Clerk read as follows:

No public lands which are adapted to agriculture shall be surveyed under the foregoing appropriation except such as shall be from time to time required for actual settlement under the provisions of the homestead law.

Mr. HISCOCK. I make the point of order on that.

Mr. HOLMAN. This is a limitation simply on the appropriation, saying the money shall not be expended except in a certain way.

Mr. HISCOCK. It changes the whole system of survey under the law.

Mr. HOLMAN. It does change the law.

Mr. HISCOCK. And does not reduce expenditure.

Mr. HOLMAN. I concede it changes the law, but simply by limiting the expenditure of the money. The Chair has held repeatedly that we may say under the rules of the House the purpose to which it shall be applied or shall not be applied. I think the practice has been uniform in that regard.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair reminds the gentleman from Indiana that change of law is only permitted where expenditure is retrenched when reported by a committee having jurisdiction of the subject. Otherwise amendments proposed by individuals on the floor must reduce the amounts covered by the bill.

Mr. HOLMAN. The Chair does not apprehend what I intended to express and what I think I did express, and that is that it is undoubtedly within the power of this Committee of the Whole to say that no portion of this money shall be expended in Nebraska or Colorado, but shall be confined to a specific subject. It has never been questioned such an amendment is legitimate, limiting or restraining the expenditure of an appropriation in a general appropriation bill.

The CHAIRMAN. But this amendment makes no limitation in that form. The law provides generally for the survey of the public lands, not only for lands under the homestead law but for lands generally. On the contrary, this provides that no lands adapted to agriculture shall be surveyed under the foregoing appropriation except such as shall be from time to time required for actual settlement.

Mr. HOLMAN. It provides what lands shall be surveyed and nothing more, and limits the survey to lands of agriculture, as required from time to time by pre-emptors under the provisions of the homestead law.

Now, cannot the House adopt an amendment that this appropriation of $400,000 shall be confined to the survey of mineral lands? Could we not say it shall be confined to the survey of prairie lands or to timber lands? If we may say that, it seems to me we can say that no lands of a given class shall be surveyed unless required for settlement under the homestead law.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair thinks the gentleman may accomplish his object by a different phraseology. The present amendment seems practically to change existing law.

Mr. HOLMAN. If the Chair will indicate, as we say to the court, what language will cover the case I will adopt it.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman has indicated the language himself which will bring it into the rule, providing that no part of the money appropriated in this act shall be used for the survey of lands so and so.

Mr. HOLMAN. I think that is exactly what I have stated.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will submit the question.

Mr. HOLMAN. It limits the expenditure of this appropriation and is not the adoption of any general rule. It restricts the application of this money.

Mr. WILLITS. I suppose it would indirectly reduce expenditures under this bill if the surveys were confined to the lands indicated in the amendment, that is to the survey of arable agricultural lands. But, Mr. Chairman, in order to survey agricultural lands and arable lands you will have to change the whole system of surveys.

The CHAIRMAN. It does not limit the survey to arable and agricultural lands, but simply says so far as it affects agricultural lands they shall be only surveyed as required for actual settlement under the homestead law.

Mr. WILLITS. Admit that; but under the present system all the agricultural lands would be surveyed under this bill, and in addition other lands, and that necessarily would be so. Therefore in one sense it reduces expenditure; but on the other hand you would have no provision for change of the system of surveys. You have now no system by which you can survey only the arable agricultural lands; and therefore it might be not only a substantial change of the law but involve additional expense. So that on its face it is a debatable question whether it reduces even expenditure.

Mr. HOLMAN. There is nothing here that prohibits the running of base lines for the purpose of laying out these surveys. The agricultural lands are to be surveyed——

Mr. WILLITS. Permit me a moment further. The gentleman from Indiana will certainly concede that if he is to survey a piece of arable land, he wants to indicate it by connecting it with something which will locate it in some manner and somewhere, and which may necessitate the survey of lands other than those contemplated by him.

Mr. HOLMAN. There is nothing whatever to prevent that in this amendment under the $400 provision. But the arable lands are only to be surveyed to the extent required for actual settlement under the homestead law.

Mr. WILLITS. But the gentleman from Indiana will bear in mind that in order to locate the arable lands you must lay out township lines, and worthless lands must be surveyed in order to lay out the good lands.

Mr. HOLMAN. The gentleman will find that that provision of the law is not interfered with at all. This only provides that the arable lands shall be surveyed as required by the homestead laws, and not as now required under the pre-emption laws, which make them subjects of speculation and deprive the people of the advantages from them which the law was intended to confer.

The CHAIRMAN. Will the gentleman from Indiana allow the Chair to suggest that under existing law there are already standing appropriations for surveys of the public lands; and that these surveys would still go on even if this amendment were adopted? The Chair does not like to rule the amendment out on the point of order, inasmuch as it is not in the judgment of the Chair entirely susceptible of the objection which has been made against it; but the Chair simply desires to call attention to the fact that this standing appropriation is already in existence by which the same thing can be done even if this amendment is adopted.

Mr. HOLMAN. The only standing appropriation is that which is derived from the surveys themselves——

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair prefers not to rule the amendment out of order, and will submit it to a vote of the committee under the construction placed upon it by the gentleman from Indiana himself.

Mr. HISCOCK. If the Chair will bear with me for a moment I am inclined to think, on examination, that this amendment is not perhaps subject to the point of order, although the point of order has been made against it. I presume that it is within the province of Congress to refuse to appropriate any money for any purpose, and therefore it was perhaps proper to limit the purpose for which this money should be expended. I believe, however, this amendment should be voted down; and I do not think we will be able to improve the provisions of the bill as reported from the Committee on Appropriations. I therefore withdraw the point of order and will let the committee dispose of this question upon its merits.

Mr. RYAN. It seems to me that such a question as this, affecting the whole public-land system, ought not to be dealt with in this summary manner. The practical effect of this proposition if adopted is that all lands surveyed under the provisions of this bill under this appropriation shall be done under the homestead law, and not otherwise. That is the effect of it.

Mr. HOLMAN. That is with reference to all agricultural lands.

Mr. RYAN. The public domain of this country may under existing law be taken up under either the homestead or the pre-emption laws. Now this practically repeals the pre-emption law.

Mr. HOLMAN. It does that very thing.

Mr. RYAN. And it is a thing of that sort, affecting as it does the whole public-land system, which needs mature consideration, and should not be undertaken in this hasty and inconsiderate manner. Let a proposition of that kind come up and be duly considered by some committee and receive consideration of the House in that manner. But a system that has existed for many years, that has brought upon the country lasting and enduring blessings, should not be wiped out in this hasty manner. I do not know but when the time comes for the consideration of this question openly upon its merits I may be able to agree with the gentleman from Indiana. But it is not wise legislation to break away from the whole system which has worked so well with our public lands, and, as I have said, brought upon this country the blessings with which it has been endowed in connection with this great public domain.

The CHAIRMAN. Debate is exhausted.

Mr. HOLMAN. I desire to say a word simply in response to the gentleman from Michigan. I concede that this amendment would repeal the pre-emption law; but I would bring before the House in this connection a recollection of the fact that in these very pre-emption laws more frauds have been perpetrated upon the public lands, and are more fruitful of evil to the people of this country than any other one single provision of the law upon any subject now in force. Gentlemen who are conversant with the system and with the operations of the law under it will bear me out in that statement. Under the existing law they are open simply to speculation, and not to confer benefits upon the people. Now, all I ask in this amendment is that the arable lands of the Government shall be surveyed to the actual settlers under the homestead laws. This homestead law I regard, Mr. Chairman, as the most humane law ever passed by Congress, and yet for twenty years, largely upon the same argument which has been used by my friend from Kansas, the time has been postponed for reserving the agricultural land to the provisions of the homestead law. That law, when it was enacted, was received with gratitude and hailed with delight by the whole people of this country. You are now permitting these lands to be exhausted, instead of, under its humane provisions, reserving its benefits to the people. Those who should receive the benefit of it are deprived of it, and the pre-emption laws have become the basis of land speculation, which does not attempt to seize and hold possession of the lands until labor has exhausted itself upon them and accumulated little homes, then these lands are taken up and thrown upon the market and the possessors deprived of their rights.

I say, sir, that this provision is simply in harmony with the homestead law and its spirit. Had it not been for the great public disorders which sprang up after the 30th of May, 1862, when that law was enacted, the people of this country would long since have wrested these lands from the plunderers and the speculators and dedicated them solely to the establishment of homes for the landless people of this country.

The question being taken on Mr. HOLMAN'S amendment, there were—ayes 20, noes 38.

So (further count not being called for) the amendment was not agreed to.

Mr. BRENTS. I offer the amendment which I send to the Clerk's desk:

The Clerk read as follows:

In line 1439 strike out "$400,000" and insert "$800,000;" so that it will read: "For surveying the public lands $800,000, at rates not exceeding," &c.

Mr. BRENTS. It is manifest from what has taken place in the committee that the legislation proposed by the Committee on Appropriations, which virtually repeals the act of March 3, 1879, will be adopted and will become law. That will necessitate a much larger appropriation for the surveys of the public lands, as the repeal of that law effectually strikes down the deposit system. The Secretary of the Interior, in the letter that was read yesterday and printed in the RECORD, makes this statement:

I have the honor to reply—

In answer to an inquiry from the Committee on Appropriations—that should said bill 859—

Which is in substance the amendment reported by the Committee on Appropriations—become a law, it would be necessary to increase the estimate for surveying the public lands from $400,000 to from $1,000,000 to $1,250,000, and that the item, &c.

Further on in this same letter he says:

During the last fiscal year the appropriation by Congress for surveys was $300,000, and the amount deposited for surveys was a little over $1,800,000.

Making $2,100,000 that were applied in payment of the surveys of the public lands made during the last fiscal year.

If the deposit system is abolished, as it will be by this legislation, it certainly will be necessary to make larger appropriations for the general surveys, even if the demand is no greater for the next fiscal year than it has been in the past. But the tide of immigration from foreign countries is pouring into this country in a much larger volume than ever before. People are going upon these public lands and settling. Many of them are unsurveyed. Disputes arise in regard to their boundaries. No man can acquire a title to his land until it is surveyed, and you cannot expect settlers to take up simply those lands that are surveyed while there are better lands lying just beyond that are unsurveyed.

I think it is the true policy of this Government to survey all of these lands as soon as possible. The purpose for which they were acquired was that they might be settled, might become homes and be utilized in the production of sustenance for the people that are coming and settling in this country. We want these products; we want to sell these lands and to get the proceeds into the Treasury of the United States. We do not want them to lie idle. And this is a very small part of what the appropriation should be. I therefore submit we should at least increase this amount to $800,000, which is but a little more than one-third of what was used in the last year for surveys of the public lands.

The question being taken on the amendment offered by Mr. BRENTS, it was not agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. If no other amendments are offered to perfect the text of the pending paragraph the Chair will now recognize the gentleman from California, [Mr. PAGE,] who proposes to offer a substitute for the entire paragraph.

Mr. PAGE. I offer an amendment in the nature of a substitute, which I send to the desk and ask the Clerk to read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out from line 1439 to 1475, inclusive, and insert in lieu thereof the following:

"That hereafter all agricultural lands in the United States remaining unsold at the passage of this act shall be disposed of only under the provisions of the homestead and timber-culture acts; and all laws and parts of laws in conflict with the provisions of this act are hereby repealed. And the Secretary of the Interior shall cause to be surveyed so much of the public lands in the States and Territories where they exist as in his judgment shall facilitate settlement; and he may use for this purpose so much of the moneys derived from the sale of timber lands, coal lands, mineral lands, or of any of the public lands as may be necessary; such surveys to be made by contract at prices now fixed by law. But the sum so expended in any one year shall not exceed $300,000."

Mr. HISCOCK. I make the point of order on that amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will hear the gentleman from California on the point of order.

Mr. PAGE. I think there cannot be any question as to the fact that the amendment is not subject to the point of order. I strike out the appropriation of $400,000 from the bill. I desire to say to my friend from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] and my friend from Tennessee, [Mr. ATKINS,] those two gentlemen who I know are fond of professing a desire, and I believe sincerely are endeavoring, to reform the laws of the United States, particularly the laws relating to surveys of the public lands, I think I can convince them——

Mr. HISCOCK. I call for a division of the question on the point of order: first, as to the amount; second, as to the balance of the proposition.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is obliged to consider the entire proposition when the point of order is made. If the point of order is good against any part of it, it must defeat the whole. What is legitimate cannot carry into the bill what is illegitimate.

Mr. PAGE. Does the Chair desire to hear me on the point of order?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is ready to hear the gentleman.

Mr. ATKINS. I hope the gentleman from California will address himself to this feature of the point of order. His amendment proposes to fix the price of surveys above that fixed in the bill.

Mr. PAGE. I will change that.

Mr. ATKINS. Will you change your amendment so as to conform to the rate in the bill?

Mr. PAGE. Yes, sir.

Mr. ATKINS. You will modify your substitute in that way?

Mr. PAGE. I will modify my amendment in accordance with the suggestion of the gentleman from Tennessee.

My amendment, in the form of a substitute for the pending paragraph, proposes a change in existing law, but it also retrenches expenditures in that it strikes out the $400,000 proposed to be appropriated by this bill, and provides that the surveys of public lands in the future shall be made by the order and under the authority of the Secretary of the Interior, and paid for from moneys derived from the sales of certain lands; the whole amount of money to be used for surveys in any one year not to exceed the sum of $300,000.

That will accomplish what the amendment of the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] sought to accomplish in part, a change of the law in reference to the settlement of the public lands. It proposes to repeal the pre-emption laws, and permits the agricultural lands of the country to be taken up and occupied only by those who want to occupy them under the homestead and timber-culture laws of the country. Therefore the amendment is clearly in order, and if the Chair will so hold I would like then to give my reasons why I think the Committee of the Whole ought to adopt the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will rule upon the point of order if no other gentleman desires to be heard further upon it.

The amendment proposes a modification of the system of land laws of the United States very completely and entirely, so far as agricultural lands are concerned. It provides for the survey of so much of them as shall facilitate settlement, and authorizes the Secretary of the Interior to use for that purpose so much of the moneys derived from the sale of timber lands, coal lands, mineral lands, or any of the public lands, as may be necessary. It further provides that such surveys shall be made by contract at prices now fixed by law. Then comes the clause under which it is claimed that the amendment is in order, and which is to this effect, "but the sum so expended in any one year shall not exceed $300,000."

The Chair remarks again, as he has had occasion to remark before, that the rule which provides that the subject-matter of an amendment to be offered by a committee having jurisdiction shall be germane to the subject-matter of the bill would make an amendment in order which generally retrenched expenditures when offered by a committee. But when it is offered by an individual member of the House, then the amendment must retrench expenditures in certain directions; by the reduction of the number and salary of the officers of the United States, of the compensation of any person paid out of the Treasury of the United States, or by the reduction of the amount of money covered by the bill. And this latter reduction, of the amount of money covered by the bill, must be the result directly and certainly of the provisions of the amendment.

Mr. HISCOCK. The reduction must be worked out by the provisions of the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. It does not appear that that reduction is wrought by this amendment, in view of the fact that the money for the surveys is to be derived from the sales of the public lands.

Mr. PAGE. Only a certain amount of it; it is limited to $300,000 for any one year.

The CHAIRMAN. By the last clause of the amendment the money to be expended——

Mr. PAGE. For surveys.

The CHAIRMAN. For surveys in any one year is to be limited to $300,000.

The Chair does not think that the entire change of law proposed here would have the legitimate and direct effect of reducing the amount covered by the bill so as to enable the gentleman to carry the serious modification of the general law proposed by means of the last provision of his amendment. In other words, it is not the proposed change in the law that will produce the result, but the limit put by the amendment upon the expenditure.

If the gentleman were to offer an amendment in the form of a proviso to the bill, that any amount appropriated by this bill to be expended during this year, or any following year, shall not exceed $300,000, that would be a reduction of the amount covered by the bill. But the difficulty which the Chair has in all these matters, and with which he cannot reconcile the character of this amendment, is that the rule contemplates that the modification of the law shall produce economy in the direction suggested by the rule. It was not intended that the proposed reduction should be used as a means of introducing into a bill, by way of amendment, a change of the general laws of the land. That is the precise difficulty with the Chair in regard to all these questions.

Mr. PAGE. How can the Chair rule this amendment out of order after having admitted the amendment of the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. HOLMAN,] which upon its face did not reduce at all the amount proposed by the bill?

The CHAIRMAN. That amendment provided an application of the amount proposed by the bill to certain uses. The Chair thinks that, following the spirit and letter of the rule, he should rule this substitute out of order.

Mr. PAGE. Then I move another amendment, to strike out of the pending paragraph "$400,000" and insert in lieu thereof "$500,000." I make that amendment rather pro forma, and for the purpose of getting an opportunity to give my reasons for offering at this time the amendment which the Chair has ruled out of order.

I regret very much that my amendment in the form of a substitute was ruled out of order by the Chair. I have no fault to find with the Chair in reference to his decision. But I believe that if the amendment had been adopted it would have saved this House in future Congresses the humiliating spectacle of some of the scenes which have been enacted here during the last few days.

We find our friends on the other side of the House, who are responsible for this legislation—I refer to the act of 1879, and to the fact that the Committee on Appropriations, under the leadership of the gentleman from Tennessee, [Mr. ATKINS,] has increased the amount of appropriations for surveys up to the present standard—we find them denouncing this whole system in the most violent terms as a fraud. Yet if it is a fraud, then it is a fraud which has been put upon this House and upon the country by the very gentlemen who are now the most severe in denouncing it. I have myself never been the friend of the deposit system, for it is well known that on two or three occasions I have sought to repeal it. But I found that the Appropriations Committee used this as a pretext; that the reason they gave for not appropriating more money for surveys was that the people had all the relief they needed under the deposit system.

Now, it has been stated here that surveyors-general have certified that land has been surveyed by deputy surveyors, when in fact they had never been upon the ground at all. If this is the fact, I say your whole system ought to be torn up by the roots and thrown out of this Capitol bodily. If under the rule of the Republican party surveyors-general holding their offices by appointment of the President have been guilty of the infamous practices which have been charged upon them, this system is rotten to the core and ought to be abolished. As for me, I will never, while these charges remain unanswered, vote another dollar out of the public Treasury to be used for the surveys of the public land in the manner in which the money is used now. A Republican on this side of the House denounced the system in the most bitter terms; a Democrat on the other side said he knew of his own personal knowledge that these frauds were being committed. Yet this committee proposes to take $400,000 out of the public Treasury and put it into the hands of the same men, that they may re-enact the same frauds which they are charged with having enacted during the last four or five years. There is no consistency in your position, gentlemen. If these things are true, put in the knife and prune away the abuses until you have struck a policy in regard to which no member can at a future day stand up here and call attention to it as productive of immense frauds.

The gentleman from New York stated that 200,000 acres of land had been stolen bodily from the United States during the last year.

Yet all the committee has done to remedy this is to strike out of the act of 1879 the provision allowing the certificates provided for by law to be used in locating lands outside of the land district in which the survey is made. They appropriate to carry on this iniquitous system $400,000 out of the Treasury of the United States. I say the people demand something different from this. If the evils alleged do exist, this committee should have gone to the bottom of the matter—should have come in here with a bill providing that these lands should be surveyed upon the application of the actual settler. [Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. HISCOCK. Mr. Chairman, no man will give to the gentleman from California [Mr. PAGE] more credit than I will for patriotism and integrity of purpose. I concede that in both these respects he stands pre-eminent. Yet, while he assails the Committee on Appropriations for what they have done, and while he calls upon them to put in the pruning-knife still deeper, I cannot forget that the proposition to reform the system under which these abuses have grown up, the proposition designed for the prevention of these abuses, has been resisted by him from the time this bill came in until the present.

Mr. PAGE. What have I resisted?

Mr. HISCOCK. The gentleman, by the point of order which he struggled to have sustained in this House——

Mr. PAGE. My point of order did not go against the amount paid for surveys, and the gentleman knows it.

Mr. HISCOCK. The provision against which the gentleman urged his point of order is the provision which is to correct and strike down these frauds. There is no doubt about that. That is the testimony of every person who has investigated this subject. I apprehend that if the Committee on Appropriations had reported the law of last year the gentleman from California would have acquiesced in its provisions. [Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. PAGE. I withdraw the pro forma amendment.

Mr. ATKINS. I renew it. The gentleman from California seems to talk as though this deposit system had been inaugurated by the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. PAGE. No, sir, I did not say that; I said it had been passed by a Democratic House.

Mr. ATKINS. Well, it was not inaugurated by a Democratic House.

Mr. PAGE. The objectionable feature which you now propose to strike out was.

Mr. ATKINS. It was inaugurated in 1862.

Mr. PAGE. There was no objection, I understand, to the original law.

Mr. ATKINS. It was amended in 1864 and has been amended once or twice since. Now, I could not exactly gather what charges the gentleman had to make against the Committee on Appropriations of the last Congress; but he seemed to think they had been guilty of some wrong, some outrage, some dereliction of duty. I really do not know what his charge is.

Mr. PAGE. I did not make any charge; I said the Committee on Appropriations in the last Congress increased the surveys up to the present amount.

Mr. ATKINS. Well, Mr. Chairman, the Committee on Appropriations of the last Congress did do that thing.

Mr. PAGE. That is what I said.

Mr. ATKINS. I believe it was done at the first session of the last Congress. The gentleman from Georgia, [Mr. BLOUNT,] whom I now see in his seat, has already made an explanation of that matter. He had charge of the sundry civil appropriation bill during the sessions of the Forty-sixth Congress; and he has informed the House that the provisions referred to were put upon the bill as amendments in the Senate—were not reported from the Committee on Appropriations in the original bill. If the increase was made in the Senate, and if the gentleman from Georgia, with the other conferees on the part of the House, had to agree to the increase in order to get the bill passed, I do not think it is a capital crime. Everybody in this House knows that the gentleman from Georgia has been a practical economist; that he has endeavored to reduce expenditures wherever he could. Many accuse him of crippling the service in his endeavors in that direction. I have never accused him of any such thing; I do not believe any such thing. I think the gentleman from California in attacking the Committee on Appropriations of the last House has made a random shot; he is not shooting a rifle; he is not driving a center; he is scattering around generally.

Mr. RANDALL. This law did not originate with the Democratic party, as stated by the gentleman from Tennessee, but the Democratic House did endeavor to ingraft certain modifications upon the original law.

But, Mr. Chairman, there is no reason why, if the Democratic party in the last Congress found those modifications did not work as they expected, they should not join the other side to correct what may be wrong and to carry out what experience has proved to be right.

Mr. RYAN. If the Democratic party is responsible for the law, it has nothing, in my judgment, to apologize for. It is only the abuse of the law of which we complain.

Mr. RANDALL. I am only saying whenever it shall appear we have ingrafted on the statute-book of the country any matter which does not come up to the expectation and does not work well in practice, it is competent and it is right, and it is not only right but it is our duty, to modify the law so that we shall do away with that which is wrong and secure that which is right, by doing that which experience has proved to be wise and proper.

The pro forma amendment was withdrawn.

The Clerk read as follows:

For the Ute commission: For this amount, or so much thereof as may be necessary, for the payment of expenses of the Ute commission provided for under section 2 of the "act to accept and ratify the agreement submitted by the confederated bands of Ute Indians in Colorado for the sale of their reservation in said State, and for other purposes," $15,000.

Mr. SCALES. It strikes me, Mr. Chairman, that paragraph demands some explanation. In June, 1880, this Ute agreement was ratified and the sum of $25,000 was appropriated to pay the expenses of the commission. There were five commissioners paid at the rate of $10 a day; and $25,000 was appropriated in order to pay the expenses of the commission to do that work. In 1881 $15,000 more was appropriated, making $40,000; and in 1882 $15,000 more, making altogether $55,000 for the expenses of this Ute commission. And I beg to call attention to the fact that $55,000 does not include any expense of survey, nor does it include the expense of any allotment or setting apart of the lands to the Indians. This $55,000 was for nothing else than to pay the necessary expenses of these commissioners and provide them with a clerk.

Now, I would respectfully ask the honorable chairman of the Committee on Appropriations to give us some explanation why this large amount is needed. What has become of the money already appropriated? Does it take these five commissioners three years to perform the work?

And let me call attention, Mr. Chairman, for a moment to what the appropriations have been. We appropriated for the payment of the expenses of these commissioners the sum of $25,000, which was considered ample at the time. We also appropriated for the cost of removing and settlement of the Utes, surveying their lands, establishing schools, building mills and agency, purchasing stock, &c., the sum of $350,000. There is a specific appropriation for every single thing in this bill.

In 1881 they made a report that these Indians had been transferred to their new homes. There was nothing to be done than to allot the lands. They were to be surveyed. These surveyors were paid. Now, I respectfully ask the chairman to give us some explanation why $55,000 was spent and three years taken up in doing that for which $25,000 and one year was deemed entirely sufficient?

Mr. RYAN. I will state for the information of the gentleman and the House that, however just some of his criticisms may be in regard to this commission and its extravagance, nevertheless the fact remains that a portion of the work is still uncompleted.

Mr. SCALES. What portion is unfinished?

Mr. RYAN. That is precisely the point I was about to state. The Southern Utes have not yet been removed from their reservation, and the commission is now engaged in that work. Instead of $15,000 they asked for $25,000. We thought $15,000 was sufficient. If the gentleman wishes to add any amendment providing this shall be the end of that commission and the end of the expenses to be incurred by it, I have no objection to it. But, Mr. Chairman, it is necessary they should complete their work, and to do that this appropriation is necessary.

Mr. SCALES. If it is necessary to complete the work, I think it should be done.

Mr. RYAN. As they are engaged in it, probably it is the cheapest way to do it.

Mr. SCALES. I move to strike out the last word. Now, Mr. Chairman, this is a matter which requires investigation. I think the gentleman from Kansas is mistaken. From the best evidence I can get I believe they have been removed, and the report will show it. Has there been any investigation into this matter? Has this work cost more than it should have cost? Is this $15,000 necessary? Is that the conclusion of the committee? I would like to know the facts in connection with it.

Mr. RYAN. I do not mean, Mr. Chairman, to be understood as saying that all of the money expended by that commission was justly or properly expended; in other words, I do not mean to be understood as saying that they have practiced in all respects proper and rigid economy; but I do mean to be understood as saying that there is so much of that work undone as makes it necessary to appropriate for its completion, and that is the reason this is incorporated.

Mr. SCALES. Mr. Chairman, I have only to say, in conclusion, that I will not make a motion to strike out any of this sum of money incorporated by the committee for this purpose in the bill, for I want the work to be done; but I think it right and proper that some criticism should be passed upon the conduct of those who do not in all respects discharge their duty, and I am glad the gentleman from Kansas agrees with me.

The Clerk read as follows:

For this amount, or so much thereof as may be necessary to enable the Secretary of the Interior to employ an agent for the Eastern Band of Cherokee Indians, in accordance with section 3 of the act approved July 27, 1868, $800.

Mr. RICE, of Massachusetts. Mr. Chairman, I desire to make a point of order upon that section and the one next following it; and if I can do so, I will make the point upon both, after the second paragraph has been read.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will hear the gentleman from Massachusetts upon the several paragraphs as they are read.

Mr. RICE, of Massachusetts. Then I make the point of order upon this paragraph. This is to enable the Secretary of the Interior to employ an agent for the Eastern Band of Cherokee Indians, &c. The point of order I make is that it is new legislation, and it does not tend toward economy. I have looked at section 3 of the act of July 27, 1868, referred to in this paragraph, but I find nothing justifying this item, and therefore I make the point of order for the reason that I must regard it as new legislation.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will hear the gentleman from Kansas upon the point of order and will be glad to be referred to the act in question.

Mr. RYAN. Mr. Chairman, I do not think that this provision is any more subject to the point of order than the provision in the legislative appropriation bill increasing the clerical force of the Departments would be. It is essential to the performance of the functions of the Department with reference to the Indian Bureau. In other words, the Indian Bureau cannot perform the functions for which it was organized except by the force indispensably necessary for that purpose. And I want to call the attention of the Chair to a provision of law in regard to these identical Indians which reads as follows; it is found on page 228 of volume 15 of the Statutes at Large:

Hereafter the Secretary of Interior shall cause the Commissioner of Indian Affairs to take the same supervisory charge over the Eastern or North Carolina Cherokees as of other tribes of Indians.

The CHAIRMAN. Will the gentleman from Kansas allow the Chair to remark that in this section, this very section of the act sent to him, the Eastern Band of Cherokees is not mentioned? It refers to the Sacs, Foxes, and other tribes, but not to the Cherokees.

Mr. VANCE. I will call attention, if the Chair will permit me, to page 228 of volume 15 of the Revised Statutes. The Chair will find in section 3 of the act approved 29th of July, 1868, what the gentleman from Kansas has referred to. If the Chair has not the volume I will furnish it.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Kansas has handed the section to which the gentleman refers to the Chair.

Mr. RYAN. Now, Mr. Chairman, it is impossible for the Indian Bureau to have supervisory charge of these Indians, except through the usual and well-known methods by an agent of its own appointment, and for that special purpose. It is not practicable for the Department to deal with those Indians without having official information touching their numbers, &c. The object, of course, of this provision is apparent upon the face of it, and that is to enable the Indian Bureau to adjust any differences between them and the Western Band of Cherokees growing out of the treaties which we have had with these Indians. We have been treating with the Indians for many years, and we have, if I recollect, twenty or twenty-one treaties with these Indians. There are two separate bands of Indians who are contesting with each other, so to speak, regarding their rights respectively growing out of many of these treaties. The Department, in order to know exactly how properly to adjust these differences and settle the rights of the parties, must have the means to take supervisory charge of them. The usual means employed is the appointment of an agent for that purpose and the taking of the census in order to know how many there are of them.

Mr. RICE, of Massachusetts. The gentleman from Kansas in his statement has suggested what I indicated at the outset, that this paragraph is to be sustained in connection with the succeeding one, and that it is calculated to consolidate the bands of Indians, to give them a status and condition, to find out their numbers, &c., so that certain differences may be adjusted between them and the Cherokee Nation, or the Western Cherokees.

If the Chair will notice, the first provision in this paragraph is to employ an agent for the Eastern Band of Cherokee Indians.

The next, and which would come just as well in this paragraph, is to cause a census to be taken and a new roll to be prepared of these Indians. And then comes the kernel of the whole thing in the last proviso:

Provided, That the Commissioner of Indian Affairs is hereby authorized and directed to make an equitable adjudication and settlement of all matters of dispute between the said Eastern and Western Cherokees arising from or growing out of treaty stipulation.

All those together are one single scheme with one single motive; and that is first to recognize this Eastern Band of Cherokee Indians as a tribe, to give them an agent.

Who are they? They are scattered about in North Carolina where they went at the time the Cherokees were removed to the western Territories. These left the main band. They did not accompany them. They left their old territory. They went into North Carolina, and there, without tribal conditions, without recognition heretofore by the Government as a separate and distinct tribe of Indians, without annuities, without payments such as are made to other tribes, citizens of North Carolina, voting in North Carolina, where they have resided for two generations, now they make claims to certain portions of the property of the Cherokee Nation, which claims are denied by the Cherokee Nation; claims to the property which the Cherokee Nation received from the United States in consideration of its removal to these western Territories, pay for subsistence and removal, and to which the Cherokee Nation proper denies that they have any right or title. This provision, therefore, is to give them an agent, that they may have a representative here in some way.

Mr. RYAN. That the Government may have a representative there.

Mr. RICE, of Massachusetts. Or that the Government may have a representative there and recognize for the first time a tribal condition and a power with which to deal in regard to these contested matters.

Mr. VANCE. Will the gentleman allow me a question?

Mr. RICE, of Massachusetts. With pleasure.

Mr. VANCE. Is the gentleman not aware the Government has frequently sent agents down there to take charge of these Indians?

Mr. RICE, of Massachusetts. They never before had a regular agent.

Mr. VANCE. Is there not a provision of law recognizing the Eastern and the North Carolina Cherokees and directing the Secretary of the Interior to take charge of them?

Mr. RICE, of Massachusetts. There is the Eastern band of Cherokee Indians; but they are those who broke off from the nation and refused to remain as part of the nation in the territory to which they had been assigned. Now, then—first an agent, then a census-taker, then authorizing the Commissioner of Indian Affairs to adjudicate and settle questions arising between these two communities. A bill has been introduced by the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. VANCE] into this very House giving these Eastern Cherokees the right to sue the Cherokee Nation on these very matters in the courts of the United States. That bill is now pending. It is before the Committee on Indian Affairs, and has not yet been reported. This paragraph is to accomplish indirectly the legislation sought by that bill. By the next paragraph, and the two paragraphs go together, it is intended that by the Commissioner of Indian Affairs these long-contested disputes may now be settled. For that purpose other measures are pending at this time in this House, thereby indicating surely that new legislation is necessary. And I do not see how it is possibly in the line of economy.

Mr. HASKELL rose.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Kansas desire to speak on the point of order?

Mr. HASKELL. I would like the Chair to state what is the point of order that has been made.

The CHAIRMAN. That this paragraph is new legislation; contrary to the rule.

Mr. HASKELL. Is it meant that an agent cannot be appointed without a special statute?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair understands the point of order to be that this is new legislation on an appropriation bill contrary to the rule. If the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. RICE] desires to state more distinctly what is the point of order he may do so.

Mr. HASKELL. The rule, if the Chair pleases, says nothing about new legislation. There is no such provision concerning new legislation in the rules.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state the rule provides that—

No appropriation shall be reported in any general appropriation bill or be in order as an amendment thereto for any expenditure not previously authorized by law, unless in continuation of appropriations for such public works, &c.

Mr. RICE, of Massachusetts. It is under that rule I make my point of order.

Mr. HASKELL. Now, then, the general statutes of the United States provide ample authority for the Indian Commissioner or the Secretary of the Interior to appoint Indian agents.

Mr. RANDALL. Then why put this in here?

Mr. HASKELL. It is put in here because they want the money to pay the men with.

Mr. SCALES. For the same reason you should have put it in the Indian appropriation bill.

Mr. HASKELL. Only that the attention of the committee was not called to the necessity of this amount at that time. If you turn to the Revised Statutes of the United States you will find—

The Commissioner of Indian Affairs shall, under the direction of the Secretary of the Interior, and agreeably to such regulations as the President may prescribe, for the management of all Indian affairs and of all matters arising out of Indian relations.

Then again:

The President shall, whenever he may judge it expedient, discontinue any Indian agency or transfer the same from the place or tribe designated by law to such other place or tribe as the public service may require.

And again:

A competent number of sub-Indian agents shall be appointed by the President, with a salary of $1,000 a year each, to be employed and to reside wherever the President may direct—

That is, where the Secretary or the Indian Commissioner, who act under the President, shall direct—and who shall give bonds with one or more sureties in the penal sum of $1,000 for the faithful execution of their duties. But no sub-agent shall be appointed who shall reside within the limits of any agency where there is an agent appointed.

And so on through the general statutes are a dozen provisions authorizing the employment of agents. And this clause of the appropriation bill simply gives the Department money to send the men down there to investigate the condition of the North Carolina Indians.

Mr. RICE, of Massachusetts. Will my friend allow me a question? Has he anywhere read a statute which authorizes the Secretary of the Interior to employ agents?

Mr. HASKELL. Why, the gentleman from Massachusetts knows too well that when the statute says the President may do so and so that means the Secretary of the Interior. Why, sir, the statutes are covered with that phraseology. Wherever the statute says the President may do a certain thing it provides the President shall issue his order to the Secretary of the Interior, and from the Secretary it goes down to the Commissioner, &c.

That is the precise form of law, wherein general power is given to the Secretary of the Interior and the Indian Commissioner in every case, that the President shall do so and so.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Kansas [Mr. HASKELL] will allow the Chair to ask him if he desires the Chair to understand that there is now a law that authorizes the Secretary of the Interior or the President to appoint agents whose payment is not now provided for?

Mr. HASKELL. Certainly I do; and I have just read the provision of the Revised Statutes which says that a competent number of sub-Indian agents shall be appointed, who shall not reside within the limit of any other agents.

The CHAIRMAN. To what section of the Revised Statutes does the gentleman refer?

Mr. HASKELL. It is section 2065; and then there is section 2059. The power is given to the President to discontinue an agent whenever he may deem it necessary, or to send one anywhere.

Mr. SCALES. I would like to ask the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. HASKELL] this question, if every Indian agent provided for in the Indian appropriation bill is not appointed under that clause of the Revised Statutes?

Mr. HASKELL. Certainly; every one of them.

Mr. SCALES. Is there any reason why that law should not apply to this clause as it does to the clauses in the Indian appropriation bill?

Mr. HASKELL. Certainly not.

Mr. SCALES. If this clause was in the Indian appropriation bill, would there be any doubt about it?

Mr. HASKELL. Not at all. The President not only has authority to employ an Indian agent, but he has authority to dismiss any Indian agent, or to take him from one agency and transport him clear across the country and locate him in another place.

Mr. HARRIS, of Massachusetts. Or to hang him.

Mr. HASKELL. Well, I do not know but a great many of them ought to be hanged. So that the general statutes of the United States provide abundant law for the purpose.

More than that, I want to say that the President by law is made to take charge of the effects, to take charge of the affairs of Indians wherever they may be. He is the trustee, the guardian, the general agent of the Indian wherever he may be.

There is in North Carolina a large tract of land belonging to the North Carolina Cherokees. There are grave disputes between them and certain other Cherokees. There are schools down there under charge of the Secretary of the Interior for the education of their children. The law compels the President to take care of them and provide for them. In obedience to that law the Department now asks that this agent may be appointed, or rather that the money may be appropriated to pay this agent, in order that he may go down there and report on these lands, report on their schools, report on their general condition, investigate their claims, investigate their alleged wrongs if they have any, and come back and report to him. The statutes are covered all over with provisions giving authority of law for this.

Mr. HOOKER. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will hear the gentleman on the point of order.

Mr. HOOKER. Certainly, on the point of order. I desire to say that I do not think the argument of the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. HASKELL] touches at all the point of order made by the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. RICE.] If it does, then it shows completely that there is no necessity for putting this provision in an appropriation bill.

As I understand the point of order made by the gentleman from Massachusetts, it is that you cannot in a general appropriation bill create an office not provided for by law, and thus increase the expenditures of the Government. That is the point of order made by the gentleman from Massachusetts. But the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. HASKELL] says that there is power already under the general law; that the President has autocratic power on the subject; that he can create an agency; that he can discontinue an agency, or that he can transfer an agency wherever he pleases.

Mr. HASKELL. And I read the statute.

Mr. HOOKER. If that power already exists, then what the necessity for this legislation?

Mr. HASKELL. They want the money to pay him.

Mr. HOOKER. Why infringe the rules on the subject by inoculating an appropriation bill with a provision of this kind? If the President does not have power enough, then amend your law; if he now possesses the power you do not need to amend the law.

Mr. VANCE. Is it not necessary to appropriate the money to pay the agent?

Mr. HASKELL. That is all there is in it.

Mr. HOOKER. How many Indians are together in one locality?

Mr. VANCE. About 2,000.

Mr. HOOKER. In one locality?

Mr. VANCE. Not exactly in one locality; they live in different counties in Western North Carolina, but the counties are contiguous. And they have one plat of land consisting of 72,000 acres.

Mr. HOOKER. I want to say in that connection, and with regard to the point of order made, that the argument that the President possesses this power now might be used with reference to the Indians in any State. You might say the same in regard to the State of Mississippi, where you can find bands of Indians living in this county, that county, and the other. Yet from the time of the removal of the Choctaws and Cherokees from the State of Mississippi you have never heard of any application for an agent there. As to the Indians living in North Carolina, I am not aware that there are any treaty stipulations between the Cherokee Nation as such and the Government of the United States.

Mr. VANCE. I refer the gentleman to the treaty of 1835, which distinctly sets forth that a portion of the Cherokees had a right to remain in North Carolina. That is recognized in the treaty.

Mr. HOOKER. Exactly; and they had the same right to remain in Mississippi; and some of them exercised that right; but it was never held that therefore, under any general law or any policy of the Government, it was necessary to have an agent in Mississippi to look after their interests.

Mr. RYAN. Their separate tribal existence has been recognized by public law.

Mr. HOOKER. Only by implication. There was no specific treaty between the two bands of Indians. The treaties were between the Cherokee Nation and the Government. Whatever rights were secured to the Western and Eastern bands were secured by treaty with the whole nation. The point of order made by the gentleman from Massachusetts is, as I understand, that this is new legislation creating an office not recognized by law, and is not in order upon an appropriation bill.

Mr. SCALES. I desire, Mr. Chairman, to call your attention for a moment to the law referred to by the gentleman from Kansas. The Chair is well aware that at every session it becomes necessary to pass an Indian appropriation bill, and in that bill provision is made for every Indian agent now in office under the Government. It is not regarded as new legislation; nobody has ever contended that it was new legislation. There has never been an attempt made to rule out a provision of that sort upon the ground that it was new legislation. The law provides that those agents shall be appointed.

Now, as I asked the gentleman from Kansas a little while ago, suppose this clause instead of being introduced upon this bill had been in the Indian appropriation bill, would it be obnoxious to the point of order as new legislation? I think there can be no doubt these agents have a lawful existence under the general power of the President to appoint them where they are necessary. The only difference is that this provision instead of being on the Indian appropriation bill is inserted here.

At one time these Cherokees all lived in North Carolina, in Georgia, in Mississippi. Under the treaty with these Indians, which has been already referred to, a part of them were to remain in North Carolina, or elsewhere if they thought proper. So far back as the time when Mr. Crittenden was Attorney-General of the United States he decided that there were differences of construction under the treaty. A treaty is law; and what we now propose is to have this treaty construed in order to settle disputes which have existed between these tribes ever since a portion of them went west and another portion remained in North Carolina.

The CHAIRMAN. That is in the next paragraph, which is not now before the committee.

Mr. SCALES. Yes, sir; I am answering the gentleman from Mississippi.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair desires to hear no further argument against the point of order. [Mr. RICE, of Massachusetts, rose.] The gentleman from Massachusetts, as the Chair understands, desires to speak in support of the point of order. The Chair will listen to him.

Mr. RICE, of Massachusetts. I desire to say nothing further except that this agent has not yet been appointed by the President or the Secretary of the Interior. This is an indirect attempt to appoint an agent in a way not provided by any statute which has been read or by any provision of existing law.

Mr. VANCE. Does the Chair desire to hear nothing further on the point of order?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will hear the gentleman in support of the point of order.

Mr. HISCOCK. Has the Chair determined the point of order in his own mind?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will hear any gentleman who sustains the point of order. If the gentleman from North Carolina desires to argue in favor of the point of order——

Mr. VANCE. No, I am on the other side.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair desires to hear nothing further on the other side. Does the gentleman from New York wish to be heard?

Mr. HISCOCK. No, sir; I rose to a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair finds that there is a standing provision of law, approved July 27, 1868, requiring the Secretary of the Interior to cause the Commissioner of Indian Affairs to take supervisory charge of the Eastern band of Cherokees, as of other tribes of Indians. He also finds in the Revised Statutes authority for the President to appoint a competent number of sub-Indian agents at a salary of $1,000 a year each, without limitation as to the tribes to which they are to be sent. The provision of the bill is:

To enable the Secretary of the Interior to employ an agent—

The Chair does not feel called upon to make any distinction under the rule between an agent and a sub-agent—for the Eastern band of Cherokee Indians, in accordance with section 3 of the act approved July 27, 1868.

The Chair does not feel authorized to hold that this is a proposition for an expenditure not previously authorized by law or that it is not in continuation of appropriations for such public objects as are already in progress. The Chair thinks it is an amendment proper for the Committee of the Whole to take within its jurisdiction under the rule. It can be reached by a motion to strike out; but the Chair does not feel justified in ruling the paragraph out of order.

Mr. RICE, of Massachusetts. I move to strike out the paragraph.

The motion was not agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

For this amount, or so much thereof as may be necessary, to enable the Secretary of the Interior to cause the census to be taken and a new roll to be made of all the Cherokee Indians residing east of the Mississippi River, $800: Provided, That the Commissioner of Indian Affairs is hereby authorized and directed to make an equitable adjudication and settlement of all matters of dispute between the said Eastern and Western Cherokees arising from or growing out of treaty stipulation.

Mr. RICE, of Massachusetts. I make a point of order against this provision. I have already given my reasons.

Mr. HOLMAN. The paragraph contains two propositions. I desire that a point of order shall be pending separately against each portion of the paragraph.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair understands that the point of order is made against the whole, and also against each portion.

APPROVAL OF BILLS AND JOINT RESOLUTIONS.

The committee informally rose, and the Speaker having resumed the chair, a message from the President of the United States, by Mr. PRUDEN, one of his secretaries, announced the approval of the following bills and joint resolution:

An act (H. R. No. 3831) to create a district for the inspection of hulls and boilers of steam-vessels;

Joint resolution (H. R. No. 112) authorizing the appointment of Humphrey H. Lemon upon the Capitol police force;

An act (H. R. No. 5536) to reissue a Treasury draft originally issued to George G. Cobb, an assistant assessor in Alabama, deceased, to J. E. Cobb, custodian of the minor children of said decedent;

An act (H. R. No. 6394) for the erection of a public building at Dallas, Texas;

An act (H. R. No. 6419) granting four condemned cannon to Otis Chapman Post No. 103 of the Grand Army of the Republic at Chicopee, Massachusetts, for monumental purposes; and

An act (H. R. No. 6519) to authorize the construction of bridge over the rivers Saint Marys, Satella, Little Satella, and Crooked, in the States of Georgia and Florida.

SUNDRY CIVIL APPROPRIATION BILL.

The committee resumed its session.

Mr. RICE, of Massachusetts. It seems to me, Mr. Chairman, there can be no question but the point of order lies against this paragraph. There is no law anywhere authorizing a census to be taken or a new roll of these Indians.

But the whole section hinges on the proviso. It is provided that the Commissioner of Indian Affairs is authorized to do—what? To make an adjudication and settlement of all matters in dispute between the North Carolina Cherokees and the Cherokee Nation. It is on that proviso the whole paragraph rests. Is that proviso new legislation? Where is there any law authorizing the Commissioner of Indian Affairs to stand as a judge between the North Carolina Indians and the Cherokee Nation? If there be any such law will the gentleman from North Carolina, who for years has been introducing into this House bills authorizing these North Carolina Indians to go into the courts for relief, be good enough to show it to us?

The CHAIRMAN. Will the gentleman permit the Chair to ask the gentleman a question?

Mr. RICE, of Massachusetts. Certainly.

The CHAIRMAN. Can the gentleman from Massachusetts say whether or not the census provided for has been once executed?

Mr. RICE, of Massachusetts. I am not aware whether it has been or not, but I understand it has been. I understand it was executed and the census taken, and that now this new census is desired merely for the purpose of this litigation contemplated in the proviso to the paragraph. These North Carolina Indians claim a certain share in certain Government appropriations made to the Cherokee Indians. I do not suppose it is necessary to go into an extended explanation of what those appropriations are. First, there was an appropriation for the original territory of the Cherokee Indians which they abandoned. Their share of that has been received by the North Carolina Cherokees. There were further appropriations for the expenses of removal and subsistence for a year. The Cherokees West deny the Indians East who did not go have any right to draw from the fund the Government appropriated for that expense. They have been seeking for years to recover a share of those appropriations. It is a difference between those two bands of Indians, and what right have we in any way to pass on that controversy? What right have we to step in and settle the differences between these Indians? This proviso is intended as the basis for such an adjudication. Surely as the law now stands, some legislation is necessary to constitute your Commissioner of Indian Affairs a judge between those two bands of Indians, and in that respect it is new legislation and out of order.

Mr. HISCOCK. This settlement provided for in this clause is something which perhaps might be couched in different language. Still it seems to be absolutely necessary to have it in this language or something akin to it to enable the Secretary to perform this treaty obligation. He has to make an apportionment on basis of settlement; and the object of the census provided is in compliance with treaty obligation those disbursements and payments shall be made. Incidentally in doing so the Commissioner of Indian Affairs is called upon to decide certain rights. I do not know but he would be authorized to do it independently of legislation; but they prefer to have it in this language so as to make it clear.

Mr. HASKELL. I will read from section 469 of the Revised Statutes:

SEC. 469. The Commissioner of Indian Affairs shall embody in his annual report the reports of all agents or commissioners issuing food, clothing, or supplies of any kind to Indians, stating the number of Indians present and actually receiving the same.

Mr. RANDALL. That does not apply to this proviso.

Mr. HASKELL. The census is to be made every time the Commissioner is in any doubt.

Mr. HOLMAN. That does not apply to this proviso.

Mr. HISCOCK. The proviso is to affect this: there are disputes between different factions of the Cherokee Indians as to what they are entitled to under certain treaty obligations and certain funds and lands as the case may be. Incidentally the Commissioner on Indian Affairs would be compelled to decide and pass on these disputes, and it has been deemed necessary to insert this provision to carry out treaty obligations. It is not new legislation.

Mr. RANDALL. It was my intention to make the point of order against this paragraph, because I want to say that the action of the Commissioner heretofore has been to make these payments to the Western Cherokees. Now, I take it for granted that the Commissioner has acted in accordance with law, and this proposes to change the law in that particular. But I have been induced to waive that point of order, because I had come to an understanding with the gentleman from North Carolina, who is more directly interested in this matter, for a modification of this section in the shape of an amendment which I will offer at the proper time.

Mr. HISCOCK. It seems strange, and of course I do not desire to criticise any one's motives, but I do not know but that the Secretary of the Interior would have the power to do this without legislation. But here are these struggles between these factions of the tribes; and if the Secretary of the Interior states that he cannot dispose of this question between the factions, that he cannot say how much they are entitled to, then it is necessary to give some authority to settle the matter. This gives him the power. It is simply an instruction to the Secretary of the Interior to carry out the treaty stipulations which we have with them. It is in pursuance of the treaty obligations and to carry out treaty stipulations with them.

Mr. VANCE. I wish to ask the gentleman from New York whether the report of the Commissioner of Indian Affairs will not also be submitted to Congress, and these Cherokees protected in their rights in that manner?

Mr. HISCOCK. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will rule on the first branch of the question——

Mr. VANCE. Before that I wish to call the attention of the Chair, if he will permit me, to the fact that the second section of this act of July 27, 1868, provides for taking the roll or the census of these Indians.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair has been informed that that has been done.

Mr. VANCE. I am informed that it was never entirely carried out.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state, however, that this fact could not affect the ruling of the Chair upon the point of order.

Mr. HASKELL. There have been a hundred census returns of these different tribes.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair thinks that it does not matter one way or the other with reference to its bearing upon this point of order against the paragraph, because the Indian service, both by treaty stipulations and by appropriations, is so far a unit that whatever concerns it must be recognized as clearly in order upon an Indian appropriation bill; and the Chair holds that this is not new legislation in that sense of the word; therefore all appropriations for the census or the roll of the Indians are in furtherance of existing law and are appropriations made to carry out existing treaties.

As to the proviso, however, the Chair, unless gentlemen desire to be heard further upon it, regards that as obnoxious to the rule unless it is made apparent to the Chair that some treaty obligations exist that give the right or impose the duty upon an officer of the Government to sit as a court of arbitration and settle these disputes. In this light, as it presents itself to the Chair, the Chair will rule that out of order.

The Clerk read as follows:

For this amount, or so much thereof as may be necessary, to enable the Secretary of the Interior to negotiate with the Sioux Indians for a cession, in trust or otherwise, of a portion of the great Sioux reservation, in Dakota Territory, to the United States, and for the location of the several bands or tribes of said Indians upon the residue of said reservation, and for such modification of existing treaties and agreements with said Indians as may be deemed desirable by said Indians and the Secretary of the Interior, $10,000; but any such agreement shall not take effect until ratified by Congress.

Mr. RANDALL. I wish to say, Mr. Chairman, with reference to this paragraph that I believe it to be clearly obnoxious to the third clause of the twenty-third rule.

Mr. HISCOCK. What paragraph does the gentleman refer to?

Mr. RANDALL. I refer to the whole paragraph; but I reserve the point of order for the purpose of suggesting to the gentleman from New York whether he would not permit an amendment to this paragraph by striking out all of the words in lines 1530, 1531, 1532, 1533, and 1534 down to and including the words "reservation and."

Mr. HISCOCK. I accept that.

Mr. RANDALL. Then I will not make the point of order.

Mr. HOLMAN. I renew the point of order upon the whole paragraph.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman desire to be heard?

Mr. HOLMAN. I ask that the paragraph be reported as it will stand if amended as suggested on the motion of the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

The CHAIRMAN. The words suggested by the gentleman from Pennsylvania are embodied in the lines beginning with 1530.

Mr. HOLMAN. I wish to understand exactly what is stricken out.

The CHAIRMAN. The proviso of the previous paragraph has been stricken out.

Mr. RYAN. That is not what the gentleman from Indiana refers to.

Mr. HOLMAN. I am referring now to the present paragraph and to the words which the gentleman from Pennsylvania proposes to strike out.

Mr. RANDALL. This paragraph will read, if the words which I have suggested be stricken out:

For this amount, or so much thereof as may be necessary, to enable the Secretary of the Interior to negotiate with the Sioux Indians for such modification of existing treaties and agreements with said Indians as may be deemed desirable by said Indians and the Secretary of the Interior, $10,000; but any such agreement shall not take effect until ratified by Congress.

Mr. HISCOCK. That is entirely satisfactory.

Mr. HASKELL. What is stricken out?

Mr. RANDALL. Strike out from line 1530 to 1534, leaving the paragraph as I have just read.

The CHAIRMAN. That being accepted it will be considered that that part is stricken out.

Mr. RANDALL. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair hears no objection.

Mr. HOLMAN. I will still have to insist on the point of order. There is no indication of what this is for. The paragraph speaks of the modification of existing treaties; a modification of the treaties—for what purpose?

Mr. HISCOCK. I did not hear the suggestion of the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. HOLMAN.]

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Indiana states that he insists on the point of order.

Mr. HASKELL. I desire, then, to say a word on the point of order. If the Chair will notice this provision closely he will observe it is no act of Congress whatever. It is in no wise conclusive; the entire purpose of the clause as contained there is to carry an appropriation of money. And in order to explain what the appropriation of money is for the language in the clause is employed. The authority of the Indian Commissioner, the Secretary of the Interior, and the President to treat with Indians is conceded on all hands. The President is directly vested with that authority by the acts of Congress establishing the Indian Bureau, and this provision is simply a provision appropriating some money in order that he may enter upon negotiations with a certain tribe for a certain purpose. It is not intended to convey any authority to him to negotiate. That authority is granted before. Neither is the negotiation conclusive. The Secretary or the Commissioner goes out and holds a council with the Indians, as he does every year with other Indians where he has money enough. He holds his council with the Indians concerning their rights, their property, &c.

Mr. HISCOCK. If the gentleman from Kansas will allow me a moment, I wish to say I think we have now consummated a trade, if I may use the expression, satisfactory to all parties. The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] will withdraw his point of order provided an amendment is made to the clause that the homestead laws shall apply to any lands acquired under that treaty. We are entirely willing he shall submit that amendment and that it shall be adopted.

The CHAIRMAN. Then it is understood that this paragraph is passed from, subject to an amendment that is reserved. It is further understood that the words that have been indicated by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RANDALL] are to be eliminated.

Mr. HISCOCK. Yes, sir; it is understood that they are out of the bill.

Mr. HOLMAN. The following is the amendment I desire to be made, and I will hereafter reduce it to writing:

Provided, however, That if any lands shall be acquired from the said Indians the same shall be held by the United States and disposed of to actual settlers under the provisions of the homestead law.

Mr. HISCOCK. There is no objection to that.

The CHAIRMAN. The Committee on Appropriations accept the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Indiana. It has not, however, been written down and reported to the committee. Of course the committee, therefore, has not waived its right to its consideration unless unanimous consent be now given.

Mr. HOLMAN. I ask unanimous consent to pass that over for the present.

Mr. HISCOCK. Let it go in in the form in which the gentleman stated.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair does not like to ask unanimous consent for the adoption of the amendment until it is sent to the Clerk in writing. The Chair suggests that it be passed over for the present.

There was no objection.

Mr. PETTIGREW. Mr. Chairman, I desire to submit some remarks on the merits of this question. On the 5th day of June last it was my province to introduce a bill in this House providing for opening up the great Sioux reservation located in the Territory which I have the honor to represent on this floor. The bill was read the first and second times, and referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs; the committee in turn called on the honorable Secretary of the Interior asking his views of the propriety of such legislation at the present time, who reported as follows:

The quantity of land within the reservations is much greater than is needed for the Indians living thereupon, and in my judgment the reservations should be reduced, and the Indians established on the reserved portion of said reservations best adapted to their wants.

The committee, on a full hearing and after carefully considering the bill, (H. R. No. 6503,) reported it back favorably, and unanimously recommended its passage, also passing a resolution requesting the Committee on Appropriations to insert an item in the appropriation bill carrying out the provisions of this bill, which recommendation was thereupon adopted by the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. Chairman, the lands embraced in the bill under consideration cover 34,000 square miles, and contain 21,000,000 acres of the choicest grazing and agricultural lands on the continent. Seated in the center of the proposed State of Dakota, they completely shut out the deserving people of the Black Hills region from the marts and society of the civilized world.

The Indians occupying the reservation number 24,000, affording 3,500 acres to each male over eighteen, or 875 acres to each man, woman, and child.

While the surplus population of the older States are struggling toward the frontier in hopes of securing the 160 acres so generously accorded each head of family, these nomads roam over their vast possessions spurning all contact with our modes of life, except to draw from the national Government annuities upon which they exist, producing nothing except their blood-thirsty "Sitting Bulls," their presence being a blight upon our progress and a menace to our lives.

The Black Hills region referred to contains 25,000 whites, already possessed of farms stocked with more than a half million head of cattle, beside sheep, horses, crops, &c., together with valuable mining interests which rank us second in the list of gold-producing communities of the Union.

Far east of this, and across the wilderness of the reservation almost two hundred miles at the nearest point, lies "old" Dakota, containing 150,000 whites, exclusive of the population north of the forty-sixth parallel. These people have brought under cultivation more than 2,000,000 acres of soil, and surrounded themselves with all the appliances of frontier civilization. Their railroads penetrate to the banks of the turbid Missouri, which divides them from the Sioux possession, where already towns and villages overlook the impenetrable wilderness beyond. And the question daily recurs to these pioneers, as it must to you, sir, when the subject is brought to your official consideration for the action of Congress, why should the people of this nation be taxed to support a population in idleness and vagabondism which is maintained in possession of a vast territory capable of sustaining a dense population, without responsibility or restraint, acting as a barrier to the progress on all sides of them?

The Sioux Indian was the inhabitant of the great plains, occupying all that country north of what is now the boundary of Louisiana to the lines of the British possessions, and roamed from the west shores of Lake Michigan to the Rocky Mountains.

It was his boast that the flesh of the buffalo was his food and his shelter, and raiment was made of their skins. The wild horse was his beast of burden. He followed the bison in his migratory habits, living upon his trail in the south during the winter, returning north as summer approached.

He smoked the bark of the red-willow in pipes made of the famous pipe-stone, the quarries of which still remain his, although far from his present haunts and in the midst of civilization.

The Sioux is brave, fearless, and warlike, independent and self-reliant, master of the situation and of the circumstances surrounding him.

This, in brief, was the situation of this tribe when they first came in contact with the whites on the Mississippi River over one hundred years ago. From that time they have been at war with civilization. Not en massé at all times, but predatory bands have lingered upon the borders and swooped down on the defenseless when opportunity offered, murdering the people, carrying women into captivity worse than death, and appropriating property without stint.

Notwithstanding the dangers and hardships encountered, destiny pushed the Anglo-Saxon farther and farther west, reclaiming the wilderness and making it blossom with life-sustaining crops, encountering the savage resistance of the Sioux until their outrages culminated in the bloody massacres of Minnesota in 1862, soon after which they were forced from Minnesota and Iowa to the Territory of Dakota.

The eastern bands of Sioux concerned in the Minnesota massacre of 1862 the Sissetons Wahpetons, Santees, Yanktons, Yanktonais, and the Cut-heads, were soon thereafter settled upon reservations in Dakota suitable in size to their needs, and they have since become almost self-sustaining. They live in comfortable houses, cultivate the soil, raise stock, and are slowly but steadily progressing toward civilization. Their settlements are surrounded by the whites, with whom they trade and commingle in various ways, and who they are imitating in the introduction of school-houses, churches, blacksmith shops, &c. The main body of the tribe, however, did not come under subjection at the time mentioned, but, under such leaders as Spotted Tail, Red Cloud, and Sitting Bull, they pushed further west, crossing the Missouri River and ranging over the plains between the river and the Rocky Mountains, still continuing their depredations, attacking steamboats upon the river, murdering emigrants, and robbing miners, their outrages culminating in the last Sioux war, which resulted in the massacre of Custer and his heroic band in 1874 and the retreat of Sitting Bull and band into the Province of Canada.

On the retreat of Sitting Bull, Red Cloud and Spotted Tail entered into an agreement with the Government by which the Indians ceded the region of territory now known as the Black Hills to the United States, under which agreement the Indians continued upon the reservation in its present form, the Government obligating itself to supply the Indians with food sufficient to maintain them, besides defending them in unmolested possession of the vast reservation against trespassers under any pretext whatsoever.

Within a year past the blood-thirsty Sitting Bull, with his band of murderers, has returned to the United States from Canada and they have taken up their domicile upon the reservation, where they too, as well as the others, are supported at Government expense in vagabondage and idleness.

These people are gathered at five different points in the reservation where there are Government agencies established, at which points the different bands have fixed their homes and where the women and children are fed and protected while the warriors are abroad marauding and pillaging. No white person is permitted to enter on any portion of this vast domain, even in search of strayed stock, under penalty of arrest and imprisonment by the Government authorities, although there are extensive portions within the reservation never visited by the Indians themselves, there being no game to allure them. There are exceptions to this exclusion of white persons. Those who debase themselves to cohabit with Indian squaws and conform to their customs are permitted to become of their number and reside among them. Through these sources rumors and reports come of the limitless natural resources and beauties of the country, together with information of extensive and valuable mineral wealth hidden in the valley of the White River region.

Mr. Chairman, it is not my aim or purpose to detract from the Indian's real and commendable qualities. I stand here ready to admit and testify to the fact that he possesses numerous noble traits characteristic of the higher elements of the human race, such as fortitude bravery, &c. But, sir, his true human characteristics have been almost wholly overlooked in recording his history, and an ideal and almost improbable race has been presented to the world through the visions of authors and romancers unfamiliar with the people of whom they treat, and who get their inspiration in the realm of fiction and poetry.

To understand his true character in connection with his merits it must be known that he possesses brutality, perfidy, shameless mendacity, together with an irrepressible desire for activity and utter contempt for every species of labor.

The only thing respected by him is superior force. Every attempt to treat with him on terms of equality is at once assumed by him to be a mark of cowardice on the part of those making the advances. He is cunning, a good judge of men, quick to perceive an advantage, and ready to avail himself of it.

He is also quick to learn; apt not only in adapting the vices of the white race, but also in acquiring their better habits of thrift and economy, as well as dress, &c. He is possessed of much mechanical genius, and when the children are taken at an early age and properly trained they make good mechanics, and when they have once learned the advantages of individual ownership of personal property the desire to own lands individually soon follows, and it is but a step to teach them to respect the rights of others; he then is a long way on the road to civilization.

Sir, the Indians now under consideration have only the tribal organization and the tribal relation, rather than the family relation. They live in their peculiar style of villages, where crowds can easily be assembled, and where they are easily swayed and influenced for good or evil by their chiefs and headmen. The necessity of exertion in order to sustain themselves no longer exists, thanks to the beneficence of their Great Father, and consequently they are left free to indulge their passions and brutal instincts.

As an illustration of their customs in this connection it is pertinent to describe their method of preparing their meat for food. Beef is issued to them by the Government once each week. Their rations are issued to the band in common. They are notified that the live stock, covering the allowance of the week, will be turned loose from the Government corral at a given time. At the time specified the warriors, in large numbers, assemble about the yards, mounted and armed, some with bows and arrows and others with rifles. When the stock is turned loose those armed with bows dash in among their unconscious victims and commence torturing them by shooting arrows into their bodies. Maddened with pain, the cattle stampede out over the prairies, when they are pursued in turn by the Indians armed with rifles, who shoot them down in their track, where they are left by the bucks until the squaws can go to them, who skin and dress the animals and pack the meat into camp, while their lieges bask leisurely in the shade or comfort of their tents, as the season may impel them, conscious of having done their manly duty to their families.

By the exercise of these and other equally debasing customs their brutal and barbarous instincts are permitted, if not fostered, by the Government, which ought to lift them out of their benighted condition and aid them to better and nobler lives.

Sir, as I have already suggested, these "wards of the nation" come into contact with only the worst classes of whites. The white men living with Indian squaws being, as a rule, creatures possessed of all the vices but without a redeeming virtue of the civilized race from which they spring. Therefore we find the Indian living together in indolence, surrounded with only the baser examples of civilized life; he is becoming more degraded and debased than ever he was in his very worst native condition. In order to draw him into the ways of our better civilization, his tribal relations must be abolished and the family relation encouraged and fostered, and he should be brought under the control of the Territorial or State laws in which he resides. Their lands should be patented to them in severalty and should be made inalienable. As rapidly as possible each family should be encouraged and assisted in building themselves houses and instructed in the ways of tilling the soil on individual account, and educated to the fact that the crops produced belong to them individually, whereby they would soon learn, by laboring with visible results, which administer to their maintenance and comfort, the advantages of the white man's method.

In order that they may feel themselves maintained and encouraged the Government should establish and at the beginning maintain industrial schools in their midst, where their children, to a limited number, can be taught to be blacksmiths, carpenters, and mechanics generally, as well as tillers of the soil. With these, paternal encouragement, and the example of the better elements of our own citizens, who would speedily settle around them if allowed to do so under conditions satisfactory to all concerned, the spirit of emulation would soon manifest itself among them, and instead of strife and desolation these misfortunes would be supplanted by peaceful rivalry in progression and acts of neighborly co-operation.

Mr. Chairman, the world is freshly mourning the peaceful death of the great Pan-Slavic general, Skobeleff, whose brilliant dash and wonderful achievements as a leader in the Russian army have filled the newspapers of the world during the past few years and won the admiration of all who have had the leisure or inclination to keep pace with his short career. Sir, the campaign which brought him pre-eminently into notice was the one which ended in the annexation of Bulgaria to the dominion of the Czar. This new province, from what I can learn, is somewhat similar in many respects in its natural characteristics to the lands we are now considering. This once independent country contained only 30,000 square miles, or 4,000 miles less than this reservation contained; yet it sustained over 1,000,000 inhabitants in comfort, whose affluence excited the greed of their powerful neighbor to a degree that ended in her subjugation.

Mr. Chairman, if the entire population of Bulgaria were transferred to the lands of the Sioux reservation it would possess a population of but 29 to the square mile, or 98 inhabitants to the square mile less than our own State of Massachusetts sustains. But, sir, these wild lands in wealth of minerals and fertility of soil far surpass either Bulgaria or Massachusetts in their capacity to sustain and make rich a dense population. For the acquisition of this territory of Bulgaria Russia deliberately sacrificed thousands of lives and expended millions of treasure, in taking which she undertook to absorb a population foreign in tastes and allegiance; yet, sir, here is a territory larger in area, richer in resources, and possessing a more desirable climate, lying at our very doors, which we can have for the asking, and which in a very few years would become more densely populated with a homogeneous people far superior as citizens, and whose presence, by their habits and pursuits, will make the region a blessing to the country.

I make this digression, sir, to illustrate the comparative as well as real possibility of this country, and to show the impropriety and wrong done to mankind in sealing its vast riches against those who stand ready to make it the home of thousands, besides pouring its share of revenues into the national Treasury.

With these facts presented, I urge Congress, after making ample provisions for the Indians occupying the Territory, to authorize the remainder of the lands in the reservation to be divided up and opened to occupation under the conditions governing other public lands, and like magic they will be occupied by the industrious, intelligent people, such as now inhabit the portions of the Territory occupied by the whites, from whom the Indians would learn virtue and thrift by example and precept.

These white settlers, surrounding and mingling with the Indians, would be more interested than any other people in their progress and good behavior; they would therefore see that their rights were protected and the laws humanely enforced.

A paternal and semi-protective policy such as I have sought to outline would of necessity be expensive in the beginning, Mr. Chairman; not expensive, however, in comparison with the cost of the present lack of system and policy.

But, sir, I am of the opinion, and experience will bear out my views, that by such a policy, within the term of one generation, the Sioux Indians will become self-sustaining, besides taking their places as good citizens of a common country; and the "Indian problem," which has so long been a vexed question with our statesmen, will forever disappear from the arena of debate.

Sir, it is impossible much longer to close this domain to American push and enterprise. Already it is surrounded by the thrifty pioneers of our race, who are pressing upon its borders and looking with longing eyes upon its inviting pastures and teeming forests.

The people of this nation have been educated to believe themselves entitled to go anywhere, in any clime, in pursuit of commerce, knowledge, and pleasure. Our war ships have been sent to bombard the sea-ports of Japan and other oriental monarchies to force open their domains to the American trader. Is it, therefore, probable or possible that this Government will set up a Chinese wall around a tract of territory, in the heart of the continent, as great in area and natural resources as the powerful Commonwealth of Ohio?

Should Congress fail to empower and direct the Secretary of the Interior to make this treaty (a contingency I do not deem probable) whereby it is proposed to make definite and permanent provision for the maintenance and civilization of the Indians, the time will soon arrive when the Government will be brought face to face with the problem which it has been called upon to solve in the history of every Indian reservation in the path of the "empire that silently wends its westward way;" when it will be forced to acknowledge itself unable to protect the Indians in their claims, or to accept the alternative of drafting the yeomanry of the land to stand with a cordon of gleaming bayonets about the reservation in order to stop the march of progress.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

The committee informally rose, and Mr. DINGLEY took the chair as Speaker pro tempore.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. SHOBER, its Acting Secretary, informed the House that the Senate had agreed to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the Senate amendments to the bill (H. R. No. 4167) to enable national banking associations to extend their corporate existence, and that it had also by unanimous consent agreed to the further amendment of the House of Representatives to the bill by striking out, in line 25, page 7, the word "hereinafter," where it occurs before the word "provided," and inserting the words "by law" after the word "provided."

The message further announced that the Senate concurred in the amendment of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. No. 1432) entitled "An act abolishing the military reservation of Fort Abercrombie, in the State of Minnesota, and authorizing the Secretary of the Interior to have the amount embraced therein made subject to homestead pre-emption entry and sale, the same as other public lands.

SUNDRY CIVIL APPROPRIATION BILL.

The Committee of the Whole resumed its session.

The Clerk read the following paragraph:

For the purpose of survey and appraisal of the Otoe and Missouria Indian bands in the States of Kansas and Nebraska, (exclusive of such portion thereof as has heretofore been ceded by said Indians as right of way to railroads,) in accordance with provisions of an act approved March 3, 1881, $5,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary; said sum to be reimbursed to the Government out of the proceeds of the sale of said lands.

Mr. RYAN. In line 1540 there is a typographical error; the word "bands" should be "lands."

The CHAIRMAN. In the absence of objection the correction indicated by the gentleman from Kansas will be made.

Mr. VALENTINE. I offer what I send to the desk, to come in as an independent section.

The Clerk read as follows:

At the end of line 1547 add the following:

"To enable the Secretary of the Interior to purchase one hundred and sixty acres of land in addition to that now owned by the Government on the old Pawnee reservation, in the State of Nebraska, $25,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary: Provided, This amount shall be available only in the event that an Indian industrial school shall be established upon said reservation in pursuance of an act of Congress approved May 17, 1882."

Mr. VALENTINE. I desire to state briefly that in the Indian appropriation bill which passed this House during the present session there is an appropriation of $25,000 to be used by the Secretary of the Interior to establish an Indian industrial school at one or two points, either upon the great Sioux reservation in Dakota or upon the Pawnee reservation in the State of Nebraska. Upon the Pawnee reservation there is a large brick building which was used by the Indians while they were there, for school purposes. The Secretary of the Interior says that unless he has more land, as there are but one hundred and sixty acres of land there, it will be impossible for him to locate this school at that point and avail himself of the building that is now there, and he addressed a letter to the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations asking that this be inserted; the proviso being that it only becomes available in the event of an Indian industrial school being established there.

The amendment of Mr. VALENTINE was agreed to.

Mr. HOLMAN. I now ask consent to submit the amendment which I spoke of a few moments ago.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] asks to return to the paragraph of the bill beginning with line 1528, for the purpose of offering an amendment, under his reserved right to do so.

The amendment was read, as follows:

Add to the paragraph the following:

"Provided however, That if any land shall be acquired from said Indians by the United States it shall be on the express condition that the United States shall only dispose of the same to actual settlers under the provisions of the homestead law."

Mr. VALENTINE. I think the gentleman will accept an amendment not to restrict the lands to settlers under the homestead law, but to let them be sold to actual settlers under the provisions of the land laws of the United States. There is a timber-culture act.

Mr. HOLMAN. I want to get rid of the other law.

Mr. HASKELL. I want to ask the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. HOLMAN,] or rather to call the attention of the House to this condition of affairs: the Sioux reservation is now supposed to belong to these Indians, is it not? It is their property by treaty. The amendment offered by the gentleman from Indiana, as I heard it read, would compel us to take these lands from these Indians, and do what? Pay them for it? Not a cent, not a dollar. Take these lands away from them and then open them to homestead settlers. That certainly the gentleman from Indiana does not contemplate.

Mr. HOLMAN. That is just exactly what I mean; that any lands acquired from these Indians, or from anybody else in the country, shall be subject to entry under the homestead law. I intend to cut up by the roots, so far as I can, the other laws relating to the public lands.

Mr. HASKELL. I want to know just what the amendment means, just how far it goes; that is all. I want to ask this House if they propose to take this Indian reservation, the lands of the Indians granted to them by treaty—to take these lands away from them without paying them a dollar for them, and then give them to homestead settlers?

Mr. RYAN. There is no such proposition.

Mr. KENNA. Let the Clerk read the provision as it stands in the bill to which this amendment is proposed, and then the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. HASKELL] can see the full effect of it.

The Clerk read as follows:

For this amount, or so much thereof as may be necessary, to enable the Secretary of the Interior to negotiate with the Sioux Indians for a cession, in trust or otherwise, of a portion of the Great Sioux reservation, in Dakota Territory, to the United States, and for the location of the several bands or tribes of said Indians upon the residue of said reservation, and for such modification of existing treaties and agreements with said Indians as may be deemed desirable by said Indians and the Secretary of the Interior, $10,000; but any such agreement shall not take effect until ratified by Congress.

Mr. KENNA. Now let the Clerk read the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Provided, however, That if any land shall be acquired from said Indians by the United States, it shall be on the express condition that the United States shall only dispose of the same to actual settlers under the provisions of the homestead law.

Mr. HASKELL. I see that the amendment does not reach so far as I had an apprehension it might. But I want to call the attention of the House to this: you will go out there and trade with the Indians, and pay them perhaps $2.50 an acre for half a million of acres of their land, and you provide no way for reimbursing yourself. You propose to make a free donation, under the terms of the amendment of the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. HOLMAN,] of half a million acres of land that cost you $2.50 an acre, to make a free donation of it to the settlers of the United States. Being a Western man, of course I am willing you should give us all the land you please.

Mr. HOLMAN. I never will consent that the Government shall sell another acre of land which is adapted for cultivation.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman mean that "this express condition" shall be in the treaty, or only to bind the United States?

Mr. HOLMAN. To bind the United States.

The amendment of Mr. HOLMAN was agreed to.

Mr. COX, of New York. I desire to move an amendment, to come in after the amendment offered by the gentleman from Nebraska, [Mr. VALENTINE,] establishing Indian schools.

The amendment was read, as follows:

And provided further, That no political assessments shall be levied upon said schools when established.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman desire to be heard upon his amendment?

Mr. COX, of New York. I simply want to have read a statement showing that political assessments have been made, of course without the consent of gentlemen upon the other side, upon the Carlisle school, in Pennsylvania. I think that members of Congress ought to put a stop to that business.

Mr. HISCOCK. I make the point of order on the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair thinks the gentleman is hardly in time, for the gentleman from New York [Mr. COX] has proceeded to debate it.

Mr. HISCOCK. He has not even passed it up to be read by the Clerk.

The CHAIRMAN. It has been read by the Clerk.

Mr. SPRINGER. Let it be reported again.

Mr. COX, of New York. I do not ask that. I simply ask the Clerk to read a statement of the assessments made on the Indian school in Carlisle, Pennsylvania, so that members may see the necessity for stopping this business.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman asks to have it read as a part of his remarks?

Mr. COX, of New York. As a part of my remarks.

The Clerk read as follows:

HUBBELL'S ASSESSMENTS—A LEVY MADE ON THE MANAGERS AND ASSISTANTS IN THE INDIAN TRAINING SCHOOL.

HARRISBURGH, PENNSYLVANIA, July 9.

The persevering meanness of the Hubbell assessment is strikingly exemplified in the levy made upon one of the Governmental institutions which ought to be furthest removed from any sort of partisan control and from the visit of the toll-gatherer. The old Government barracks at Carlisle, Pennsylvania, some eighteen miles up the Cumberland Valley from this city, have for some years past been used as an Indian training school, and under the direction of Captain Pratt of the regular Army the work of instructing the Indian children of both sexes in the useful arts and domestic life has been most satisfactorily prosecuted. The school and the admirable work it is doing have not only attracted the hearty interest and earnest commendation of the surrounding community, but every official inspection and examination increase the high favor with which it is regarded by those whose special duty it is to fairly investigate this new and salutary mode of treating the Indian problem.

Such a thing as political service, or the interference of partisan marplots in the management of the school has never been broached. Its official staff has at least felt free from any such danger as that. But the members of its corps and its instructors, assistants, nurses, and laborers have been startled at receiving notice that they are expected to furnish 2 per cent. of their salaries to Hubbell's committee to assist in the election of Republican members of Congress. The levy in detail falls upon them as follows:

Captain R. H. Pratt, superintendent	$20 00
Mr. Norman, assistant to superintendent	12 50
Mr. Campbell, marshal and disciplinarian	12 50
Hadhleuh Doanmoe, (Indian,) assistant	8 00
Mr. Harris, blacksmith	12 50
Mr. Reighter, tailor	12 50
Mr. Walker, tinner	12 50
Mr. Meller, farmer	18 00
Mr. Cook, shoemaker	9 00
Mr. Chapman, saddler	12 50
Mr. Hummel, carpenter	12 50
Mr. Baird, assistant	18 00
Miss Semple, principal	18 00
Miss Hyde, matron	15 00
Mrs. Sheverick, in charge of small boys	9 00
Samuel Jordan, colored laborer	8 00
Miss Morton, teacher	10 00
Miss Patterson, teacher	10 00
Miss Cutter, teacher	10 00
Miss Booth, teacher	10 00
Miss Fisher, teacher	10 00
Miss Eley, teacher	10 00
Miss Burgess, teacher	10 00
Miss Phillips, teacher	10 00
Mrs. Worthington, superintendent of industrial room	8 00
Mr. Gould, chief clerk	20 00
Miss Robertson, clerk	15 00
Mrs. Spain, laundress	15 00
Mrs. Platt, mistress of dining-room	9 00
Dr. Stewart, post surgeon	12 50
Miss Wilson, hospital nurse	12 50
George Foulk, hostler	6 00
Total	388 50

There is probably not a member of the entire staff of this institution who owes his or her place to political influences, and certainly the tenure of none of them is dependent on Republican supremacy in the State or nation. The managers and teachers themselves, mostly ladies, it will be noticed take little or no interest in politics, and are even reticent upon this assessment business, this information regarding it being obtained accidentally. Several of them, including Captain Pratt and a number of his chief assistants, are pronounced Democrats, and it is safe to say that they will not respond to Hubbell's call, and if disturbed for their refusal it will be by some influence outside of the institution itself. What the silver-haired matron, the venerable nurse, the blooming school-marms, the hostler, and day laborer will do about it remains to be seen. But the ineffable impudence of "Dear Hubbell's" extortionate demands was never better illustrated than by this comprehensive levy.—New York Sun.

The question being taken on the amendment of Mr. COX, of New York, there were—ayes 40, noes 49.

Mr. ATHERTON. I make the point that no quorum has voted. If gentlemen on the other side will agree to give us a vote in the House, I will not insist on this point.

Tellers were ordered; and Mr. HISCOCK and Mr. COX of New York were appointed.

The committee again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 55, noes 67.

So the amendment was not agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

Botanic Garden: For labor and materials in connection with repairs and improvements to Botanic Garden, $7,150.

Mr. McCOOK. I move to strike out the paragraph just read. I make this motion because I believe it should be adopted, though I have scarcely any hope that the Committee of the Whole will act favorably upon it. In the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill, which passed this House a few weeks ago, there was appropriated for the superintendent and employés of this Botanic Garden $11,700, and for improving the garden, procuring tools, &c., $5,000 more, making $16,700 in that bill for this garden. In addition to that, we now find in the present bill an appropriation of $7,150 more, making in the neighborhood of eighteen or nineteen thousand dollars for this garden.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. What does this garden do?

Mr. McCOOK. I cannot tell exactly. The gentleman knows quite as well as I do. I think it exceedingly fortunate, Mr. Chairman, that this is the last of the great appropriation bills, because it appears probable that otherwise the next one would contain an additional appropriation for this Botanic Garden, the appropriations for which, as I attempted to show some days ago, have steadily increased from $1,500 until they now aggregate nineteen or twenty thousand dollars for purposes that, in my judgment, do not compensate for the amount of money expended. I therefore, in perfect good faith, make the motion to strike out this appropriation.

The motion of Mr. McCOOK was not agreed to, there being—ayes 36, noes 46.

The Clerk read as follows:

For the United States Geological Survey: For the Geological Survey, and the classification of the public lands, and examination of the geological structure, mineral resources, and products of the national domain, to be expended under the direction of the Secretary of the Interior, $122,000; and the Secretary of the Interior is hereby directed to organize the force for which this appropriation is to be expended and to fix the salaries and compensation to be paid to the members thereof, and to make his estimate for the fiscal year commencing July 1, 1883, in detail, in reference to the force to be employed, with its grades and compensation to the respective grades, and specifying the branches of work in which it should be employed and the amount to be expended on each branch.

Mr. ATKINS. I move to amend by adding to the paragraph just read the following:

And to continue the preparation of a geological map of the United States.

Mr. HISCOCK. I make a point of order on the amendment. It proposes to provide for a new work.

Mr. ATKINS. It is exactly in accordance with the ruling of the Chair upon the point made by the gentleman from Indiana upon the language in lines 471 and 472, page 20 of the bill. The language there is "and of a general map of the eastern part of the United States." The Chair held that the point of order was not well taken. I think this point of order is upon a par with that.

Mr. WILSON. I beg to ask the gentleman whether the Government is not now making a geological map of some of the States?

Mr. ATKINS. Yes, sir; a geological map is now being made of several States—Colorado, Nevada, and to some extent California, as I understand.

Mr. MOULTON. The object of this amendment is to make a complete map?

Mr. ATKINS. To make a complete geological map.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will inquire of the gentleman from Tennessee whether the reports hitherto made from the geological survey include maps?

Mr. ATKINS. Oh, yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair so understood.

Mr. ATKINS. Under the act organizing the bureau it is provided that it shall prepare geological maps. A great many of these maps have been printed and have been distributed by members of Congress to their constituencies all over the country.

Mr. KENNA. This is really the continuation of an existing work.

Mr. HISCOCK. If I understand the meaning of the amendment offered by the gentleman from Tennessee it extends the power of this survey with reference to maps which are to be published. They have the power now I suppose to make maps, diagrams, and everything of that sort in reference to sections of the country as to which they make geological surveys. But if I caught correctly the phraseology of the amendment it proposes to make a geological map of the United States or, perhaps, to continue such a map. It is suggested to me that the word "continue" is used.

Mr. MOULTON. Let the Clerk read the amendment again.

Mr. HISCOCK. I yield that it may be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

And to continue the preparation of a geological map of the United States.

Mr. HISCOCK. That is the point exactly. Now, there is nowhere any authority of law for a geological map of the United States. There is authority for a map of the surveys which the surveying officers make. They have the right, doubtless, under the appropriation which has been made from year to year to publish maps of the surveys they make, and they do so. But this means more than that; it means a geological map of the whole United States—a work that has never been entered up—a map which cannot be made until there has been a geological survey of the whole of the United States. This amendment, couched in so few words, is most pregnant with meaning. Where it will lead no man can tell; but I will not discuss it upon the merits.

Under that amendment, carefully drawn and prepared as it is, a geological survey of the whole United States would be initiated. Now, you may search through the appropriation bills in vain to find any authority for anything of the kind. In the estimates submitted to us there was one to come east of the Mississippi River and enter into the Appalachian region, to make a geological survey of it. That has been taken out of this bill, or rather it was not reported in favor of or included in the bill. Now the gentleman from Tennessee introduces an amendment of that kind to bring that survey into that chain of mountains. He introduces an amendment which perforce compels the geological survey of that Appalachian chain of mountains.

As I have said before, the work of a geological map has never been commenced in the United States. No such work is in progress. It is therefore subject to the point of order.

Mr. ATKINS. I wish simply to say, Mr. Chairman, that the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations sat in his seat and made no objection at all, and did not assist the gentleman from Indiana when he made the point of order against the provision for a general map of the eastern part of the United States by the Coast and Geodetic Survey. He sat in his seat then and said nothing. I hold that this clause is subject to the same principle which controlled that appropriation, and as the Chair decided that the point of order taken against that general map of the eastern portion of the United States was not well taken, it seems to me the point of order to the pending proposition will admit of no other decision but that one being ruled in order necessarily the other will also be ruled in order.

Mr. HISCOCK. The gentleman from Tennessee will see the map ruled in order there was the publication of the surveys, ascertainment of the lines, which had been formulated by the Coast and Geodetic Survey.

Mr. ATKINS. It related to a general map of the eastern part of the United States, and since that has been ruled in order I hold the amendment I have submited must also be ruled in order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is ready to rule on the point of order. [Mr. KENNA rose.] Does the gentleman from West Virginia wish to be heard on the point of order?

Mr. KENNA. Not unless the Chair wishes to hear further from my side.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from West Virginia will proceed.

Mr. KENNA. I wish to submit one or two suggestions. In the first place, the geological survey of the country has been undertaken not in piecemeal and not to involve a spot inside of one State or Territory, but as a system. No one will undertake to assume where a geological investigation is made of the public domain, in the central part of a State, as it may be, that the geologist in charge cannot make a geological map of that State as is actually within the boundary of the survey and leave out the boundary of the State itself. The relative location must be shown; comparisons must be made. The system as undertaken and prosecuted for a considerable length of time involves everything necessarily embraced in the clause of the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Tennessee. It is analogous to the proposition on which the Chair ruled a day or two since in relation to the Coast and Geodetic Survey.

I deny the correctness of the attitude of the gentleman from New York [Mr. HISCOCK] when he assumes that provided only for the publication of work done under the Coast and Geodetic Survey. It provided for an extension of the work, and the Chair held it to be in order from the fact that extension became a part of the system in progress. I submit the proposition is in order.

Mr. WILSON. Mr. Chairman, I desire to say one word in addition to what has been said by my colleague [Mr. KENNA] and the gentleman from Tennessee, [Mr. ATKINS.] If you have before you this bill, Mr. Chairman, commencing at line 1574, I take it you will find in it "a provision for the United States Geological Survey," which, I think, is a full and complete refutation of the argument of the gentleman from New York, [Mr. HISCOCK.] One hundred and twenty-two thousand dollars is appropriated by this section for the purpose of a United States geological survey. It is as I have said, "for the United States Geological Survey." Yet the gentleman from New York says no geological survey is authorized by law. Nevertheless, he brings into this House an appropriation of $122,000 for carrying on the survey for which he says there is no authority!

Now, I understand that the amendment of the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. ATKINS] proposes simply to extend the appropriation for the survey so as to make provision for the publication of the necessary geological map of the United States. One is indeed the supplement of the other. Without the map and report the survey could be of little or no value to the country.

I beg to ask the gentleman from New York [Mr. HISCOCK] what advantage the survey alone can be? What advantage can be derived from it unless we are to have a report of the work done and a map showing it in detail?

I claim, Mr. Chairman, that the amendment of the gentleman from Tennessee is directly in the line of the policy of this bill. I do not think any other proposition can be more germane, for if we have the right to do the one thing we certainly have the right to do the other, and it necessarily follows as the outgrowth of that right that the work should be utilized by the preparation of the necessary maps.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will rule upon the point of order. The case to which attention has been called, and on which a ruling has been heretofore made, was with reference to the geodetic survey and its authority to proceed in the execution of that work for several miles from the coast. Now, it is known to every gentleman here that the work of the coast survey embraces necessarily a considerable distance from the coast for scientific purposes, and therefore the Chair ruled that to be in order, as it was within the jurisdiction and in accordance with precedents. On this, however, the question presented is an entirely different one. This section of the bill provides for the geological survey and the classification of the public lands, an examination of the geological structure, mineral resources, and products of the national domain, and is limited to that. Under that language the survey can only be prosecuted upon the national domain. But the proposition of the gentleman from Tennessee here is to continue the preparation of a geological map of the United States. Now, if the words "public domain" were added, the Chair would regard it as following the precedents and within the line of the work which they have been doing by maps and diagrams. But the Chair is of opinion that to continue the preparation of a geological map of the United States would largely increase the functions of this survey and extend it beyond what is contemplated within the boundaries of the State and not warranted by law. The Chair therefore sustains the point of order.

Mr. ATKINS. I do not think that the suggestion of the Chair adds anything to the powers of this geological survey. They have a right to go upon the public domain now wherever it may be. I am willing, however, to modify the amendment to that extent so as to remove the objection urged against it by the Chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The language of the amendment as at present provides for a geological map of the United States.

Mr. ATKINS. But I am proposing now to modify the amendment and insert the language that the Chair has indicated. I modify my amendment, therefore, to that extent.

The CHAIRMAN. The amendment as modified will be reported.

Mr. BLACKBURN. Let it be reduced to writing.

Mr. SPRINGER. The gentleman proposes to apply it only to the national domain of the United States.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the modification.

The Clerk read as follows:

And to continue the preparation of a geological map of the national domain.

Mr. BLACKBURN. Mr. Chairman, the law as it now stands today authorizes the carrying of this geological survey into any of the States of this Government where public lands exist. I want the Chair now to rule upon the amendment as it has been modified. If that law is to be changed or any amendment is made looking to its change, I mean to renew the point of order myself. I have no objection to the surveys being carried on in any State where the United States owns public lands, but to this extent, I agree that it shall not go into a State where the Government does not own public lands, or be applied to lands that do not belong to the Government.

I ask the Chair now to rule whether the amendment as modified changes in any wise existing law in that respect.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair does not understand the gentleman from Kentucky as making a point of order upon the modified amendment?

Mr. BLACKBURN. I do make the point of order in order to get an expression of opinion from the Chair as to whether the proposition in its new form in any wise changes existing law.

Mr. ATKINS. It is too late to make the point of order, and it does not change the law.

Mr. BLACKBURN. I say it does change the law.

Mr. ATKINS. In reply to the gentleman from Kentucky, I will read from the act of 1879 organizing this survey:

For the salary of the Director of the Geological Survey, which office is hereby established, under the Interior Department, who shall be appointed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, $6,000: Provided, That this officer shall have the direction of the geological survey, and the classification of the public lands and examination of the geological structure, mineral resources, and products of the national domain.

The gentleman is correct that the provision as to the public lands carries it into the States——

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will say that he does not understand this amendment as at all changing existing law.

Mr. HISCOCK. Then the point of order must lie if it does not change existing law; if it is a mere repetition of existing law it cannot be in order. It is not in order to re-enact an old law.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman does not understand the Chair. This is a proposition that part of this money shall be appropriated for reporting in the form of a geological map the results of this survey.

Mr. HISCOCK. Is there not the power to do that now?

The CHAIRMAN. The House has a perfect right to order the appropriation of a part of this money to any matter connected with the geological surveys.

Mr. BLACKBURN. I desire to make a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. BLACKBURN. Does the Chair not hold that the preparation of that map under existing law would be restricted and confined to the public lands which are the property of the Government?

The CHAIRMAN. The question is now of the national domain.

Mr. BLACKBURN. That is it. I want it to be distinctly understood when the officers of the Treasury Department come to construe this act I want them to do it in the light of the record of to-day, showing what was the purpose and intent of the House in adopting this amendment, if, indeed, it shall be adopted, and I trust it will not be adopted; I want it distinctly shown that this House did not mean or intend to change the law one atom as it stands to-day; and that the gentleman who now so worthily presides over the deliberations of this body ruled the amendment did not confer a single power on the Geological Survey.

Mr. KENNA. Will this House undertake to instruct the Departments or the Executive as to how a law should be construed?

Mr. BLACKBURN. I presume it will.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will ask the Clerk to report, for the information of the committee, the modified amendment, with the context, reading from the beginning of the paragraph as if the amendment were inserted. The attention of the committee is requested.

The Clerk read as follows:

For the United States Geological Survey: For the Geological Survey and the classification of the public lands and examination of the geological structure, mineral resources, and products of the national domain, and to continue the preparation of the geological map of the national domain, &c.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on that amendment.

Mr. WHITE. I differ with my colleague [Mr. BLACKBURN] about the importance of this geological survey. I must say that I have no conscientious scruples about the national Government having as complete a survey of the State which I in part represent as the Coast Survey would make under the present law of the triangulation of the State of Kentucky. My colleague will not deny that the Treasury Department to-day, through the Coast Survey, has the right and has exercised it in part to make a preliminary triangulation of the State of Kentucky. It is said, sir, this is done preparatory to any future emergency not foreseen in the history of our country.

Mr. BLACKBURN. Not at all.

Mr. WHITE. It may be necessary to know the altitude of any particular locality in my State. But it is of much more importance to the people of that State and the people of this country, and the immigrants who come here from abroad, to know the mineral resources as well as the agricultural resources of that State. We have our State geological survey, and the reports are somewhat read. They are known to a certain extent over the country. But, sir, they are not of such weight, such authority, giving them the necessary credence abroad as if they were stamped by the authority of the Government. I ask not only that the triangulation of the States of Kentucky and Tennessee and North Carolina as well as the domain west of the Mississippi shall be completed, but that there shall be a complete geological survey showing not only the surface, but what is in the bowels of the country.

We have been there, the descendants of the Revolutionary patriots, for a hundred years. But our resources are as yet not fairly apprehended, and yet we are exploring the Rocky Mountains, the Sierra Nevadas, of the Western country, showing to the world the resources that are there, while we leave undiscovered, unheralded, the greater richness of the mountains of the Appalachian range. I hope this amendment will be adopted.

Mr. BLACKBURN. I did not think it would prove necessary for me to suggest to my colleague what he does not seem to have known. The State of Kentucky has for nearly forty years been engaged in the transaction of the work of the geological survey of that commonwealth.

Mr. WHITE. I so stated.

Mr. BLACKBURN. I will state more. She had Robert Dale Owen at the head of it until he died. She sent to Hartford and brought Professor Shaler and put him at the head of it, and had him there for half as many years as my colleague has been living. For the last eight or ten years she has had a man little, if any, inferior in ability to either of these great scientists. She has spent a million of money and more in the very effort, the very work which it is now proposed shall be done by the Government of this country.

I am opposing this amendment because I do not intend to give away without consideration the labor and the money that my State has expended in this direction. I have no sympathy with those gentlemen who come here and pass around the hat of pauperism, begging the Federal Government to make geological surveys of their States, and afterward doubtless to build its roads and its schoolhouses and provide for its every expenditure.

There is no democracy in such a proposition. And when I use that term I use it in its broadest and not its party sense. You may as well come here and offer an amendment asking to have turnpike roads built through my State or any other State as to demand that the Federal Government shall open its coffers to make maps in order to induce immigration because of the mineral or lumber resources of this or that or any other sovereign State of this great Government.

I oppose it because there are other States practicing a parsimonious policy all around my State, east and west, north and south, who have refused to expend a dollar or do one lick of work looking to their own development. If you undertake to carry the United States Geological Survey into the States, you put every enterprising State upon an exact dead level with every other State that has never expended anything for this purpose, and our money and our efforts will go for naught.

It is not fair; it is not honest; it is not legitimate legislation. If you mean to do this thing, come up and meet the question like fair and honorable business men, and incorporate an amendment that shall give a rebate to every State in this country for every dollar of money expended in this direction.

I brought Major Powell, the superintendent of this geological survey, into the committee-room and asked him to tell me the character of work that Kentucky had been engaged in doing for forty years, and for which she had paid this large sum of money. He told me, and there he differed from my worthy colleague, [Mr. WHITE,] that it was as efficient, as thorough, as accurate, as valuable a survey as the Federal Government itself would make or could make.

Mr. WHITE. Will my colleague allow me to ask him a question just there?

Mr. BLACKBURN. Certainly.

Mr. WHITE. Is my colleague aware of the fact that the superintendent of the geological survey of the State of Kentucky——

Mr. BLACKBURN. Is in favor of this thing?

Mr. WHITE. Exactly.

Mr. BLACKBURN. Of course I am.

Mr. WHITE. Does he consider that we are giving away for no purpose what information we have collected? Does he not believe that we would be devoting it to a good purpose?

Mr. BLACKBURN. Make another speech in your own time. I know that the present superintendent of the geological survey of Kentucky is in favor of this. But I hope I have sense enough to know that it is not my business to stand here and see forty years of labor expended by that State, and a million of money in round numbers go for nothing, as compared with the States that have made no movement in this direction.

The CHAIRMAN. Debate has been exhausted upon the pending amendment.

Mr. HISCOCK. I move to strike out the last word. I do not believe that the amendment as ruled in order by the Chair would let this survey into the States and to other lands than the public domain. Notwithstanding my opinion of the amendment is as I have stated, I cannot forbear to say a word in reference to a proposition which I know is entertained by gentlemen on this floor.

I agree almost entirely with the gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. BLACKBURN,] that the Federal Government may just as well commence the building of private roads, may just as well commence the building of school-houses, and of churches, may just as well take charge of the whole educational system of the country, as to undertake this geological survey of private property for the benefit of private individuals. And that is all that is meant by this proposition.

This scheme is pressed here by gentlemen who own large tracts of land in this Appalachian region, which they believe contain mineral wealth, and they desire that the Federal Government may make a geological survey of that land, and the private individuals and the corporations owning it be relieved from the expense of such survey.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. Will the gentleman permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. HISCOCK. I have made my statement with deliberation. From the time this Congress convened up to the present hour the corridors of the hotels and lobbies of this Capitol have been filled with persons pressing this legislation upon Congress.

I do not care to have any misunderstanding about the proposition that the House is to pass upon. And I desire to say another thing. You may vote $10,000,000 to build a navy, you may vote $10,000,000 in the river and harbor appropriation bill, and then you may multiply those two ten millions by five and the amount will not reach in magnitude the vast amount which would be required for this survey.

Triangulation first proceeds, and then following triangulation come the topographical maps, and following that comes another species of maps, until you finally come down to the practical geological map.

As a member on my right says, the survey of Pennsylvania—which she has not herself inaugurated, for Pennsylvania capitalists are willing themselves to develop the internal resources of that State—the geological survey of that State will cost her $2,000,000. Now, I have said this because I wanted the Committee of the Whole to be in full possession of what this amendment or this movement means.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. How can the gentleman justify the expenditure of Federal money to make a geological survey of the State of Colorado and object to an expenditure of Federal money to survey lands in the State of Kentucky?

Mr. HISCOCK. I object because the survey should be confined, and if the spirit of the law is respected must be confined, to lands in that State belonging to the United States.

Mr. ATKINS. Mr. Chairman, I was not surprised that my distinguished friend from Kentucky [Mr. BLACKBURN] should plant himself upon the doctrine of State rights in opposition to this amendment. It was very natural that he should make that objection. But it is a little singular to me that my honorable friend from New York [Mr. HISCOCK] should plant himself upon the same position. I am a State-rights man myself. I used to be a very extreme State-rights man.

Mr. HISCOCK. Will the gentleman tell us how long ago?

Mr. ATKINS. Four years of experience taught me to modify my State-right views considerably; and while I am not in favor of blotting out State lines, but want to maintain them, while I want the States to regulate their own internal affairs in their own way as far as they can under the Constitution of the United States, I submit whether it is not known to this Congress and the whole country that the extreme views once entertained by that political school have passed away.

Now, I want to know how it is a greater breach of State rights to authorize the officers of the geological survey to go into a State and survey its mineral resources than to make an appropriation to clean out a river, the source and the mouth of which are within the same State? Will the gentleman from Kentucky tell me wherein he preserved his consistency as a Democrat when the other day he voted for an appropriation of $17,000,000, $225,000 of which I believe was intended to clean out the Kentucky River, which if my geographical knowledge has not failed me, rises within that State and empties within it. The gentleman seems to me to be straining at a gnat and swallowing a camel. It seems to me he is driven to a very extreme position in order to prejudice this amendment.

Under the ruling of the Chair the amendment applies only to States which have public domain. But I ask gentlemen of the East, I ask Representatives of the old thirteen States which have no public domain, whether they do not feel it would be a right thing to extend these surveys to those States as well as to the Territories of the United States and to the States that happen to have public domain?

Now, talking about "handing round the hat"——

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. HISCOCK. I withdraw the pro forma amendment.

Mr. WILSON. I renew the amendment. Mr. Chairman, if the people of this country have suffered from any one grievance greater than another at the hands of Congress, it is from the failure of Congress to make provision for a proper geological survey of the entire country, States as well as Territories. I hope that gentlemen on this floor are not to be scared by the bugaboo figures of the gentleman from New York, [Mr. HISCOCK,] who tells us that such survey will cost many millions of dollars.

Does not the gentleman know that we have already expended about $2,500,000 for geological surveys, maps, and reports, and what has been accomplished by it? About 672,000 square miles in the Rocky Mountain range and in the Territories have been surveyed and reported upon, an area as large as twenty of the average-size States of this Union, larger than the original thirteen States, and what has been accomplished by it? One of the results has been to reclaim the lands of the Indian warrior and to convert them into civilization.

But more than that, Mr. Chairman, has been accomplished. The largest and most valuable mines of the precious metals in the world have been discovered. Tens of millions of dollars have been withdrawn for the money centers in Europe and America to develop these mines, and their development has enabled this country to become the largest producer of gold and silver known to mankind. The wealth of the country has become immeasurably increased by it. Not only this, but farming lands, grazing and timber lands have been brought to public notice. Railroads have been projected, and much of that vast region is to-day the pride of this continent. Two and a half millions of dollars have been expended, and the magnificent results I have referred to have been realized. The geologist goes first, and following him goes the miner, then the farmer and grazer, then the lumberman, and then follow railroads and populous communities.

I regret very much, Mr. Chairman, that we have not been able this session to pass the measure which the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. ATKINS] presented here several years ago. Be it said to his honor that when the Democratic party had control of this House a proposition was adopted upon his motion making an appropriation for extending the geological survey throughout the entire United States, but it failed in the Senate.

I am pained to know that to-day we are so hampered by the existing rules of the House as that the same thing cannot under your ruling, Mr. Chairman, be done again. Consider what is to be the result of these surveys. Take, for instance, the Appalachian or Alleghenny range of mountains and their vast hidden wealth. We are to-day importing immense quantities of sulphate of lime, (plaster of Paris,) upon which we are paying customs duties and freight; it is used in the New England States, in the Middle States, in the Southern States, and in fact almost everywhere in the country as a fertilizer.

Look along this range; and we are told by geologists that running from New York, the gentleman's own State, New York down through Pennsylvania, through the two Virginias, Tennessee, and Alabama there can be found countless millions of tons of this fertilizer, enough to supply the needs of this country and of the world. But we want a geological survey. We want the benefit of scientific exploration to enable us to get at it.

A MEMBER. What fertilizer?

Mr. WILSON. Sulphate of lime. The same thing that is ordinarily known as plaster of Paris.

Mr. HISCOCK. In my own State——

Mr. WILSON. I cannot yield to the gentleman in my time.

Mr. Chairman, I read the following extract from the American Cyclopedia:

> Sulphate of lime enters into the composition of grasses, potatoes, turnips, &c., and these cannot flourish in soil entirely free from it. Its potency, however, is probably due in a far greater degree to its action in fixing volatile and escaping carbonate of ammonia. When this comes in contact with sulphate of lime, double decomposition takes place, carbonate of lime and sulphate of ammonia being formed. Its value as a fertilizer may be readily tested by distributing a quantity of it in a narrow line across a meadow. Where the plaster has fallen the grass will frequently be so much stronger and greener that the difference may be seen even at a considerable distance.

But, Mr. Chairman, there is another most valuable fertilizer which has recently been brought to public notice by the discoveries of large deposits in South Carolina. I refer to mineral phosphates or bone earth as they are sometimes called. To-day I was told by the distinguished geologist of North Carolina, Professor Kerr, that some of these deposits are worth $1,000 per acre. By some strange freak of nature the petrified bones of the whale, the mastodon, the shark, and of various other animals and fishes are found imbedded under the earth's surface. From these are manufactured the bone-dust fertilizer. So valuable is it as a fertilizer that it commands in the market from $30 to $40 per ton. May we not reasonably conclude that a thorough geological survey by the Government will disclose other similar deposits at other points on our ocean coast, and perhaps in the Gulf of Mexico?

But, sir, independent of these fertilizers it is almost certain that geological explorations will disclose additional deposits of coal, iron, copper, lead, and other valuable mineral resources which would add thousands of millions to the material wealth of the country. Especially would this be so in West Virginia, Virginia, North Carolina, Georgia, Kentucky, Tennessee, and Alabama.

It is the opinion of intelligent gentlemen, and Professor Kerr, to whom I have just referred is one of them, that a thorough geological survey will develop extensive and valuable deposits of gold ore in Virginia, North Carolina, and Georgia. I am in favor of the amendment, and hope it will be the pleasure of this House to adopt it. I do not know of any more judicious expenditure that could be made of the public money.

Mr. WILLITS addressed the committee. [See Appendix.]

Mr. WHITE rose.

The CHAIRMAN. Debate on the pending amendment is exhausted. The pro forma amendment was withdrawn.

Mr. REAGAN. I will renew the pro forma amendment. Now, Mr. Chairman, I shall have to vote against the proposed amendment, because it does not change the bill and because the original section and the section as it would be if amended seems to me not to be correct in principle.

The law as it is now recognizes the geological survey of the public domain in the States and Territories where the Government owns public lands, and that distinction seems to be taken here in the discussion as a proper one. Upon what does such a distinction rest?

The Constitution provides that "Congress shall have power to dispose of and make all needful rules and regulations respecting the territory and other property of the United States." That must be the authority, if there is any constitutional authority for what has been done. It is too late now to discuss the question, perhaps, whether the rules and regulations respecting the territory and other property of the United States should be allowed to apply to a case like this. But, sir, if it does it ought to apply to all the public property, and that is the point I wish to make; that it should be either limited to the public domain in the Territories of the United States, or if extended to the States having public lands belonging to the United States it should be extended to all of the States of the United States.

And I give notice now, Mr. Chairman, that I will move an amendment, to test the sense of the House, by adding such words in line 1574 as will confine it to Territories of the United States. I shall then, if that amendment be adopted, move for the reduction of the amount of the appropriation. If the House shall see fit, however, to vote that amendment down, I shall then move another amendment, for I wish the House to be right one way or the other, and that is to add after the word "survey" the words "of the United States;" and in line 1577 to strike out "national domain," and in lieu thereof to insert the words "United States." The two will place the question as it ought to be before this committee. The first will limit it to the public domain in the Territories and the other will extend it to all of the United States, so that if the first amendment is voted down the old thirteen States and the State of Texas and the older States which feel an interest in this work of a geological survey will have the same right with all the other States, although the Government may not own any public lands within their limits. The fact that a State has public lands in it or not will not affect the constitutional right. The Government may sell its public lands, and if it is excluded by the Constitution from a State that has no public lands it is by any just interpretation excluded from those which have. One or the other of these propositions must be correct. If it can be done at all; if we shall limit the operation of this provision to the public domain in the Territories, or without disregarding them, that we shall extend it to the States impartially and generally, as all of the States bear a like proportion of the expense, would seem proper.

Mr. FULKERSON. Mr. Chairman, the original amendment of the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. ATKINS] authorizes a geological map of the United States. The surveys of the Government are now confined to the Territories and the public lands located in the States. These surveys are made at the expense of the people of the States on the ground that they will bring the public lands into market and thereby inure to the benefit of the people generally. But these Government surveys are of peculiar interest to the people of the Territories, and these benefits continue after the Territories are admitted into the Union as States, and give them great advantages over the old States whose State surveys are inaccurate and less reliable than the Government surveys. The local surveys are unreliable and are regarded by capitalists and the foreign countries from which we draw emigration with suspicion, indeed as worthless.

Many of the States are richer in mineral deposits, both in quantity and quality, than the Territories, notably Virginia, West Virginia, North Carolina, Tennessee, Kentucky, Alabama, and Georgia. Taking Bristol, Tennessee, as the center, and with a radius three hundred miles in length describe a circle, and the area will contain a greater amount and a greater variety of minerals than exist in a like area in any other part of the United States. Iron, coal, copper, zinc, salt, plaster, lead, barytes, mica, granite, marble, sandstone, soapstone, limestone, &c., are all there in the greatest profusion, but are undeveloped and unknown to the outside world. Shall these great mines of wealth lie dormant and await the slow development of the individual States, or will the Government, by a small appropriation and an accurate survey and map under its authority, bring them at once to the notice of the capitalists of the world? The development of these great sources of wealth will inure to the benefit of the whole people of the country.

Mr. Chairman, during the preceding winter I have carefully investigated the operations of the surveys and their practical results. There can be no legislation of greater general benefit than that proposed by the amendment. The different geological surveys of the West have in the last twenty years completed an area in excess of 672,000 square miles, equal to twenty of the Atlantic States, the whole cost being less than $2,500,000. The region surveyed is so mapped that every physical feature is exhibited with an accuracy vastly superior to the surveys of the States east of the Mississippi, with perhaps two or three exceptions. The maps of that region are so perfect that railroads have been and are now in course of construction by them, without the usual preliminary investigations, over a region of country more difficult and irregular than any other on the North American continent. Every timber, desert, irrigable, and pasturage district is defined and the structural and economic geology illustrated in so simple a manner that the most ordinary understanding can take in and comprehend its formations.

The work already completed is of incalculable benefit to the country; every settler on the public domain is guided by it; all the mining pursuits are simplified; and should hostilities occur either with Indians or whites of that region, Army engineers are provided with information that will enable us to restore order at small cost of life and treasure. The work in progress ought to be continued until it is completed, and liberal appropriations should be granted.

The Interior Department estimated $250,000 for that purpose; the Appropriations Committee, controlled in this case by spasmodic and abnormal economy, reduced this estimate $100,000. Has it ever struck the House that the committee are given to straining at gnats and swallowing camels?

The Department also estimated $100,000 for expanding the surveys and for the prosecution of geologic researches in the States east of the Mississippi River. This was ignored by a majority of the committee, although they were well aware that but little was known of the geologic features of at least three-fourths of the States; that a vast mountain region traversing the Atlantic slopes, abounding in minerals, had not, except in a limited area, the benefit of scientific investigation, the development of which would offer new fields for labor, would add vastly to the wealth of the localities and the whole country, and would perhaps be instrumental in the solution of economic questions relating to labor that now, through strikes, disturb our financial security.

In the past the public domain, which offered homes to the poorer classes, was easily acquired and accessible without difficulty. This resource is substantially exhausted, and in the future we will be compelled to resort to the wise policies that govern older societies.

There is no community in the country, however distant it may be from the field of operations, that is not directly interested in the prosecution of this work. Its cost is insignificant when compared with the benefit derived from it. It will present opportunity for investment of capital, with certainty of profitable returns; will transform mountain wildernesses to bee-hives of industry; will largely increase the national wealth and make easy to the people the payment of taxes necessarily imposed to defray public expenses; in short, it is a practical and therefore sensible mode of meeting many of the difficulties that now confront us and which will grow more formidable as our population increases.

Great Britain appropriates annually for geological purposes alone, in a territory little exceeding two of our ordinary States, near five times as much as the Appropriations Committee recommends for our vast and unexplored domain. It appears to me that public interest demands that the surveys should have the full amount of the estimates of the Department.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, I should have contented myself not to have said anything with reference to this proposition were it not for the fact that my colleague on the committee from Kentucky, and also the chairman of the committee, the gentleman from New York, have seen fit to attack an amendment similar to this, and also the bureau. I do not think, sir, that this amendment is subject to the criticism that the gentleman from New York has sought to place upon it, and, judging from the remarks of the gentleman from Kentucky, I hardly think that he would have so criticised it were it not for the fact that his own State has expended somewhere in the neighborhood of a million of dollars for geological surveys which he thinks should in a certain contingency be refunded to the State by the United States. But it will be time enough to consider that question when it comes up properly before the House.

Now, under the law, without any dispute, this survey, if it be confined to the public lands, can go into Alabama, it can go into Mississippi, it can go into Arkansas or into Missouri, or it can go, if desired, into any of the States where the United States owns public lands as well as into the extreme West. Now, if the amendment is adopted, and I am inclined to think if money enough is given that the work can be done without the adoption of the amendment—but if the amendment is adopted, and an increase of the appropriation is made, I have no doubt at all that the Director of the survey will go into those States and commence the surveys as far as practicable, and I think he ought to do so.

Mr. KENNA. Will the gentleman permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. CANNON. If it is brief.

Mr. KENNA. I wish to ask the gentleman from Illinois if it shall be found necessary in the prosecution of the geological surveys (coming literally within the law) to go outside of the public domain so as to take in any part of the surrounding structure, he does not believe that under the spirit of the law the director of the survey would be authorized to do so?

Mr. CANNON. Certainly.

Mr. KENNA. And that if to complete his work he must get information touching territory outside of the prescribed border, he would not be justified and have the authority, as I believe he has, under the proposed amendment, to use this fund to enable him to complete his map according to the spirit of the law?

Mr. CANNON. Oh, certainly; he would have the right and discretion under the amendment. That has been done frequently. These surveys, for instance, of the mineral lands at Leadville necessarily embraced surrounding property of private citizens, and it is idle to say that you cannot make a map or survey except upon the exact ground the United States has title to.

This Government embraces a larger property, a larger domain than merely the public lands; and I am inclined to think that a fair construction of the law would include the whole domain of the Federal Government, "national domain," meaning national dominion, the whole territory. But let that be as it may, under the law we can adopt this amendment; and under the law, as claimed by the strict constructionists, we can increase the appropriation from $50,000 to $100,000 over that recommended in the bill, as I believe it can be and ought to be increased.

But it is said that these surveys are not to come east of the Mississippi River. Now, who pays the expense of these surveys? The greater portion of the expense of the surveys is paid by the older portion of the country, and I undertake to say that at our expense these Western Territories are better surveyed geographically and geologically than the country east of the Mississippi River. I want to see these technicalities thrown away; and, as we have to pay the bills, I want the law itself made to operate uniformly throughout the country, and the hidden wealth which is now unknown all about us brought to light by the judicious and careful investigations and surveys of this bureau.

Again, the gentleman from New York is, as I have said, a strict constructionist. I wonder why he did not strike at some of the other provisions in this bill which we have already passed, and which are just as objectionable on the ground that he now alleges as this provision? Why did not he strike at the Coast Survey?

On page 20 of the bill I find a provision made for a magnetic map of Eastern North America and a general map of the eastern part of the United States; and the gentleman made no objection to that. Now, when I turn to the Revised Statutes I find that the Coast Survey only takes in by law the coast and twenty leagues at sea. Quite a liberal construction there; and yet $600,000 is authorized in round numbers to be given to the Coast Survey for these operations. Now, the amount recommended here for this geological survey is only $122,000, and we propose to broaden the work a little and increase it by $50,000 or $100,000. I submit to him, with the great respect I have for him, if it does not make a little difference whose ox is being gored.

Mr. HISCOCK. I desire to answer the question of the gentleman from Illinois. If there has crept into the appropriation bill any enlargement of the law I do not know it. We have subdivided the old law and made a distinct appropriation for distinct objects; and that is all we have done in that direction.

Mr. ATKINS. Will the gentleman from New York allow me to ask him one question?

Mr. HISCOCK. Certainly.

Mr. ATKINS. I want to ask him this question: the gentleman believes it is constitutional to make a geodetic survey; will he tell me why it is unconstitutional to make a geological survey?

Mr. HISCOCK. I do not believe it is unconstitutional to make a geological survey. I believe when the Government has property——

Mr. ATKINS. I will change the form of my inquiry. The gentleman believes it is in accordance with public policy to make a geodetic survey; why does he not believe it to be in accordance with public policy to make a geological survey?

Mr. HISCOCK. I believe it is constitutional and lawful and everything else to make a geodetic survey within certain limits, and I believe it is constitutional and lawful to make a geological survey within certain limits. But I do not believe it is a proper thing to make a geological survey for the benefit of railroad corporations, to develop the wealth in the mountains through which they are preparing to run their roads, and to develop the wealth of the lands which they have got.

Mr. ATKINS. The gentleman speaks of limited areas. The geodetic survey has been made from a point in New Jersey to Atlanta, a distance of six hundred miles in a straight line.

Mr. HISCOCK. The geodetic survey properly has been so far an extension of the coast survey or of the deep-sea soundings coming up to the coast and so far on to the coast as seems to be demanded in the interest of commerce and for the proper preparation of their charts. So far as the geodetic survey has extended beyond that the gentleman from Tennessee is responsible for it, as I believe; at least the three last Congresses are responsible in providing the triangulation from the Pacific coast to the Atlantic.

Mr. ATKINS. They had it long before. The gentleman must reread on that subject.

Mr. REAGAN withdrew the pro forma amendment.

Mr. WHITE. I renew the amendment. I agree fully with the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. WILLIS] that the amendment offered by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. REAGAN] is unnecessary, but I heartily concur in the conclusions reached by the latter gentleman. The phrase "geological survey" covers the whole ground. To make a complete and useful work there should be the most liberal appropriations, to be applied wisely and equitably to the whole territory of the United States. To talk about a geological survey for the public domain alone is to display ignorance of the subject. Everybody knows that a coast survey includes the triangulation of the interior, the measurement of the highest mountains, as well as the indentations along the sea-coast.

When you make an appropriation for the geodetic and coast survey you do not say nor mean that no part thereof shall be expended beyond the roar of the waves and upon the public domain, but you make it apply equally to every part of the country. The information to be ascertained is of national importance. That work is so understood, and the geological survey, no less important, from the very nature of the case must be a national work. The geological formations are not bounded by State lines, nor can the study of them be wisely restricted to the public domain. A formation peculiar to a geological age may be observed in one State and not be discovered again in traveling over half a dozen States.

I would have the hands of the Superintendent of the Geological Survey so strengthened that he could hunt up the outcroppings of every stratum in every State and Territory. My colleague [Mr. BLACKBURN] has not gotten entirely over his State-rights hobby. He is improving, however. He has been thoroughly converted on the question of appropriations for the improvement of rivers within States, and on this subject seems no longer to have doubts as to the constitutional power of Congress without interfering with State rights. He is a fair man, and an honest man, and desires to be in accord with the people of Kentucky, and I look hopefully to his getting new light from them on the question of a geological survey which shall apply not to the public domain alone but be coextensive with the Union. He seems to be afraid that the State of Kentucky will lose something by having a higher authority than the State geological survey of that State certify to the world the value of the State geological reports. He reminds the committee of the fact that our State has been forty years gathering that geological oinfrmation, and to that end has expended nearly a million of dollsar, and he demands as a condition, if I understood him correctly, that Kentucky shall be reimbursed in that sum before he will ever consent to have a national geological survey for the whole Union.

I desire here to enter my earnest protest against having the people of Kentucky placed in this false light. The State of Kentucky is a great State with vast and varied resources, and her people have spent a great deal of money to obtain valuable geological reports. She has done that with no selfish purpose. Those reports go out to the world, and are considered high authority, but Kentucky is not so well known abroad as the United States, and the substance of those reports if published by the United States Geological Survey would unquestionably have greater weight with immigrants from abroad and with capitalists at home and abroad.

And to talk about Kentucky losing anything is simply nonsense. Her object in collecting the information for her geological reports was to give the information freely to her citizens and to the world, and to demand that she be reimbursed would be as foolish as for a physician in good standing to set a price for the regular medical profession to pay him for any discovery he had made in the science of medicine.

Professor Shaler, in his report to the Kentucky State Legislature, January, 1876, says:

Nature has bestowed with lavish hand her gifts upon our State. Rich in all the elements of material greatness, possessing two extensive coal-fields, an abundance of iron ore of great variety and excellent quality, contiguous to coal and timber, with five rivers (the Tradewater, Green, Kentucky, Licking and Big Sandy) leading from our coal, iron, and timber lands, through our rich agricultural regions, and capable of being made navigable at all seasons, thus giving to our State a larger water frontage of mineral lands than is possessed by any other country, and affording to our mines, manufactories, and farming lands direct water communication with thirteen of the largest and wealthiest of our sister States.

A careful observer, after an extended tour of observation through our State, writes: "There is no reason why Kentucky should not already have received a mighty current of immigration, excepting the negligence of her people with regard to their own interests." To convince ourselves of the truth of this let us make comparison of our development with States of like natural advantages that have profited by these advantages by affording transportation facilities for the development of their resources. For this reason take Pennsylvania and Ohio, those States being about the size of Kentucky with near the same area of coal-fields, the advantages being in favor of the latter, as follows:

Ohio having	10,000 square miles of coal-fields.
Pennsylvania having	12,630 square miles of coal-fields.
Kentucky having	12,771 square miles of coal-fields.

In iron ores I believe the present geological survey of the State will develop the fact that our State has the advantage over either of those States. Our hard-wood timber, suitable for manufacturing purposes, is more abundant, and in timber suitable for charcoal, convenient to iron ores, we have a decided advantage. Our undeveloped water-power exceeds the water-power of those States. Yet with these natural advantages, what have we to show in actual production to compare with them?

The value of the products of mining industries in 1870 was—

In Kentucky	$509,245
In Ohio	7,751,544
In Pennsylvania	76,208,390

Our mineral districts are capable of supporting a denser population, yet there are less than five inhabitants to the square mile in the mining districts of Kentucky, while in Ohio there are from forty to seventy-five, and in Pennsylvania from forty-five to one hundred and twenty-five.

The distribution of wealth in the mining districts of the three States in 1870 was—

In Kentucky less than	$300	per capita.
In Ohio from	750 to $1,250	per capita.
In Pennsylvania from	1,250 to 2,000	per capita.

Notwithstanding the superior quality and quantity of our hard-wood timber, the value of agricultural implements manufactured in 1870 was—

In Kentucky	$1,384,917
In Pennsylvania	3,652,295
In Ohio	11,907,366

I know from personal observation that we greatly surpass Ohio in timber suitable for hubs, spokes, fellies, &c.; yet Kentucky manufactured $38,232 worth, and Ohio manufactured $1,712,808 worth.

Most of the raw cotton passes the entire length of our State on the way to Pennsylvania, yet the value of cotton goods manufactured in the two States was, in 1870:

In Kentucky	$498,960
In Pennsylvania	17,490,080

Our water-power is greater, yet the following table is instructive:

States.	No. of wheels.	Horse-power.
Kentucky	459	7,640
Ohio	2,157	44,746
Pennsylvania	7,603	141,962

Notwithstanding the extent of our coal-fields and the facilities which a judicious expenditure would afford for getting our coal to market, and use it in profitable home manufacturing industries, in 1872—

Kentucky mined	340,000 tons.
Ohio mined	3,000,000 tons.
Pennsylvania mined	29,442,000 tons.

The reason for these great differences is that Kentucky has practically ignored the existence of her great natural advantages and mineral wealth, and has as it were permitted a Chinese wall to hedge in the richest portion of her domain, while Ohio and Pennsylvania, by affording canal and railroad facilities to their mines and manufactories, have made rapid advancement in material wealth.

The salt wells on the Upper Kentucky River could supply the South and West with that indispensable article, yet not one bushel finds its way to the Ohio River. Should the canal connecting the Cumberland with the Kentucky be built, the tonnage of salt going South would be immense.

Below the Forks of the Kentucky River there is a good hydraulic limestone of quite an extended area. This would not only cheapen the cost of the locks and dams on the river, but a large amount could be manufactured for market after the river is improved.

I have briefly as I could referred to some of the best-known undeveloped resources of the Upper Kentucky and Upper Cumberland region. With development of these, many hidden sources of wealth will be brought to light. The agricultural capabilities of this region are much greater than they are supposed to be by persons unfamiliar with them. Now the farmer can raise nothing—owing to the impossibilities of transportation—which he can haul to market and sell at a profit. The few roads have gone to utter ruin since the war. I doubt if a loaded wagon could pass through many of these counties. The improvement of our natural water-ways will not only open up these counties, but will benefit the entire agricultural interests of our State. The agricultural prosperity of China, the Netherlands, and England is mainly due to the cheap water communication afforded by their canals.

As the Kentucky River is the largest river in the State, and the one the improvement of which will open up the largest undeveloped district, besides affording facilities for the interchange of products between twenty-four counties of the Commonwealth, I have been at some pains to collect facts respecting the resources of the country adjacent to it and the means by which it may be made navigable. From the imperfect records now extant of the old surveys made under the direction of the board of internal improvement and the recent researches of the State geological survey, I am enabled to collect the following facts:

From the mouth of the Kentucky River to the Three Forks the distance is 257½ miles, with a total ascent of 212 feet. There are completed five locks, affording navigation to the first 96 miles leaving 161½ miles to be completed. From the Three Forks to mouth of Troublesome Creek is 55 miles, with a raise of 39 feet. The cost of slackwater navigation from the head of navigation at lock No. 5 to mouth of Troublesome Creek would be $1,275,000, or about $6,000 per mile. This would be at the rate of $6,209 per mile to Three Forks and $5,000 per mile from there to mouth of Troublesome Creek. Contracts were made at this rate in 1870, and I am informed by the contractors that it could be done for less now.

The following table will show the feasibility of this plan and the advantages of this river:

Object.	Length, miles.	Lockage, feet.	Width of channel, feet.	Total cost.	Cost per mile.
Kentucky River to mouth of Troublesome Creek	312½	296	250	*$1,275,000	$5,902
Erie Canal	350	689	70	43,639,324	124,683
Delaware and Hudson Canal	108	1,073	48	6,339,210	60,200
Lehigh Canal	46	361	60	4,455,000	51,208
Ohio Canal	308	1,207	40	3,225,684	10,473

*This does not include the work done on the lower part of the river.

The improvement of the Kentucky River will cost less, the lockage is less, and the width is greatest. Some of these canals are troubled for supply of water at the summit in summer. The Kentucky River at lowest water in summer runs 20,000 cubic feet of water per minute below the forks and 8,000 cubic feet per minute above the forks, affording not only ample supply for navigation, but a large water-power surplus for manufacturing purposes.

Now, suppose that report had been made by the Superintendent of the United States Geological Survey, who can doubt that the effect would have been of incalculable benefit to the State of Kentucky?

There is no conflict between the State and national authorities on this question before the committee. Let us do all we can to help on the good work.

Mr. ROBESON. I desire to draw a line, if I can, between what I feel to be the authorized action of the General Government and that which is outside its purview. I am no State-rights man; everybody knows that I am for giving the fullest powers to the General Government that can be implied from its rights or inferred from its duties. The coast survey and geodetic survey grow out of the jurisdiction of the General Government over commerce, and also from the necessity of fixing State lines. The ordinary right to make geological surveys must be confined to the lands of the United States owned by it; because there is nothing in the conferred power of the Constitution which gives to the General Government in any way jurisdiction over that subject. There is no right of the Government in the mines of the country except where it owns the soil and the surface absolutely. There is no sovereignty power over them. They belong to the individuals who own them. There is nothing of national power, there is nothing of national authority, there is no subject which is referred to the General Government of the United States from which the right to prospect for mines can be derived.

Mr. CANNON. How about the promotion of commerce among the States?

Mr. ROBESON. It is not commerce; it is not the survey of the public lands; it is not the fixing of the lines of States; it is not the building of post-roads or the maintaining of post-routes. You cannot place your finger anywhere in the Constitution upon one word or syllable from which, either directly or inferentially, this power can be given to the General Government. Now, I am in favor of enlarging all its powers; I am in favor of strengthening its power wherever that power reaches. But I would hold it within its constitutional lines, in order that it may have the reserved force behind to exercise its constitutional duties, and wield its constitutional powers to the full extent, when they are legitimately exercised.

The CHAIRMAN. Debate is exhausted upon the pro forma amendment, which will be considered as withdrawn. The question is upon the amendment of the gentleman from Tennessee, [Mr. ATKINS.]

The question was taken, and upon a division there were—ayes 52, noes 40.

Mr. HISCOCK. No quorum has voted, and I call for tellers.

Tellers were ordered; and Mr. HISCOCK and Mr. ATKINS were appointed.

The committee again divided; and the tellers reported that there were—ayes 92, noes 63.

So the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. REAGAN. I move to amend the pending paragraph by striking out the words at the commencement of the paragraph "for the United States Geological Survey" and inserting in lieu thereof the words "for a geological survey of the Territories of the United States."

Mr. HISCOCK. I make a point of order on that amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair overrules the point of order.

Mr. HISCOCK. Does the amendment use the word "Territories" or "Territory."

Mr. REAGAN. "Territories."

Mr. ATKINS. I make a point of order on that amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. ATKINS. My point of order is that it is new legislation and does not upon its face or necessarily reduce expenditures. The law now authorizes the geological survey to go into the States where there is public domain. This is a modification of that law, and therefore new legislation.

Mr. DUNN. And keeps it out of the States where there is no public domain.

Mr. ATKINS. And keeps it out of the States where there is no public domain, out of the States of Arkansas, Louisiana, Mississippi, Colorado, Nebraska, and other States.

Mr. REAGAN. I will modify my amendment so as to obviate the point of order by reducing the appropriation from $122,000 to $50,000.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair does not consider that necessary. The clause to which the amendment relates is in the nature of a title to the paragraph, like the title of a bill. The Chair overrules the point of order.

Mr. REAGAN. I have presented this amendment for the purpose of getting the sense of the House, as I stated a little while ago. I want to know whether it is the purpose to limit these geological surveys to the Territories of the United States or to go into the States. If we go into the States I then propose to offer another amendment extending the surveys to all the States. We should either go into all the States or we should stay out of all the States.

It cannot be assumed that because the Government owns land in one State and does not own it in another, therefore it has the constitutional jurisdiction to go into that State. That is a policy which I propose to meet by this amendment. If it is voted down, then I shall present the other alternative. I ask the judgment of the Committee of the Whole on the amendment.

The amendment was not agreed to.

Mr. WILLITS. I move to amend the paragraph by increasing the sum appropriated from $122,000 to $222,000.

Mr. HISCOCK. I say to gentlemen that even if they intend to go further they had better wait until they get the force organized before they put so much money into the hopper.

Mr. CANNON. The force is already organized.

The question was taken upon the amendment of Mr. WILLITS; and upon a division there were—ayes 50, noes 45.

So (no further count being called for) the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. REAGAN. I have another amendment to offer. I move to insert, after the words "geological survey," in line 1575, the words "of the United States;" and, in line 1577, strike out the words "national domain" and insert in lieu thereof the words "the United States."

Mr. HISCOCK. I make a point of order on that amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state his point of order.

Mr. HISCOCK. It is that it is new legislation, proposing to extend the operation of this work, and certainly cannot decrease expenditures.

Mr. REAGAN. This is a provision for a geological survey. The amendment just adopted is for a geological survey and map of the United States. That is now in the bill and is to be considered in deciding the question of order.

My amendment proposes to aid in the execution of the amendment just adopted by the majority of the House. You cannot have a map without a survey upon which to predicate it. This is for a geological survey and has been extended into the States and the Territories. There is nothing in existing law that excludes any State except by implication.

My amendment proposes to make it clear, and was intended to make it clear, that it shall extend to all the States impartially. If adopted it will embrace not only the original thirteen States, but the State of Texas, in which there is no public lands, and all the other States; not only the land States, but the other States of the Union. If there is any authority for going into a State at all, it is an unjust discrimination to extend this survey to a part and not to the rest of the States.

The CHAIRMAN. Allow the Chair to ask the gentleman whether under any provision of existing law the geological survey may be extended beyond the national domain.

Mr. REAGAN. By the words of the amendment just adopted, and which is now a part of the bill, there is to be a geological map of the United States; it was intended to cover the United States. I but follow with a more explicit direction.

Mr. HISCOCK. The language used is "geological map of the national domain."

Mr. REAGAN. I fail to remember whether the words "national domain" or "the United States" were used.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair asks, for information on the point of order, whether the gentleman can point to any statute which authorizes a geological survey beyond the national domain?

Mr. REAGAN. Mr. Chairman, I am not sufficiently familiar with the legislation on this subject to say whether there is in the statutes any language providing for surveying outside of the national domain. If the decision of the Chair rests upon that point I am not able to assist him.

The CHAIRMAN. In the opinion of the Chair, there being no law shown, and the recollection of the Chair being that there is no law which authorizes surveys outside of the public domain, the amendment of the gentleman is ruled out of order.

Mr. REAGAN. I move, then, to strike out the entire paragraph providing for geological surveys; and I want to state my reasons for this motion. I wish to test the sense of the House as to whether it means that its legislation, without obviating constitutional difficulties, shall be partial, discriminating, and unjust. Why should the State of New York be excluded from these surveys and the State of Iowa included. Why should the State of Virginia be excluded and the State of Wisconsin included? Can any one assign a reason? Is there any principle in the Constitution upon which such a discrimination can rest? If there is not, then this legislation is partial, discriminating, and unjust. You compel the people of a portion of the States to which you deny these advantages to furnish revenue to aid in giving them to other States. In my judgment the proper method to meet this question is to strike out the whole paragraph and begin upon some basis which will either limit this geological survey to the Territories of the United States and to the public domain, or to extend it alike and equally to all the States.

The question being taken on the motion of Mr. REAGAN, it was not agreed to, there being—ayes 4, noes not counted.

The Clerk read as follows:

Government Hospital for the Insane:

For current expenses of the Government Hospital for the Insane: For support, clothing, and treatment in the Government Hospital for the Insane of the insane of the Army and Navy, Marine Corps, and revenue-cutter service, and those committed from the National Homes for Disabled Volunteer Soldiers, and persons charged with or convicted of crimes against the United States, and of all persons who have become insane since their entry into the military or naval service of the United States, and who are indigent, and of the indigent insane of the District of Columbia, $202,500; and not exceeding $1,000 of this sum may be expended in defraying the expenses of the removal of patients to their friends; and that hereafter the surplus products and waste material of the hospital may be sold or exchanged for the benefit of the hospital, the proceeds to be used and accounted for the same as its other funds: Provided, That in addition to the persons now entitled to admission to said hospital, any inmate of the National Home for Disabled Volunteer Soldiers who is now or may hereafter become insane shall, upon an order of the president of the board of managers of said national home, be admitted to said hospital and treated therein; and if any inmate so admitted from said national home is or thereafter becomes a pensioner, and has neither wife, minor child, nor parent dependent on him, in whole or in part, for support, his arrears of pension and his pension-money accruing during the period he shall remain in said hospital shall be applied to his support in said hospital, and be paid over to the proper officer of said institution for the general uses thereof.

Mr. DAWES. I move to amend by striking out all that portion of this paragraph beginning with the word "and," in line 1614, and extending to the end of the paragraph.

This amendment strikes out so much of the pending paragraph as proposes to appropriate to the use of the hospital the pension-money and the arrears of pension of a very limited class of insane persons, who may be authorized by law to enjoy the benefits of this hospital. The provision which my amendment proposes to strike out is so palpably wrong that I will occupy the attention of the committee only a moment. Under this paragraph, when an inmate of the National Home for Disabled Soldiers becomes insane he may, upon the order of the president of the board of managers, be admitted to the Government Hospital. But the provision I move to strike out would take from him any pension or arrears of pension which might accrue while he was in the asylum. In certain cases arrears might amount to three or four thousand dollars, which the insane patient would be obliged to forfeit for the benefit of the asylum. In any case it seems to me this great Government ought not to put its hands upon the pension-money of any of the disabled soldiers to whom it proposes to extend the benefits of this asylum. I think the provision ought to be stricken out. It was evidently inserted with the expectation in the minds of the committee that a somewhat similar provision in a previous part of the bill, which has been stricken out, would be adopted.

Mr. HISCOCK. I desire to say to the gentleman, in order that there may be no misapprehension about it, that this provision was not put in with the intention of having it in the line of the provision stricken out. There is no reason why a man who is insane and who is supported by the Government and who has no minor child nor wife nor parent dependent upon him for support should have the arrears of pension applied for his support; he does not need it and cannot use it.

Mr. DAWES. But suppose he gets well; some of these men do get well after a few months, or it may be after some years.

Mr. HISCOCK. Then if he gets well the money will come to him again.

I move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose, and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. KASSON reported that the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, having had under consideration the bill (H. R. No. 6716) making appropriations for the sundry civil expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1883, and for other purposes, had come to no conclusion thereon.

LOSS OF CERTAIN PRIVATE PROPERTY.

The SPEAKER, by unanimous consent, laid before the House a communication from the Secretary of War, transmitting the proceedings of a board of officers in the matter of the destruction of private property of certain members of Troop M, Eighth Cavalry, and Troop G, Seventh Cavalry; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED.

Mr. WARNER, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that the committee had examined and found duly enrolled a bill of the following title; when the Speaker signed the same:

A bill (H. R. No. 4167) to enable national banking associations to extend their corporate existence, and for other purposes.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. HISCOCK. I desire to make a suggestion at the request of gentlemen on both sides of the House, that inasmuch as by a previous order of the House a recess is to be taken from five o'clock this evening until eight o'clock, that that order be vacated, and that in place of it the House shall continue in session this evening until six o'clock and then adjourn. Otherwise I shall have to insist upon an evening session.

Mr. RANDALL. Why not adjourn now? We are ahead of the Senate.

Mr. HISCOCK. The Senate wants this bill as soon as possible to be referred to the committee to work upon it.

Mr. BLACKBURN. We can do more work between now and six o'clock than we could at a night session.

Mr. HISCOCK. Undoubtedly. I ask, therefore, that there be unanimous consent of the House to vacate that former order for the purpose I have indicated, and we will go on with this bill until six o'clock.

Mr. RANDALL. Say a quarter before six.

Mr. HISCOCK. No, six o'clock.

Mr. RANDALL. Then I shall be compelled to object.

Mr. HISCOCK. Then we must have an evening session.

Mr. RANDALL. Not necessarily. I move that the House adjourn.

Mr. HISCOCK. In that case I shall feel compelled to call the yeas and nays, which will consume all of the time between now and five o'clock, and at that time the House must take a recess.

Mr. RANDALL. Not during the call of the yeas and nays. I do not desire, however, to antagonize the wishes of other gentlemen, and if it be the desire of the House to sit until six o'clock, I shall not object to it.

Mr. HISCOCK. Then I ask again that the former order of the House providing for a recess from five o'clock until eight be rescinded for to-day and that the House continue in session until six o'clock for the further consideration of the sundry civil appropriation bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York?

There was no objection.

DEFICIENCY APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. HISCOCK. I ask now, Mr. Speaker, unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table the deficiency appropriation bill with Senate amendments for reference to the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. HOLMAN. Let the amendments be printed.

Mr. HISCOCK. They are already printed and numbered.

The SPEAKER. Without objection the bill referred to by the gentleman from New York will be taken from the Speaker's table and referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

There was no objection, and it was ordered accordingly.

SUNDRY CIVIL APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. HISCOCK. I move that the House now resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the sundry civil appropriation bill.

The motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, Mr. KASSON in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. DAWES,] which the Clerk will again report.

The amendment was again read.

Mr. WILLIAMS, of Wisconsin, took the floor and yielded to Mr. DAWES.

Mr. DAWES. In order that the amendment may be understood I will state that the application of the provision is to unmarried soldiers, and widowers without minor children or parents dependent upon them. Now, against them the distinction is made that the arrears of pension which may accrue to them while in the Hospital for the Insane is forfeited to the use of the hospital, and the accruing pensions are also applied in the same way. If the soldier dies without heirs it may be well to legislate in this manner, and let the fund thus accumulated inure to the benefit of the hospital, and I would be in favor, I think, of such a proposition, but the arrears is their property just as much as if they had wives and children or dependent parents.

Upon the assumption of the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations that they are all hopelessly insane and the same as dead without heirs, it might be well to legislate to have their arrears given to the benefit of the hospital. I would not object to that when such a case existed, but I do insist it is invidious, undignified, and unworthy of this great and wealthy Government to put its hands on the property of those poor lunatics and appropriate it for the support of a hospital for the insane, when by the very proviso of the bill we have it indicated by the action of the committee that there is room for them, plenty of provision, and money enough appropriated to support the hospital.

I understand that arrears accrue when the claim for them is allowed. If the soldier's claim is allowed when he is in the hospital the money passes to the general uses of the hospital. Should he afterward recover, he has lost his arrears and the Government is the beneficiary. At least I so interpret this provision of the bill. If, however, he should have a minor child even partially dependent on him he is exempted from forfeiture of arrears or accruing pension. This is unequal and unjust. It is wiser to keep the hands of the Government entirely off of the pension-money of the soldier.

Mr. HISCOCK. I want to state one fact in addition to what has already been stated bearing upon the question whether this great nation is liberal to the soldiers. The bill carries $125,000 to build an insane hospital for these very soldiers; or to enlarge the hospital for the accommodation of these insane soldiers. We believe that where they are widowers, where they have no wives, no children, no parents dependent upon them for their support, what property they have they can afford to turn in for their support and maintenance. And this very property is given to them by the Government really to support and maintain them; and we are simply applying it to their support and maintenance.

Mr. BRAGG. I think it is time we commenced to call a halt on this question about the great rights of soldiers. I think the country is running mad on this pension question; and I think that the effort which is made from time to time to make political capital by talking about the soldiers and their interest in their pensions it might be well to check a little. I am not willing to acknowledge that any member of this House, or any person elsewhere, entertains a more profound respect and admiration for a soldier than I do. Still, I am not willing to go to the extremes which some gentlemen favor on this question. We stipulated to provide for our soldiers a pension; not a pension which was to place them in affluence, but a pension which would be a contribution on the part of the Government toward their support. We did not stipulate to build them homes and to furnish them with clothing and to supply them with all the necessaries of life so long as they might live. We have granted them their pension. We have now made the provision by which we furnish them their board and lodging and clothing and take care of them. We have gone further than that. We have made a provision by this bill that the insane should be cared for—not as they are now hired out among the asylums of the different States, but we are to build an asylum to take care of them.

That is something we never stipulated to do. And now this bill simply proposes that that class of soldiers who have no dependent relatives, no heirs, no children, and almost no friends except as soldiers; when they become insane if they are to receive the benefit of this other appropriation of the Government which provides for their care and keeping and furnishes them scientific medical aid to take care of them while they occupy that position—the bill proposes that the money which the Government pays to them as a gift shall be applied by the Government in support of the other gift which is given to them, their home, their keep, and the medical attendance. It is to take care of them during their life. This does justice to the Government, and it does no harm to the soldier. I am asked what an insane man would do with his money. If permitted to go out he would fall into the hands of the first sharper and be robbed of his money and clothing and come back to be reclothed, refed, and rehabilitated.

Mr. DAWES. Suppose the insane pensioner recovers, how would it be if he finds that in the mean time his arrears have been escheated?

Mr. BRAGG. They are not escheated. That word does not occur in this bill. But it says the arrears which accrue, that is while he is insane, shall be applied in the way specified. Now, I maintain that the pension which accrues to any soldier who goes and lives on the Government and is clothed by the Government should go to pay for the clothing which he wears and the provisions which he eats. When we agreed to pension a soldier what was the intention in giving that pension? It was that we might provide the soldier with clothing, that we might provide him with a place to live, that we might contribute our quota to give him that which he had to eat. That is the object of a pension. Now, when a soldier instead of clothing himself, instead of using his pension-money to support himself, goes into a home provided by the Government, takes his food and clothing and medical aid from the Government, I say he should no longer be a pensioner to the extent which draws money, because he draws that which is worth more than the money would be. In doing this, then, we do him no injustice, but do to him that which is right and proper.

The question being taken on the amendment offered by Mr. DAWES, it was not agreed to.

The Clerk continued reading the bill until the clause was reached appropriating for the Columbian Institution for the Deaf and Dumb.

Mr. SPRINGER. I suggest now to the gentleman from New York [Mr. HISCOCK] that we go back to line 1041, as was agreed.

Mr. HISCOCK. We are getting along just now so smoothly that I think we should allow the Clerk to continue to read. If we should go back to the portion of the bill indicated by the gentleman from Illinois, we would use up all the evening.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. I ask the gentleman from New York [Mr. HISCOCK] to allow the next two paragraphs to be passed over for the present. The gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. BLACKBURN,] who takes an interest in those paragraphs, has been called out of the Hall.

Mr. HISCOCK. Oh, no.

Mr. SPRINGER. If the gentleman will allow me to offer my amendment, the gentleman from Kentucky may be back by the time it is disposed of.

Mr. HISCOCK. Oh, no; I know how the gentleman from Kentucky feels about them.

The Clerk read the following:

Columbian Institution for the Deaf and Dumb:

For current expenses of the Columbian Institution for the Deaf and Dumb: For support of the institution, including salaries and incidental expenses, and for books and illustrative apparatus, for general repairs and improvements, $47,000: Provided, That no more than $22,000 of said sum shall be expended for salaries and wages, which shall be adjusted by the Secretary of the Interior.

Mr. RANDALL. I make a point of order upon the proviso of the paragraph just read. I desire to direct the attention of the Chair to the statute relating to the Columbian Institution for the Deaf and Dumb. In the absence of the gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. TUCKER,] who has been necessarily called away, I make the point of order that this proviso changes existing law, in so far as it proposes to permit the Secretary of the Interior to adjust the salaries of the officers of this institution. The existing law places that power in the hands of the board of managers.

The CHAIRMAN. Will the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RANDALL] direct the Chair to the section of the law to which he refers?

Mr. RANDALL. It is section 10. I do not think my statement will be disputed.

Mr. HISCOCK. It is not impossible that the sentence in the proviso, "which shall be adjusted by the Secretary of the Interior," is subject to a point of order; that may be possible. But I apprehend that the remainder of the proviso, "that no more than $22,000 of said sum shall be expended for salaries and wages," is not subject to a point of order; and that is what I care about more than the other.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is inclined to think, from his knowledge of existing law, to which his attention has been called, as one of the trustees of this institution, that the salaries and wages of this institution are now adjusted by the board of managers.

Mr. HISCOCK. Very well; then I will ask for a division of the question in regard to the proviso.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is of the opinion that the proviso may be divided into two distinct propositions. The Chair will therefore rule that the last clause of the proviso, "which shall be adjusted by the Secretary of the Interior," is a change of existing law and is subject to the point of order.

Mr. HISCOCK. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RANDALL] I suppose will hardly claim that the other portion of the proviso is subject to a point of order.

Mr. RANDALL. I am acting for another in this matter. I now move to strike out what is left of the proviso, and also move to amend the amount appropriated by this paragraph by increasing it from $47,000 to $55,000. The amount appropriated last year for salaries and wages in this institution was $29,000. There are very few men in this country who are qualified for this service of educating the deaf and dumb. The consequence is that they command perhaps what might be called liberal salaries; but I do not know why the Government should not pay salaries equal to those paid in like institutions throughout the country.

During my service on the Committee on Appropriations I think I struck pretty thoroughly at all appropriations and expenditures which I deemed to be too large. But I think I never did strike either at science or at charity. This is one of the institutions of this District which I would like to see maintained in efficiency and with thorough means of educating the deaf and dumb. I would like to attract to its professorships the first intellect of the country, such as I think this institution now has. I do not think it wise for us to cut down the salaries of these professors. That is the reason I have offered this amendment.

Mr. SPRINGER. I move to strike out the last word. The pending bill, as reported by the Committee on Appropriations, proposes to reduce the pay of the teachers of the Deaf and Dumb Asylum about $8,000 below what it was the last fiscal year. I believe this is the first instance which we have had brought to our attention, since this Congress assembled, of a disposition on the part of the Republican majority to retrench expenditures.

I should have been delighted if the Committee on Appropriations had inaugurated the great work of retrenchment and reform earlier in the session; if it had given advertisement to the Committee on Commerce, for instance, which has increased the appropriation for rivers and harbors about $10,000,000. If it had begun upon some other department of the Government to retrench expenditures I should have been delighted. But after this session has gone on for months; after we have piled Pelion on Ossa until our appropriations will exceed those made by any other Congress, it is very remarkable that these gentlemen should now have selected the unfortunate persons in the Deaf and Dumb Asylum as the objects of their efforts at retrenchment and reform.

Perhaps they imagine that these poor deaf and dumb people cannot hear this debate; that they will never know what has taken place in this House; that they can deprive their teachers of their proper pay and then go before their constituents and tell them how much they have done in the interest of economy, and these poor deaf and dumb people will never know the difference. But the country will look with alarm upon the efforts of the Republican party to retrench expenditures by beginning with this institution in Washington for the unfortunate deaf and dumb. I wish they had begun with the Indian Bureau——

Mr. KASSON. I beg the gentleman not to mix politics with this question. I speak as a trustee of the institution.

Mr. SPRINGER. I speak as a representative of the people.

Mr. KASSON. We do not want politics connected with the deaf and dumb institution.

Mr. SPRINGER. I am trying to get politics out of it. The Republican party is endeavoring here to make a reputation for economy by cutting down the pay of teachers in the Deaf and Dumb Asylum, and I am opposed to it. They have issued their circulars to assess Government employés all over the country; I do not know whether these people at the Deaf and Dumb Asylum have been assessed for their share; but whether they have been or not, I want to warn gentlemen that this is the wrong place to begin the work of retrenchment. Begin it if you choose on the Indian Bureau; begin it on rivers and harbors; begin it on the Executive Departments of the Government, where you have your friends by thousands and hundreds of thousands; but do not begin it on these teachers of the deaf and dumb. I hope the amendment of the gentleman from Pennsylvania will be adopted, and that gentlemen on the other side of the chamber will find some other place than this institution upon which to begin retrenchment.

Mr. KASSON, (Mr. WILLIAMS, of Wisconsin, in the chair.) In the absence of my colleague, [Mr. TUCKER,] appointed by the Speaker as one of the trustees of this institution for the deaf and dumb, will the Committee of the Whole pardon me for leaving the chair to say one word on this subject? I want to thank the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RANDALL] for representing my colleague in asking simply a restoration of the amount which has heretofore been appropriated for the support of this institution.

I wish to speak in all moderation to my associates on this floor; but I cannot speak without some feeling. Recently I have been present at the examinations in this institution; recently I have seen the work done by these patient, plodding, persevering men who devote their lives to this specialty of recovering the human mind and restoring human nature to intelligence and usefulness in life. No man can witness their efforts, taking the child from a condition of bestiality, so far as the intellect is concerned, and by the most extraordinary perseverance and patience bringing him not only to a condition of ordinary intelligence but carrying him on until he is fitted for the ordinary employments of life and for the gratification of all the demands of humanity—I say no man can witness such efforts as these without having his heart stirred and his mind moved in support of an enterprise so charitable and so much in the line of the Almighty's wishes touching His creatures.

I say, Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the House, that men who do this, men who without the rewards accorded to instructors in the ordinary cultivation of the intellect, are obliged from morning until night to labor with persistent effort and by the slowest processes possible to the human mind to reclaim these creatures are entitled to your respect and mine. They are not men whose pay, moderate as it is, is to be reduced. If they were receiving greater pay than that allowed at the Military or Naval Academy there might be some reason for a reduction, though I should even then doubt its propriety, for their work is much more painful and trying. But these teachers at the Deaf and Dumb Asylum receive even lower pay than that allowed at the institutions I have named.

I beg gentlemen to consider this question seriously, and if possible to acquaint themselves with this institution—to observe the work that is going on there. If you have sins to be forgiven, I beg you for God's sake to take care of His creatures who cannot take care of themselves. Support these men in their labors, and give them a reasonable reward for their services, as you hope to be rewarded in the world to come. When these instructors are by their patient toil sending out men who would otherwise be stupid and useless, to take places of intelligence and responsibility, I implore this House, for Heaven's sake, to cherish the interests of such an institution and to treat it with fairness and justice. I hope the pending proposition of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, which is simply to keep the compensation of these instructors where it is, continuing what the gentleman's party did when he was in the Chair, may be adopted. [Applause.]

Mr. BLACKBURN addressed the Chair.

The CHAIRMAN. Debate on the pro forma amendment is exhausted.

Mr. SPRINGER. I withdraw the pro forma amendment.

Mr. BLACKBURN. I renew it. Mr. Chairman, I think it is susceptible of demonstration to this House that the Committee on Appropriations has acted wisely in the reduction it has recommended in this matter of salaries. I undertake to say, with the figures before me, that there is no educational institution on this continent or on the earth that is provided with a corps of professors and tutors drawing so large salaries and doing so little work.

I am not ignorant of the fact that the institution appears upon the floor of this House with exceptional advantages. It has its advocates here in the persons of its managers, who are members of the House. I do not mean to intimate (for I never deal in intimations) that these gentlemen are improperly influenced; but I do mean to say, and I think the sentiment of this House and the country will support me in the assertion, that it is very unfortunate when any institution supported by appropriations out of the Federal Treasury has on this floor from year to year, covering a period of a quarter of a century, its advocates and representatives in the persons of its own trustees and managers, serving here as law-makers, as members of the Senate and the House.

The gentleman from Iowa [Mr. KASSON] is one and the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. TUCKER] is another. Now, sir, this institution is nothing but a lazar house. It is open for the admission of pupils from every State in this Union. It is supported, every dollar of it, from the Federal Treasury. It has one hundred and four pupils. It has fourteen professors and teachers, and their salaries range from $7,000 down to $1,500 a year.

Mr. KASSON. Does the gentleman say all of the money is derived from the Treasury?

Mr. BLACKBURN. Yes, sir.

Mr. KASSON. There are students there who pay.

Mr. HISCOCK. How many of them?

Mr. BLACKBURN. I will answer, if the gentleman will permit me. Five, out of one hundred and four. There are five paying pupils. They are charged $300 a year for tuition and board and clothing, and according to the figures which the superintendent of this institution gives to me, it costs this Government $526.36 per capita to maintain them. There are five out of the one hundred and four who pay, with fourteen professors and teachers.

I have said that the salaries of these professors and teachers range from $7,000 to $1,500. I desire to say that the salary of the superintendent of this institution is $4,000. He has his house, which is owned by this Government. This Government has built four residences there. Each of those four professors has a residence. The other professors and tutors are furnished their rooms, and all of them are furnished their board. The superintendent of the institution has his house; he has $4,000 a year in cash, and he has all his supplies for himself, his family, his servants, all furnished to him.

He is under the charge of the Secretary of the Interior nominally; practically he is under nobody's supervision. He expends this $50,000 practically as he pleases, and the return or report he furnishes, which I hold in my hand, shows $500, for instance, in one item as his expenses on a tour in Europe, and $395 for painting his father's or somebody else's portrait.

I undertake to say there is not an educational institution to be found on this continent, or this earth, where there is so large a corps of professors and tutors supported on as large salaries, drawing as heavy perquisites and compensation, and rendering as little service.

It is all very well for the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. KASSON] to appeal to that sense of humanity which I trust belongs in a measure at least to all of us alike, but the question is whether the Government of the United States means to establish and maintain and hold, beyond the realm and boundary of common prudence in the matter of expenditure, an institution of this sort for the benefit of all the States of the Union. I do not think it wise, I do not think we should do it. You have Government institutions here in the city of Washington to-day presided over by gentlemen as eminent in their professions as this one, and I have not a word to say against him, drawing salaries of $1,800 per annum, while his salary is at the lowest calculation $7,000 a year in the aggregate.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman's time has expired.

Mr. BLACKBURN. I withdraw the pro forma amendment.

Mr. RANDALL. I renew it. I regret I did not know in time from the gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. TUCKER,] for whom I am acting, to enable me to inquire into the details of the expenses of this institution.

There is one fact, however, I think I know, and if I am not correct I hope the gentleman from Kentucky or some other gentleman will correct me, and that is that the late Amos Kendall contributed this property or left it in trust to the United States on condition the United States would maintain such an institution as this upon that ground. The United States having assumed that trust, I think we should execute it.

The foundation of this institution is a very interesting one. Mr. Amos Kendall started the institution under peculiar circumstances. A man came here with some deaf and dumb pupils, and Mr. Kendall, in the largeness and generosity of his heart, discovered that these deaf and dumb pupils were being exhibited for gain, and at once he began legal proceedings in the District of Columbia to obtain possession of them. Owning that property, now called Kendall Green, he devoted the latter portion of his life to the care of these pupils. Realizing he was near his end, he dedicated that property to the United States in trust for the maintenance of this institution.

Mr. BLACKBURN. Will the gentleman allow me to correct him?

Mr. RANDALL. Certainly.

Mr. BLACKBURN. I think he donated about half an acre of land, or may be two acres.

Mr. KASSON. More than that.

Mr. BLACKBURN. Not as much as five.

Mr. RANDALL. In the main, then, I am correct.

Mr. BLACKBURN. Except this, that the Government has bought there some sixty or eighty acres of land in addition to the first bequest. Originally the extent of this property covered a space not greater perhaps than that covered by this Capitol building.

Mr. RANDALL. My only object was to answer that portion of the remarks of the gentleman from Kentucky which would seem to imply that the Government of the United States was not wise in keeping up this institution; and therefore I felt called upon to give the history, so far as I recollect it, of the way the Government came into possession of it. I think it is a trust which the Government has assumed, and that it is humanity to keep it up, and for my part I will never vote to cut down or cripple it in any manner whatever.

Mr. CANNON. I move to strike out the last word. I rise only to make a suggestion in reply to my colleague from Illinois, [Mr. SPRINGER,] the gentleman from Pennsylvania, and the gentleman from Iowa; and I desire to say as a member of this committee that framed the bill that I assented to the report of this bill in this shape, not that I wanted to embarrass any deaf and dumb child or any charity which had their support in view in this District or elsewhere. That was not the object—by no manner of means. I indorse most heartily the gentleman from Iowa's pathetic remarks with reference to these people. There is no man who has more sympathy for them than I have; but it did strike us, when we came to look at these expenditures, that possibly somebody who can both hear and speak, under the guise of supporting the deaf and dumb or of educating them, was receiving greater salaries than they ought to receive.

This, then, is not a war against the deaf and dumb; it is no attempt to prevent the extension of this charity to those people who are so unfortunate; but we want to know if we could not draw a line somewhere, and whether or not there was too much of the money which in the fullness of the heart of the people of this country they devote to such a purpose that does not reach the persons who were intended to be the beneficiaries of it, or whether one dollar out of every two spent reached the deaf and dumb.

Now, having said that much, I have here the expenditures in my hand and I am perfectly willing to put them into the RECORD. This is from the official reports. Last year we appropriated $53,500 for the deaf and dumb; $29,886, or largely over one-half of which, was used in the payment of salaries and wages alone, while $24,000 was used for the deaf and dumb children, less the subsistence of the professors and their families out of the $24,000 in addition to their pay.

Mr. ROBINSON, of Massachusetts. Besides the salaries?

Mr. CANNON. Yes, sir, besides their salaries.

Mr. ROBINSON, of Massachusetts. I desire to ask this question in order to give the colleague of the gentleman, [Mr. SPRINGER,] whom I see in front of him, an opportunity of taking back what he has said.

Mr. SPRINGER. I take nothing back.

Mr. CANNON. Twenty-nine thousand dollars out of $53,000 is appropriated for the salaries; and in addition to that, as I have said, they have their board, house rent, and other expenses of that kind, for themselves and families all free, including servants.

Now, in my opinion the pay is too much, and we had better out of this amount devote a little more to the deaf and dumb, and less to the compensation of these people who are not deaf and dumb. That is just what this committee have tried to do; and therefore we declare in this bill that there shall not be an amount to exceed $22,000 devoted to these salaries; and that is enough. In my opinion we do not decrease the appropriation for the support of the deaf and dumb.

Mr. RANDALL. I only want to suggest that if the salaries are too high the board of managers can, after this debate, change them.

Mr. BLOUNT. I desire to ask the gentleman from Illinois a question: whether the reduction of the amount will reduce the salaries of the professors, or might it not cut off the salaries of some of the minor employés.

Mr. CANNON. By no means; on the contrary, the deaf and dumb children under this bill will get every dollar they got under the law of last year.

Mr. BLOUNT. The gentleman does not answer my question.

Mr. HISCOCK. I understand the question of the gentleman from Georgia. He thinks that this will dispense with some of the minor grade of employés. It will not, for they are employed for the families of the professors, and their services will be necessary.

Mr. KASSON. Mr. Chairman, I ask the indulgence of the committee for a moment more to say a word in response to the gentleman from Kentucky and the gentleman from Illinois. As to this restriction leaving more to be appropriated to the pupils; that position, I may be permitted to say, is simply absurd. They are supported partly and chiefly by the provision made for them by the Government; but also in part by payment where their parents are able to pay for their care. By successive amendments to the act incorporating this institution the United States has given the right and made it their duty to receive patients from different States and Territories, and also the children of soldiers and sailors, in the Army and Navy of the United States. That is their duty under existing acts of Congress.

The whole question, it seems to me, resolves itself into this: will you, by reducing the salaries and wages, cripple the operations of the institution in one of two ways? Will you reduce the just amount of compensation of those who are there? Or, on the other hand, will you reduce the number of people necessary for the education of these pupils?

I ask the attention of my friend from Kentucky. He says that this gentleman, the head of the institution, has been abroad, as it were, for some idle purpose, costing some five hundred dollars, I think, or more. Let me tell the gentleman that the president of the institution was learning in that trip how to teach by action of the muscles of the throat the man made dumb by a mysterious Providence to utter the human voice. The system was first introduced by the Jesuits in Belgium.

Mr. HISCOCK. When did he go abroad?

Mr. KASSON. I only recollect it was during one of the years while I was abroad. I met him while engaged in that work, and he informed me what he was learning. He was also teaching Europe the great progress made by the United States in the education of the deaf and dumb, that the charity of the world might be benefited by that knowledge. There is no institution in the world of the rank of this to-day. It is the only one that gives a liberal education to the deaf and dumb, and it is pointed to throughout the world as of the highest rank.

Mr. SPRINGER. I beg the gentleman's pardon. The institution in Illinois for the deaf and dumb is the largest in the world.

Mr. KASSON. I am speaking, not of the largest institution, but of that which is giving the highest education in the world; its graduates ranking with the pupils that are taught in the general institutions of the country. And not only that, Mr. Chairman——

Mr. BLOUNT. Will the gentleman allow me——

Mr. KASSON. I beg gentlemen will permit me to finish my statement. Now, I say these men deserve as much as your professors at West Point and Annapolis are paid. And it is a constant education by the individual and not by classes of a large number of pupils. Every pupil is taken as it were by the throat to teach him how to pronounce the letters of the alphabet, trial after trial, by the minute and by the hour, until he learns to get the human sound instead of the sound the beast makes, unintelligible to human ears. You need numerous instructors for this purpose. From morning till night the work is going on of putting the human voice where the Providence of the Almighty has omitted to provide it.

And you want to strike down these men! Go among them if you want to know what they are doing, and hear the trials made by these pupils under the patient instruction going on from morning till night, while the pupils are being taught to pronounce the letter A, the letter B, and other letters of the alphabet, and to combine two or three letters into one syllable. You have some response from the ordinary child; you have no intelligent response for months, hardly for years, from these children. Oh! strike them down if you want to; but I will vote every time for reducing my salary and yours before I will vote to take a dollar from men who are devoting themselves to Almighty God and the purposes of charity in this work of reclaiming humanity. [Applause.]

Mr. BLACKBURN. I move to strike out the whole paragraph. I would like the gentleman from Iowa, [Mr. KASSON,] as he has seen fit to explain away the five-hundred-dollar item, to which I alluded, that covered the expenses of the trip made by this superintendent to Europe, to go through the list, if he will, and explain the balance. He is nominally under the control and supervision of the Secretary of the Interior. Practically he is under the control and supervision of nobody, and the $53,000 that you are asked to appropriate here, and which you are in the habit of appropriating, he does with what he pleases. I would like to know if the gentleman from Iowa, as a member of the board of managers, audited his account of $395 for the painting of a portrait of himself or his father out of the funds of the Treasury.

Mr. KASSON. As one of the present trustees along with the gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. TUCKER,] I am aware there is a portrait of the father of the present superintendent hung in the hall as an inspiration to the students as to the proficiency they may attain.

Mr. BLACKBURN. And a costly inspiration to the Government. I wish to know if this House intends to vote $50,000 every year to the support of a purely eleemosynary institution after the fashion of a lazar house, and does not intend to put any limitation or restriction on the expenditure of the money. I say it is a salary which, with all the money commutations, is worth $7,000 a year. I say other public institutions of charity in this city are presided over by men as eminent in their professions as he is in his, with salaries of $1,800. The institution has one hundred and four pupils and fourteen professors and teachers, more than one professor for every ten pupils—a higher proportion than in any educational institution on this continent; and they are paid higher salaries than in any educational institution in this land. I say the Committee on Appropriations simply propose to reduce those salaries to something like what a Senator or a member of the House gets, and it is that the gentleman opposes.

Mr. KASSON. Does the gentleman say that the salaries are higher than those paid at West Point and Annapolis?

Mr. BLACKBURN. I do. I say there is not a Government officer in either Annapolis or West Point Academy whose salary ranges with that of the superintendent of this institution.

Mr. KASSON. Four thousand dollars.

Mr. BLACKBURN. I say $7,000; $4,000 in money, a residence built by the Government of the United States and furnished free, and everything upon his table in the shape of supplies for himself, his family, and his servants.

Mr. KASSON. But the gentleman must not forget that these professors at West Point and Annapolis have quarters and commutation of rations.

Mr. BLACKBURN. I beg the gentleman's pardon; they buy every morsel of food they swallow.

Mr. KASSON. I beg pardon of the gentleman; they have commutation of rations.

Mr. BLACKBURN. I am willing to submit the question to the House for it to determine whether it will support an amendment the object of which is to maintain at present rates, exorbitant and disproportionate, the largest corps of instructors at heavier salaries than any other educational institution on this continent ever saw.

Mr. SPRINGER. I desire to say one word on this matter. It has been said that $500 has been appropriated by the funds given by Congress to support this institution for procuring a portrait——

Mr. BLACKBURN. No; $395.

Mr. SPRINGER. Well, $395 of the funds appropriated by the Government to support this institution has been used to procure a portrait of the father of the present superintendent. Now, I want to state to the committee that the father of the present superintendent of this institution is one of the original founders of the science of sign language, one of the most distinguished teachers of the sign language in the United States or in the world. It was a proper recognition of the distinguished services of the father of the president of this institution that his portrait should be in this national institution.

If you will go to the Interior Department you will find the portrait of every Secretary of the Interior hung on the walls of that Department. If you will go to the War Department you will find the same, and in the President's house you will find the same.

Mr. KASSON. Costing thousands of dollars.

Mr. SPRINGER. Yes.

Mr. McMILLIN. Does my friend from Illinois [Mr. SPRINGER] believe in the inspiration doctrine announced by the gentleman from Iowa, [Mr. KASSON?]

Mr. SPRINGER. I have not used that term at all, though it has been used considerably of late. I state this merely to show that there are precedents in every department of the Government for such expenditures, and the gentleman who has charge of this institution ought not to be criticised for doing that which is done in all the other departments.

Mr. BLOUNT. My friend from Kentucky [Mr. BLACKBURN] has stated that the salaries paid to the officers of this institution range above those of any other institution in the country; and designated among others the institution at West Point and the institution at Annapolis.

I have before me the report of the Committee on Appropriations, in which it is stated that in the case of the president of this institution his salary is $4,000, with board of family; that is very high! In regard to the other professors, I think my friend from Kentucky will find that his statement is incorrect. There are two professors at a salary of $2,400 each, with house; one professor at a salary of $2,000, with board, and three professors at a salary of $1,500 each, with board.

Now, I think my friend from Kentucky will find that the professors at Annapolis and West Point are all paid at a higher rate than any persons connected with this institution, except perhaps the president himself. I think that his salary is rather high, $4,000 a year with board for himself and family. I do not know what the reasons are for making his compensation so high; they may be perfectly proper. But certainly as to the other professors, their compensation does not range so high as the compensation of the professors at West Point or at Annapolis, or at many other institutions of learning in the country.

The figures which I have here stated I have taken from the report of the Committee on Appropriations. I do not myself know enough about this institution to be able to make statements on my own knowledge. But I have read from the report of the committee simply as a matter of information to the House.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment of the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. ROBINSON, of Massachusetts. There ought to be a division on that amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. A division being called for, the question will be first taken upon the first clause of the amendment, which is to strike out "$47,000" and insert in lieu thereof "$55,000."

The question was taken; and upon a division there were—ayes 29, noes 38.

So (no further count being called for) the amendment was not agreed to.

Mr. RANDALL. I move to strike out "$47,000" and insert "$53,500," the same amount that was appropriated for this purpose last year.

Mr. BLACKBURN. I understand that the amendment of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RANDALL] is to put the salaries of these officers——

Mr. RANDALL. No; the entire appropriation for the institution.

Mr. BLACKBURN. I mean that; to put the appropriation, which includes the salaries of these teachers, precisely where it has been heretofore.

Mr. RANDALL. That is it.

Mr. CANNON. I want to say, if it is in order, that the proposed appropriation of $53,500 is for the expenses of this deaf and dumb institution. The proposition to limit the amount to be used for the payment of salaries to $22,000 is another thing. Now, so far as I am concerned, I am willing to vote $50,000, or $75,000, or $100,000 to this institution if necessary, but I want the money to go to the deaf and dumb.

Mr. RANDALL. Whenever the gentleman comes in here and moves to throw safeguards around this appropriation, I will join him.

Mr. BLACKBURN. The Committee on Appropriations endeavored to throw a safeguard around it, by providing that no more than a certain sum should be paid out of it for the salaries of these teachers.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. By whom were they to be adjusted?

Mr. BLACKBURN. By the Secretary of the Interior.

Mr. HISCOCK. There is no necessity for increasing this appropriation if we retain the proviso in the bill.

Mr. KASSON. Yes, there is.

Mr. BLACKBURN. Allow me to suggest that if you increase the appropriation as proposed by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. RANDALL,] without retaining the proviso in this bill, you will not reduce the salaries at all.

Mr. RANDALL. My amendment provides further for striking out the proviso; but a division of the question has been called for, and it is necessary to have a separate vote on each proposition.

Mr. KASSON. The appropriation which it is now proposed shall be made the same that it was last year is for the support of the institution, including salaries, incidental expenses, books, illustrative apparatus, general repairs, and improvements. The question is not simply one of salaries, but the support of the institution.

Mr. HISCOCK. In reducing this appropriation to $47,000 we have taken all the reduction from the aggregate amount paid for salaries during the last year.

The CHAIRMAN. The first question is on the amendment which will be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out "$47,000" and insert "$53,500."

The amendment was not agreed to; there being—ayes 26, noes 46.

The CHAIRMAN. The question now recurs on the proposition to strike out the proviso.

The question being taken, the motion was not agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

For buildings and grounds of the Columbian Institution for the Deaf and Dumb: For the completion of the farm-barn, $2,000; and for the inclosure and improvement of the grounds of the institution, $1,500.

Columbian Hospital for Women and Lying-in Asylum.

Mr. HISCOCK. I move that the committee rise.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. KASSON reported that the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union had, according to order, had under consideration the bill (H. R. No. 6716) making appropriations for sundry civil expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1883, and for other purposes, and had come to no resolution thereon.

ADDITIONAL MEMBER FROM NEBRASKA.

Mr. REED. I ask that some evidence taken in connection with the investigation relative to an additional member from the State of Nebraska be printed for the use of the sub-committee of the Committee on the Judiciary.

The SPEAKER. In the absence of objection that order will be made.

ANNOUNCEMENT OF A PAIR.

Mr. CALKINS. I desire to state, as I appear among those not voting on the roll-call yesterday, that I am paired with my colleague, [Mr. COLERICK,] who has been called home in consequence of sickness in his family.

INDEX OF PRIVATE CLAIMS.

The SPEAKER laid before the House the following letter from the Clerk of the House; which, with the accompanying resolution, was referred to the Committee on Printing:

CLERK'S OFFICE, HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES UNITED STATES,
Washington, D. C., July 8, 1882.

SIR: On the 9th of February, 1881, in the third session of the Forty-sixth Congress, the Clerk of the House was directed "to have completed the digested summary and alphabetical list of the private claims presented to the House of Representatives from the Forty-second to the Forty-sixth Congress, inclusive." That work is approaching completion. I have the honor herewith to submit as a specimen of it the portion under the letter "A," and to request the authority of the House for the printing of it as fast as it may be completed, in order that it may be laid upon the desks of members for use at the beginning of the next session of Congress. The work has been prepared with care, and is undergoing thorough revision, with a view to as great accuracy as can be obtained.

I have the honor to inclose a copy of a resolution, and to ask its adoption by the House.

Very respectfully, yours,

EDWD. MCPHERSON,
Clerk House of Representatives.

Hon. J. WARREN KEIFER,
Speaker House of Representatives.

Resolved, That the Clerk of the House be authorized and directed to supply the Public Printer as rapidly as possible with the copy of the digested summary and alphabetical list of private claims presented to the House of Representatives from the Forty-second to the Forty-sixth Congress, inclusive, in preparation by him, and that the Public Printer proceed to execute it so that it be finished by the meeting of the second session of the Forty-seventh Congress.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted to Mr. LOWE, indefinitely, on account of sickness.

Mr. HISCOCK. I move that the House adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and accordingly (at six o'clock and two minutes p. m.) the House adjourned.

PETITIONS.

The following petitions were laid on the Clerk's desk, under the rule, and referred as follows:

By Mr. CARPENTER: The petition of citizens of Manson, Calhoun County, and of citizens of Webster City, Hamilton County, Iowa, for the passage of the Lowell bill to establish a uniform system of bankruptcy throughout the United States—severally to the Committee on the Judiciary.

By Mr. DUNNELL: The petition of N. Gano Dunn and others, citizens of New York, in reference to concurrent resolution relating to Harlem River improvement—to the Committee on Commerce.

WEDNESDAY, July 12, 1882.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. J. J. BULLOCK, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

CREDENTIALS.

Mr. GEORGE presented the credentials of L. Q. C. LAMAR, chosen by the Legislature of the State of Mississippi a Senator from that State for the term beginning March 4, 1883; which were read and ordered to be filed.

PETITION.

Mr. SEWELL presented a petition of citizens of New Jersey, praying for the passage of an act to prevent the taking of menhaden and other fish with purse-nets and by steam-vessels within two miles of the coast; which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. MORRILL. I am directed by the Committee on Finance to ask that the bill (H. R. No. 5538) to reduce internal-revenue taxation be recommitted to the Committee on Finance.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It will be so ordered, there being no objection. The Chair hears none, and the bill is recommitted.

Mr. MORRILL. I am directed by the same committee to report the bill (H. R. No. 5538) to reduce internal-revenue taxation, with amendments as agreed upon by the committee. I ask to have the bill reprinted in order that the amendments may all appear together; and the original bill is out of print.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be reprinted with the amendments, and placed on the Calendar.

Mr. CAMERON, of Pennsylvania, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, to whom was referred the petition of Alvah W. Hicks, praying compensation for himself and others for services on the Queen of the West, submitted an adverse report thereon, which was ordered to be printed, and the committee were discharged from the further consideration of the petition.

Mr. CAMERON, of Pennsylvania. I am directed by the Committee on Naval Affairs to report adversely an amendment referred to that committee intended to be proposed to the bill (H. R. No. 6616) making appropriations for the naval service for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1883, and for other purposes. The amendment provides—

That all officers of the Navy who have been promoted on the retired list by virtue of an act entitled "An act relating to the promotion of commodores on the retired list of the Navy," approved August 15, 1876, shall receive the retired pay of their present grade from date of last commission.

I ask that the committee be discharged from its further consideration.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The committee will be discharged from the further consideration of the amendment.

Mr. ROLLINS, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 2064) to restore John W. Simmons to his former rank in the United States Navy and place him on the retired list, submitted an adverse report thereon, which was ordered to be printed; and the bill was postponed indefinitely.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin, from the Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 1874) for the relief of Elizabeth Gaskins, submitted an adverse report thereon, which was ordered to be printed; and the bill was postponed indefinitely.

Mr. ANTHONY, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, to which was referred the joint resolution (S. R. No. 55) conferring the rank of surgeon on the retired list of the Navy of the United States on Passed Assistant Surgeon Francis V. Greene for highly meritorious services during the prevalence of the yellow fever on board the United States ship Lancaster in the year 1875, submitted an adverse report thereon, which was ordered to be printed; and the joint resolution was postponed indefinitely.

Mr. SEWELL, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 1935) for the relief of Captain W. M. Wallace, reported it with an amendment, and submitted a report thereon, which was ordered to be printed.

Mr. GEORGE, from the Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 1698) for the relief of Peter Gallagher, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon, which was ordered to be printed.

Mr. CHILCOTT, from the Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 389) for the relief of Austin Jayne and John K. Mathews, submitted an adverse report thereon, which was ordered to be printed; and the bill was postponed indefinitely.

Mr. LOGAN, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the message of the President of the United States transmitting a letter from the Secretary of War, relative to the completion of the new barracks at Fort Leavenworth, Kansas, asked to be discharged from its further consideration, and that it be referred to the Committee on Appropriations; which was agreed to.

THE REVISED STATUTES.

Mr. ANTHONY. I am instructed by the Committee on Printing, to which the matter was referred, to report a joint resolution, and I ask for its present consideration.

The joint resolution (S. R. No. 95) providing for additional copies of the Revised Statutes for the use of the Interior Department, was read the first time by its title and the second time at length, as follows:

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the Secretary of State be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to deliver to the Secretary of the Interior, for the use of the Department of the Interior and its subordinate bureaus and offices, one hundred copies of the second edition of the Revised Statutes of the United States.

By unanimous consent, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the joint resolution.

Mr. ANTHONY. These statutes are printed and are in the custody of the Secretary of State. The Secretary of the Interior has not enough for the use of his Department, but he has all that the law gave to him in the distribution. He desires a hundred additional copies, which requires further legislation. Nothing is to be printed.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

REPORT OF SURGEON-GENERAL OF THE NAVY.

Mr. ANTHONY. A resolution was passed on the 6th instant providing that there shall be printed for the use of the Navy Department 1,000 copies of the report of the Surgeon-General of the Navy. It was made a Senate resolution simply, when it should have been a concurrent resolution. I ask unanimous consent that it be changed to a concurrent resolution.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It will be so ordered, there being no objection.

PRINTING OF UNNECESSARY PAPERS.

Mr. PLUMB submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on Printing be directed to inquire what amendment to the rules of the Senate or other action is necessary to prevent the printing of unnecessary portions of executive communications and other public documents, and report by bill or otherwise.

HOUR OF MEETING.

Mr. ROLLINS. I offer the following resolution:

Resolved, That on and after Thursday, the 13th instant, the hour of meeting of the Senate during the present session shall be eleven o'clock a. m.

Mr. BECK. I object to the consideration of the resolution.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The consideration of the resolution is objected to, and it goes over.

Mr. ROLLINS. Does the Senator from Kentucky object?

Mr. BECK. Yes, sir; I object to it.

Mr. ROLLINS. That is very strange.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. MCPHERSON, its Clerk, announced that the House had concurred in the report of the committee of conference on the bill (S. No. 1095) to provide for the erection of a public building at Poughkeepsie, New York.

RIVER AND HARBOR BILL.

Mr. MCMILLAN. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the river and harbor bill.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 6242) making appropriations for the construction, repair, and preservation of certain works on rivers and harbors, and for other purposes.

Mr. MCMILLAN. I desire to suggest to the Senate before we enter upon the consideration of the bill that by unanimous consent we proceed to dispose of the amendments which shall be reserved for a separate vote in the Senate and to the final passage of the bill under the present rule of five minutes and one speech by each Senator occupying the floor, and that upon the question of the final passage of the bill one hour be appropriated to discussion, reserving the last ten minutes of the hour for any member of the committee who may desire to make any remarks. I have no desire to interfere with discussion upon the bill. The only object in this suggestion is that we may economize time and get at a fair disposition of the matter.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The five-minute rule was applied yesterday to the bill. The Senator from Minnesota now asks that that order be so modified as to give the last hour for debate on the final passage of the bill, reserving ten minutes of the hour for any member of the committee who may wish to speak. Is there objection?

Mr. INGALLS. I was unfortunately out of the Chamber when the Senator from Minnesota was speaking, and before consenting to the arrangement I should be glad to do so advisedly. I regret to trouble the Senator to repeat his suggestion, but as I interposed objection to the consideration of the amendments in gross last evening for reasons that I thought to be satisfactory, I ask him to again state what he desires.

Mr. MCMILLAN. My proposition is that we adhere to the present rule controlling debate until we arrive at the final passage of the bill, and that then the rule be changed so as to allow one hour to be appropriated to the discussion of the bill, the last ten minutes of that hour to be appropriated by any member of the committee who may desire to make any remarks.

Mr. INGALLS. I am not sure that one hour will be sufficient to enable those who desire to present their views on the bill to do so. I last night suggested that separate votes should be taken on the different amendments, because there appeared to be an obvious purpose on the part of the committee and the majority who favored the bill to compel action without debate and practically without making a record. The great sum that is appropriated by the bill, and the nature of the amendments that have been offered to it, appeared to me to render the subject one that was dignified enough and important enough to receive careful consideration. If any arrangement can be reached by which debate shall be free and the gag rule shall not be applied, I shall not insist upon the right which every Senator possesses to demand a separate vote upon each amendment. I should prefer not to agree now to the suggestion made by the Senator from Minnesota; not that I have any desire to protract the debate, or to interpose any unnecessary opposition to the passage of the bill, but because one hour may not be sufficient to enable those who wish to speak on the subject to do so as they may desire. I assure the Senator, however, that there will be no opposition so far as I am concerned, after reasonable debate has been allowed, to the passage of the bill.

Mr. MCMILLAN. Will the Senator suggest any other time? The only object I have is to be assured that we can dispose of the bill to-day.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Unless the Senate determine otherwise, the five-minute rule applies now to the bill throughout.

Mr. INGALLS. If the five-minute rule is to apply now, and that is the decision of the Chair and the determination of the committee, the majority may ascertain before the bill is closed that the resources of obstruction are not wholly exhausted yet.

Mr. RANSOM. I suppose there will be of course no objection whatever to a full discussion of the bill on the part of Senators who desire to discuss it. Nobody will think of cutting off debate in the Senate. The chairman of the committee and all the committee are extremely anxious to have a vote to-day, as the bill has been before the Senate for some time, but of course no one in the Senate has an idea of cutting off debate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair simply wishes to carry out the order of the Senate. The Chair was not in yesterday when the order was made in reference to the five-minute rule, but after what had transpired was read it was very evident that the five-minute rule was intended to be applied by the Senate at that time to the whole bill. Now the Senator from Minnesota suggests that upon the passage of the bill the five-minute rule shall not apply and that one hour be allowed for debate.

Mr. HOAR. I understand that the Senator from Kansas expresses no desire whatever to interpose mere obstruction to the passage of the bill, but on the other hand desires to save the full right of debate as it shall seem desirable to any Senator to exercise it at the time. I understand the proposition of the chairman of the committee is fully in the interest of debate; that the Senate having already limited debate to five minutes upon the bill he proposes now instead of that limitation to substitute an hour's right of debate on the final passage of the bill.

I suggest to my friend from Minnesota that, instead of making that suggestion, he ask the Senate to so far modify the existing order that any Senator shall be permitted to address the Senate at such length as he shall see fit on the passage of the bill, not limiting the debate to one hour. That will enable the Senator from Minnesota to dispose of the mere matters of amendment which require only a few minutes of explanation, leaving the general debate on the merits of the bill without any restriction whatever. I think the judgment of the Senate and the desire of all Senators not to spend any time which they do not deem necessary in stating their views to the public will make the debate reasonably brief. I suggest to my friend to make the modification.

Mr. MCMILLAN. I have not, nor has any member of the committee, suggested a desire to limit debate on this bill. In view of the suggestion of the Senator from Massachusetts, if that is the sense of the Senate, I shall submit that as the proposition, and trust to the good judgment of Senators to enable us to get through with this bill to-day at the farthest, and in a reasonable time after we come to the question of the final passage of the bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is proposed that the order adopted yesterday in relation to the five-minute rule shall not apply upon the passage of the bill, but that it be free and open to debate at that time. Is there any objection?

Mr. INGALLS. I suggest to the Senator from Minnesota that he ask unanimous consent that the consideration of the bill be concluded to-day.

Mr. MCMILLAN. Applying the present rule until we get to the final passage of the bill?

Mr. INGALLS. No, sir.

Mr. MCMILLAN. The only thing I want is to have the amendments disposed of.

Mr. INGALLS. I do not know that there is another amendment to be presented, nor do I know of a Senator who desires to speak ten minutes; but in the interest of fair play and justice and free debate, I ask that the action taken yesterday be rescinded, and that an understanding be reached that final action be had upon the bill to-day.

Mr. FERRY. I suggest to the chairman of the committee who has the bill in charge, as it seems to be the disposition of the Senate to leave the debate open, that an hour shall be fixed at which the vote shall be taken, leaving the debate open. I suggest that at four or five o'clock the final vote be taken upon the bill, and that before that time the debate shall be open. I leave it to the chairman.

Mr. McMILLAN. Then I will submit a proposition that the final vote be taken at five o'clock.

Mr. INGALLS. I know of no reason why it should not be taken at two o'clock.

Mr. McMILLAN. I will accept the proposition of the Senator from Kansas.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is any hour named? The Chair would like to know what is the agreement.

Mr. INGALLS. That the bill be concluded to-day.

Mr. McMILLAN. That the bill be concluded to-day.

Mr. ALLISON. I hope the question will be distinctly put by the Chair as to whether there is unanimous consent that the bill shall be concluded to-day.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is it proposed that the five-minute rule shall be rescinded?

Mr. ANTHONY. That I understand is coupled with the understanding that we shall take a vote at some hour fixed to-day.

Mr. HALE. Let us fix an hour, not later than four o'clock.

Mr. ANTHONY. That we shall vote without further debate at that hour.

Mr. INGALLS. I object to that understanding.

Mr. McMILLAN. Then let it be open. If the Senate wishes to continue the debate, let it be done.

Mr. HALE. I object to rescinding the rule adopted yesterday, unless——

Mr. McMILLAN. Then we will proceed under the rule.

Mr. HOAR. I desire to move an amendment providing for a survey simply for a breakwater. I have the consent of the chairman of the committee and the only other member of the committee I have been able to speak to on the subject. The reason why the amendment was not presented earlier is because I did not receive the petition——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill is in the Senate, and the Senator can offer his amendment after the amendments made as in Committee of the Whole have been acted on.

Mr. HOAR. I have no doubt the amendment will be accepted by unanimous consent. I have a petition in my hand signed by the governor of Maine and 610 persons interested in shipping and mercantile interests; the governor of New Hampshire and 166 others, one of them representing $24,000,000 of capital; and the governor of Massachusetts and a large majority of the senators and representatives of Massachusetts; and also by the governors of Rhode Island and Vermont. It is a provision for a survey for a breakwater at Rockport, Massachusetts, a point where a vast number of fishermen frequently resort for shelter, and also it is very near the line of commerce from Boston and New York to Liverpool.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be reported.

The ACTING SECRETARY. After line 1385, it is proposed to insert:

Sandy Bay, Rockport, Massachusetts, with a view to the construction of a breakwater for a harbor of refuge.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there is unanimous consent this amendment can be received. There being no objection the amendment is agreed to.

Mr. PLATT. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Before the Senator proceeds the Chair would like to know if there is any motion to alter the order of proceeding with reference to the bill?

Mr. McMILLAN. No, sir. I have been unable, after exhausting every proposition I could make, to secure the consent of the Senate to dispose of the bill to-day, and I shall ask the Senate to proceed under the rule as it has been adopted.

Mr. INGALLS. Who has objected to the proposition to conclude debate on the bill to-day?

Mr. McMILLAN. The Senator from Kansas refused to permit an hour to be named, as suggested by several Senators in this vicinity.

Mr. INGALLS. I said distinctly when four o'clock was named that I knew of no reason why debate should not close at two o'clock, and the Senator certainly, I suggest in entire kindness to him and his bill, is making a great mistake in declining to accept the proposition I have made.

Mr. McMILLAN. Does the Senator agree that the vote shall be taken at four o'clock? I understood him to decline to assent to that.

Mr. INGALLS. I agree that the vote shall be taken on the bill to-day, and I say distinctly that I have no speech to make myself, I have no amendment to offer, I have no objection to interpose to final action. I will agree with the Senator to any arrangement by which final action shall be taken on the bill to-day.

Mr. McMILLAN. So far as I am concerned, I shall be willing to accept the proposition of the Senator in its broadest terms; but Senators object to such an arrangement that without fixing an hour for taking the vote it amounts to nothing.

Mr. HALE. It is not the Senator from Minnesota who made the objection; I objected to rescinding yesterday's rule unless an agreement was reached as to the hour when a vote should be taken.

Mr. MORRILL. I do not understand that there will be any objection to unlimited debate up to four o'clock without the five-minute rule, provided that there can be an understanding that the bill and amendments shall then be acted upon without further debate.

Mr. RANSOM. I am satisfied that the chairman of the Committee on Commerce and the Senator from Kansas and the Senate can agree that we shall take the vote at four o'clock upon the bill, unless we are ready to take it before that hour.

Mr. HALE. That is it.

Mr. INGALLS. I have no objection to that.

Mr. MORRILL. I offer for consideration the suggestion that the debate on this bill shall close at four o'clock, and up to that time it shall be unlimited as to the time to be occupied by any Senator.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there unanimous consent to that proposition?

Mr. MORRILL. Unless we should be able to take the vote earlier.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Of course. Is there unanimous consent that debate upon the bill shall cease at four o'clock, and that in the mean time unlimited debate shall be allowed?

Mr. INGALLS and others. Consent.

Mr. HALE and others. No objection.

Mr. CALL. I do not know that I have any objection to that, though I want full latitude for debate on this bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is unlimited debate up to that hour.

Mr. McMILLAN. Yes, sir.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. But at the hour of four o'clock the debate must cease.

Mr. INGALLS. The Senator from Florida may speak, as I understand, from now until four o'clock on the bill or any amendment.

Mr. CALL. The Senator from Florida does not often get that opportunity.

Mr. McMILLAN. Is the arrangement consented to?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. There is no objection. Therefore, it is the order of the Senate that all debate ceases on the bill at four o'clock, that the five-minute rule adopted yesterday is rescinded, and that any Senator is at liberty to speak as long as he pleases.

Mr. PLATT. Mr. President, I think that at the conclusion of this debate and the action on this bill there will be an opportunity to consider pension cases, as favorable an opportunity as we shall have; and I will therefore ask the Senate, when the bill shall have been acted upon this afternoon, if there be time, as I think there will, to consider the pension bills.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator had better consult the Senator from Nebraska, who has charge of the bill which is the unfinished business.

Mr. CAMDEN. Are amendments in order now?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. No, sir; the question is on concurring in the amendments made as in Committee of the Whole. If any Senator wishes a separate vote on any amendment he will specify it.

Mr. JOHNSTON. I desire a separate vote on the amendment on page 35, striking out the proviso.

Mr. MORGAN. I ask for a separate vote on the Chesapeake and Delaware Canal amendment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Are there any other amendments upon which a separate vote is desired?

Mr. INGALLS. I desire a separate vote on the amendment providing for reservoirs at the headwaters of the Mississippi River.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That amendment was not agreed to.

Mr. ALLISON. It will have to be reoffered.

Mr. INGALLS. I was not aware what was the action that had been taken.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It can be offered again in the Senate.

Mr. CAMDEN. I was under the impression that amendments could be offered now; but I understand I shall not be concluded by not offering an amendment now.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendments of the Committee of the Whole are not yet disposed of. After they shall have been acted upon, other amendments will be in order.

Mr. CALL. I offered an amendment which was not adopted the other day. I suppose I can offer it again.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It can be reoffered. The question is on the amendment upon which a separate vote is asked by the Senator from Virginia, [Mr. JOHNSTON,] which will be read.

The ACTING SECRETARY. At the end of line 831, page 35, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, struck out the following proviso:

And provided further, That the States of Minnesota and Wisconsin shall cede to the United States exclusive jurisdiction over the land so to be taken, during the time the same may be used for the purpose herein stated.

Mr. JOHNSTON. The paragraph beginning at line 800 and extending to line 852 is the provision for reservoirs on the headwaters of the Mississippi River.

Mr. ALLISON. Are the other amendments agreed to except those reserved?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. No, sir. The Chair is putting the question first on the reserved amendments.

Mr. ALLISON. The usual mode is to act on the unreserved amendments first.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That is true.

Mr. INGALLS. I suggest that inasmuch as the number of these amendments is very great, and Senators have not had the opportunity of seeing them in print, to enable those who desire to examine further, action be taken upon the amendments that are reserved as they are named.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That is the course being pursued.

Mr. CONGER. After the reservations that have been made, I supposed the other amendments would be concurred in in gross, and those amendments on which a separate vote was asked would be taken up separately.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. They are now being taken up separately.

Mr. CONGER. How as to the others?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is usual to take a vote on the amendments in gross on which no separate vote is required, but the Senator from Kansas suggests that that order be not adopted.

Mr. ALLISON. I do not think we are making any progress in this way. If the whole bill is open, we may as well take the amendments as they are reported, and either agree or disagree to them.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Virginia [Mr. JOHNSTON] is entitled to the floor on the amendment reserved at his suggestion.

Mr. JOHNSTON. The portion of the bill to which I refer provides for the construction of reservoirs at the headwaters of the Mississippi. The section gives power to the Secretary of War to go into the States where the reservoirs are to be constructed and to seize lands and all sorts of property necessary for the construction of these reservoirs, and if the Secretary of War and the parties cannot agree, the property may be condemned through the United States courts, and when so condemned, or when the parties have agreed with the Secretary of War, the property in the land shall be vested in the United States ipso facto as I understand, without any deed.

A proviso was in the bill as it came from the House to the effect that that clause should not take effect until the States of Minnesota and Wisconsin, in which these reservoirs are to be located, should agree to give their consent to the acquirement of the property by the United States. The committee has struck out that provision.

Mr. McMILLAN. What provision.

Mr. JOHNSTON. This provision, on page 35, provides:

And provided further, That the States of Minnesota and Wisconsin shall cede to the United States exclusive jurisdiction over the land so to be taken, during the time the same may be used for the purpose herein stated.

Mr. McMILLAN. "Exclusive jurisdiction," the Senator will observe.

Mr. JOHNSTON. You do not retain anywhere in the bill a provision that the United States shall obtain the consent of the States to acquire this property. The Constitution provides that the United States shall not obtain real estate for public purposes in any State without the consent of the State in which it is situated. There is no such provision in this bill. It gives the United States the power to go into these States and seize an unlimited, an undefined, an indefinite quantity of land and acquire title to it without asking or obtaining the consent of the States or obtaining any cession of any jurisdiction over these particular lands from the States themselves. To that extent I hold that that clause is unconstitutional, that the United States has no right whatever to seize land or to obtain land in any State by purchase, seizure, or in any other form for purposes of this sort, except by the consent of the State. The proviso, if not exactly in the terms in which it stands, should at least in some terms require that the States concerned shall give their consent and cede jurisdiction. That should be put in the bill; otherwise the provision will be unconstitutional.

Mr. CONGER. May I ask the Senator from Virginia if it would not meet his views to leave the proviso in using the language "concurrent jurisdiction" instead of "exclusive jurisdiction?"

Mr. JOHNSTON. If it is put in that the States of Wisconsin and Minnesota shall give their consent to the purchase, and cede concurrent jurisdiction, that will make it all right.

Mr. CONGER. I think that would be unobjectionable to the States, except that it might require waiting for the action of their Legislatures.

Mr. JOHNSTON. If the Constitution requires us to do it, we ought to do it. We have no right to acquire land in any State without the consent of the State.

Mr. McMILLAN. This proviso was stricken out because it was supposed that the Government of the United States did not desire to have exclusive jurisdiction over these waters. This improvement is in the Mississippi River, a navigable stream of the United States, over which the United States has jurisdiction to make any improvement she desires; but to confer upon the General Government exclusive jurisdiction would oust the jurisdiction of the State for all purposes and that certainly would not be proper.

This improvement is in the Mississippi River, and these lakes are part of it; and on the banks of the stream there is private property perhaps upon which a portion of these dams would be built. The United States gets the title to the lands; and upon the stream, the water certainly being entirely within the jurisdiction of the State of Minnesota, her jurisdiction is not to be ousted and this Government to receive exclusive jurisdiction. That was the object in striking out the proviso.

Mr. JOHNSTON. What I complain of is that the bill provides for taking the title to this property without the consent of the State. The proviso ought to be so changed as to require the consent of the State to the United States obtaining title to real estate and to having concurrent jurisdiction over the property so obtained. If the chairman of the committee will put it in that form it will be all right.

Mr. McMILLAN. The bill already prescribes the mode in which title to this property shall be acquired by the United States.

Mr. JOHNSTON. I know it does; but it does not provide for the consent of the State.

Mr. MILLAN. It prescribes that it may be by purchase or proceedings in accordance with the laws of the State; and if they cannot proceed there in accordance with the laws of the State, then of course they can acquire no title. The fact is the State has already made these provisions; they are contained in the statutes of the State, not only ceding the property and the rights there but authorizing the United States to proceed in the courts for the purpose of enforcing the provisions of the law. It is entirely immaterial to me whether this proviso is retained or not. It was in the public interest, as I supposed, that the committee struck this proviso out of the bill. I am satisfied that it be retained or not, as the Senate chooses.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on concurring in the amendment of the Committee of the Whole striking out the proviso.

Mr. McMILLAN. I will merely state for the information of the Senator from Virginia and the Senate that this portion of the river is entirely within the limits of the State of Minnesota.

Mr. JOHNSTON. If it is in order, let the proviso be put in this language, and it will meet the requirement of the Constitution:

And provided further, That the States of Minnesota and Wisconsin shall give their consent and shall cede concurrent jurisdiction over the lands so to be taken during the time the same may be used for the purpose herein stated.

The ACTING SECRETARY. The amendment is, in line 833, after the word "shall," to insert "give their consent and cede concurrent jurisdiction."

Mr. DAWES. I understand that there is a proposition in the river and harbor bill to improve the navigation of the Mississippi River by means of improvements in the headwaters of that river, which are situated in the State of Minnesota, and the Senator from Virginia proposes that this work of improving commerce between the States shall depend upon the consent of the State of Minnesota. If that be so, then the entire authority to improve the commerce of this country under the Constitution is made a nullity, because it depends solely upon the consent of the State whether it shall be carried out. I suggest to the Senator from Minnesota that if the anxiety to get this appropriation is so great as to carry with it such a nullifying doctrine it will utterly destroy his whole bill.

Mr. JOHNSTON. The Constitution provides that the United States shall not acquire real estate in any State without the consent of the State. This bill provides that Congress may acquire title to property in a State without the consent of the State.

Mr. HOAR. Where does the Constitution provide that?

Mr. JOHNSTON. Look at page 40 of the Manual, section 8 of article 1 of the Constitution, and you will find this provision:

The Congress shall have power * * * to exercise exclusive legislation in all cases whatsoever over such District (not exceeding ten miles square) as may, by cession of particular States, and the acceptance of Congress, become the seat of the Government of the United States, and to exercise like authority over all places purchased by the consent of the Legislature of the State in which the same shall be, for the erection of forts, magazines, arsenals, dock-yards, and other needful buildings.

Mr. DAWES. Shall exercise what?

Mr. JOHNSTON. "Authority."

Mr. DAWES. "Exclusive legislation." I understand the amendment to be that this work shall not proceed in Minnesota for the benefit of the commerce of the Mississippi River through its whole length without the consent of the State of Minnesota. That I understand to be the purport of the amendment.

Mr. SAULSBURY. Does the Senator from Massachusetts hold that the Government of the United States can acquire title to property within the limits of a State without the consent of the State?

Mr. DAWES. I understand it can.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I understand the Constitution to say virtually that the consent of the State is necessary. The power granted is:

To exercise exclusive legislation in all cases whatsoever over such District (not exceeding ten miles square) as may, by cession of particular States, and the acceptance of Congress, become the seat of the Government of the United States, and to exercise like authority over all places purchased by the consent of the Legislature of the State in which the same shall be, for the erection of forts, magazines, arsenals, dock-yards—

Which has as much to do with commerce as anything else—and other needful buildings.

Mr. DAWES. The Constitution says in so many words just read by the Senator from Delaware that the United States shall "exercise like authority." What is "like authority?" Just that authority which is granted over the District of Columbia. "To exercise exclusive legislation in all cases whatsoever over such District," "and to exercise like authority over all places purchased by the consent of the Legislature," &c. I take it that nobody ever supposed that the United States could exercise exclusive legislative authority in a State without its consent. But I understand the amendment to mean something more than this, that the United States shall not proceed with this work without the consent of the State of Minnesota. If so, the United States cannot proceed with the work below Minnesota without the consent of each State through which the river passes. It is a part of one whole. If we have authority to do this work at the sources of the Mississippi, it is because it contributes to the regulation of and improvement of commerce among the States.

Mr. JOHNSTON. The Senator is very much mistaken in the provision in the river and harbor bill authorizing the United States to acquire property. We have a right to go there and improve rivers and harbors, and we do; but in this particular case, in addition to the improvement, there is a provision for acquiring real estate. It does not apply in any other case in the bill or in any previous bill. The bill is for the improvement of rivers and harbors; but this provision authorizes the acquirement of real estate, land, in indefinite and unlimited quantities in those States, without their consent.

Mr. DAWES. Then I take it that the provision of the Constitution under which we make appropriations for the improvement of the rivers has in it this implied restriction, "provided in the improvement of the rivers and harbors it is not necessary to acquire real estate!" If it is necessary to acquire real estate for the purpose of the improvement of a river or a harbor, it is perfectly apparent to me that the authority to improve the river or the harbor carries along with it all necessary power to enable the Government in the most reasonable way to carry out the purpose of making the improvement. If it is necessary to have the consent of the State of Minnesota to the acquiring of real estate in Minnesota for this purpose, it is necessary to have the consent of the State of Virginia for the acquiring of a place to erect a court-house in Virginia.

Mr. JOHNSTON. So it is.

Mr. DAWES. The Senate has decided over and over again that that is not necessary; and after full argument it has been decided to the satisfaction of the Senate upon its votes that it was not necessary even to give the United States concurrent jurisdiction. The Senator from Florida [Mr. JONES] on more than one occasion, representing the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, has demonstrated so far to the satisfaction of the Senate that the Senate has followed him by its vote in striking out of bills for the erection of public buildings in States that provision which requires the obtaining of the consent of the State to the exercise of jurisdiction.

Now, the jurisdiction for legislative purposes is one thing; the right to hold real estate or exercise any necessary jurisdiction to carry out a plain and express provision of the Constitution goes along as one of its implied powers as really and as distinctly and as incontrovertibly as the express power itself.

Mr. JOHNSTON. No bill has ever passed, to my knowledge, providing for the erection of a public building in which there was not a proviso that the consent of the State should be obtained.

Mr. DAWES. I regret exceedingly that the Senator from Florida is not at this moment in his seat, for he would rise up and contradict the Senator to the extent of saying that the Senator from Virginia has forgotten what has transpired here. The RECORD is full of it. The matter was considered over and over again in the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, and the Senator from Florida demonstrated it so far to the Senate that the Senate struck out that clause on his motion. I see the Senator from Florida here now, and he will correct me if I am mistaken.

Mr. McMILLAN. I think on the statement of this question it will be discovered that it is a very plain and simple one, and that the amendment of the Committee of the Whole should be concurred in. This bill as it came from the House provided as one of the provisions of this legislation—

> That the States of Minnesota and Wisconsin shall cede to the United States exclusive jurisdiction over the land so to be taken, during the time the same may be used for the purpose herein stated.

That is, where a dam is built private property may not be taken without compensation, and the bill provides for it, and this proviso only ousts the State of jurisdiction. It would leave the citizens of the State without any protection of the municipal law whatever. I think the committee acted properly in striking out the proviso. No criminal offense could be prosecuted or citizens protected on any of these premises with that proviso in.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Virginia [Mr. JOHNSTON] to the amendment made as in Committee of the Whole.

The amendment to the amendment was rejected.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question recurs on concurring in the amendment made as in Committee of the Whole.

The amendment was concurred in.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Ohio [Mr. PENDLETON] wished to make an amendment to the amendment relative to the Hennepin Canal.

Mr. PENDLETON. If the amendment shall be read by the Secretary, I will indicate the amendment I desire.

The ACTING SECRETARY. After line 1074, the Committee of the Whole inserted:

> That the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to survey and locate a canal from a point on the Illinois River at or near the town of Hennepin, by the most practicable and convenient route, to the Mississippi River, &c.

Mr. PENDLETON. I move to amend the amendment by striking out the words "and locate," in line 1075.

Mr. ALLISON. I hope the Senator from Ohio will not insist on that amendment. I think it will be impossible to comply with the remaining provisions of this paragraph without practically locating this canal. There is no way to ascertain the cost unless you ascertain the place where it is to go; and in that sense it is necessary to give it a location, a habitation. As I said to the Senator the other day, that language does not commit anybody; it does not commit the Senate or any Senator with reference to this work in any sense that we are not committed by the whole provision. Unless there is some reason for it, I do not see why this word should be stricken out. I hope the Senator will withdraw the motion.

Mr. PENDLETON. The same reason applies to striking out the word "locate" in this portion of the amendment which applied the other day to striking out several lines providing for the location of the canal where they occurred in a subsequent part of the amendment. I know very well that providing for a survey and location does not commit Congress; but I know also that wherever you commence a work of public improvement that work is sure to be carried out to the end. It is only to guard against that conclusion in this case which is drawn in every other case that I desire to follow up the previous action of the Senate by striking out the words "and locate" in this part of the section.

Mr. ALLISON. This involves among other things the cost of the canal; that is one of the inquiries. How can that inquiry be intelligently reported upon unless this canal has a location?

Mr. PENDLETON. These engineers will go into that field; it is not a very extensive one; it ranges through a country of only sixty-five miles in length. The termini are defined; the general route is defined. It may be that going in one direction the expense will be very heavy by reason of cuts and fills, and in another direction it will be comparatively light. Both surveys will be made; they must be made in order to determine the comparative expense of the two routes, and both will be referred to the War Department and come to Congress. If you provide after that is done that the Secretary of War shall locate the canal, define the route it shall take, give to it "a local habitation and a name," you have done all that you ever do by the commencement of any work of internal improvement. I do not wish the Senate to suppose that I think a subsequent Congress cannot stop the work, cannot change it, cannot repeal the law, cannot do anything that it pleases; there is no estoppel upon Congress, but there is this, which I have said before and repeat again, it is the first step that costs; it is the first step that makes the improvement. It is the first location of the improvement after surveys and expenses are determined that commits Congress to the prosecution of the work; and we shall have Senators from Iowa and the Senators from Illinois hereafter saying that this is the commencement of the improvement, that it is no new thing, that it is not entering upon a new scheme of improvement in that part of the country, but that it is carrying on a work already commenced under the authority of this Government.

Mr. ALLISON. So far as I am concerned, I shall not make any point or suggestion with reference to this work being commenced by virtue of this provision as it stands in the bill.

Now, let me call attention to another thing. It is true in one sense that this canal is to be begun at the town of Hennepin. The reason for that is that that is the point on the Illinois River confessedly most favorable, but there is a range on the Mississippi River of several miles for the location of this canal. If the Senator will take the original text of the proposition he will see that it was to be located at or above a certain point. That gives a range of ten or fifteen miles. Very much will depend on where that location is to be as to what the cost of land damages, if any, will be.

I submit to the Senate that if we want to have this project objected to by Senators chiefly upon the ground of lack of information, first as to its extent, secondly as to its cost, and thirdly as to its location, we had better adopt the amendment of the Senator from Ohio. If we want to have a complete survey, let us have it so that we may know exactly what the work is to be and what the cost of it will be. I shall not stand here committing Senators in any degree beyond the survey of the canal and the location as here provided.

Mr. PENDLETON. It is just because I desire to have a complete survey and to have this whole subject committed by Congress, that they may see what the comparative expense of the several routes is, that I desire that there shall be no location now, but that there shall be an examination of all the routes. It is because I want a complete survey, a complete estimate, because I think the Senate should have it, that I propose to strike out everything that goes beyond a thorough survey of the routes along the line in order that we may determine which is the best route and which is to be preferred.

When this subject was before the Senate the other day in committee by an almost unanimous vote upon this same argument the Senate struck out from line 1098 to 1170, inclusive.

Mr. ALLISON. I did not object to it, because that clause was not necessary.

Mr. PENDLETON. Because it provided for a location of this route; because it provided that the engineers who located the route should file a map, together with the location, in the War Office; and I am only following out that action of the Senate by an almost unanimous vote the other day in striking out here the provision for the location as it was stricken out in the other part of the amendment.

Mr. ALLISON. That was unanimous. There was no objection to that.

Mr. PENDLETON. There were no yeas and nays called. I insist on my motion.

Mr. LOGAN. That was agreed to by a unanimous vote the other day because it was not considered very important; but I should like to ask the Senator when the surveys are made where we shall file the maps?

Mr. PENDLETON. They will go to the place where the engineers file all their maps, naturally.

Mr. LOGAN. The War Department?

Mr. PENDLETON. I suppose it is. There the maps will go and there the surveys will go, and they will be reported in these large volumes to us at the next session. If there is only one route, the survey as to that route will be reported. If there are two, the surveys of the two routes will be reported, so that we can exercise discrimination and judgment in regard to the expense. I do not mean to exercise it with the eye of an engineer, but I mean to exercise it in reference to the expense and the natural obstacles to be overcome.

Mr. LOGAN. The Senator will remember the discussion that was had here the other day on this very subject. The Senator from South Carolina [Mr. BUTLER] proposed an amendment to this bill on the ground that there was no definite information. There had been three surveys of this canal, and the three surveys differed in cost some small amount, and did not state the amount of expense involved in obtaining the right of way, and, second, did not state the amount of necessary expense for running, maintaining, and keeping up the canal after it should be finished. That, I think, will be very difficult to ascertain; but still these were the two objections.

If you do not now allow the engineers to designate a route upon which the least expense will be required for the purpose of making this canal, the very same question will arise when the subject comes before Congress again as to the expense, as to the right of way, as to the cost of maintaining the canal. If the canal runs through a great many deep cuts, the expense of maintaining it will have to be so much on account of those cuts and other things in connection with them; and if it does not the expense would probably be decreased. I have no doubt myself from what knowledge I have of the subject that the surveys have already been made fully; I have but very little doubt that the canal has been located as much as it can be, so far as the route is concerned; that is to say, estimates have been made on a certain route. You cannot make estimates unless you have a route on which to make the estimates. You cannot have a route to make the estimates upon unless you designate it; and if you designate it it is located. You may survey half a dozen lines, but the one that is the cheapest will be selected by the engineer and designated as the route. That is the location. "Location" does not carry with it any expense, does not carry with it any obligation as to the building of the work. It does not carry with it any obligation on Congress, any obligation on the Secretary of War, or on anybody connected with the Government.

The fear of the Senator from Ohio is that the Senators from the States interested—I think the whole country is interested—will come here at the next session and insist that we have got a location, and that is the beginning of the work. I do not so consider it. I do not regard that as the beginning of the work to make a canal, but merely a survey to see whether you will make a canal or not. It is not the beginning of any work that it is necessary to go on and complete.

This very question was settled by the War Department in reference to the Illinois River. In 1832, I think it was, General Johnston made a survey of the Illinois River, this part of it in connection with the rest that will become a part of this water-way. When he made that survey and estimate on the Illinois River he commenced work at a bar on that river, and expended I do not remember how much money, but an amount of money for the purpose of cutting a bar there on the river, so as to make a channel. When the Congress of the United States passed the appropriation bill for rivers and harbors which was vetoed by the President some years ago, the Congress of the United States then passed a resolution declaring that the Secretary of War should have a right to apply so much money as he thought was necessary, within a certain limit, to the completion of the work on rivers and harbors that had already been commenced. The Illinois River was included in that because the work of the Engineer Department, not the survey of the river, but the work had been commenced by dredging and cutting on this bar. It was included then in the general appropriation for rivers and harbors because it was one of the works that had been commenced and not completed.

That shows the construction given to this character of language in reference to work commenced. In the distribution of the money appropriated at that time—in the year 1872 I think it was—the construction was that work had to be commenced, not a survey, but work actually commenced on a river or a harbor, in order to obtain the benefit of the appropriation, and that stands to-day as the construction of the War Department in reference to the disbursement of money on these improvements.

So, then, as far as I am concerned I do not insist that this is the commencement of this work. I do not believe it is. I should not insist on any such thing; but this is merely for the purpose of having a location, a name, so that at the next session when we come to examine this question Congress may know exactly what they are appropriating for. That is the reason for it and nothing else, and I hope the amendment of the Senator from Ohio will not be adopted, and that the Engineer Corps will be permitted to survey and locate, meaning thereby to name the spot on which this canal shall be made, if made at all. That is all there is to it. There is not, either by implication or otherwise, anything committing Congress to appropriate a dollar except for the survey.

Mr. PENDLETON. Mr. President, the word "location" has a very much broader signification than either of the gentlemen seem to attribute to it. Both of them treat it as if it were merely the designation of a general route along which a survey is to be made; both of them seem to think that there can be no survey of a route without the location of the work upon it. Now, sir, that is not the meaning of the word "locate" at all, either in ordinary signification or as it has been used in the various parts of this bill. You may make a survey without a location. The very purposes of surveys are that they shall give you the information on which to make your location. This word is used in a subsequent part of the bill, in which it is said:

> That the Secretary of War shall cause to be made, by skillful engineers of the Army, all necessary examinations and surveys, and from them and surveys already made he shall determine and locate the route of said canal.

That is the point. "Location" means after your surveys are made, after your information is obtained, after estimates from beginning to end on the various routes and plans of survey, even if necessary to the closest particular; that then you shall do this formal thing, which is to locate the work.

I submit to both the gentlemen (for their experience in these matters is much greater than mine) that after a location is made for any public work under the authority of Congress, for a railroad, if you please, in the Western country, it requires an act of Congress to change the location. If you permit the Secretary of War after these examinations are made to locate the route of this canal, you will require legislation to dislocate it, or rather to put it upon another location, to make any change in it. Senators have known in reference to grants of public lands to various roads that after they have located their route they must have legislative authority to change the location. That is the use of the word; that is the significance of the word here in this section to which I am objecting. It is, I repeat, that we may have the fullest possible information given to Congress before a decisive step is taken in fixing the route on which the canal is to be made, that I desire to strike out this important power given by this very word to the Secretary of War.

Mr. VEST. I was under the impression, and I think that is the impression of the Senate, that this matter was disposed of by the vote taken some two or three days ago. The Senator from Illinois says that he was of that impression also, but we have arrived at very different conclusions in regard to the action of the Senate. The proposition then was to put on the river and harbor bill an appropriation for the survey, location, and construction of the Hennepin Canal. The contest in the Senate was in regard to any appropriation at all; and a compromise, as it might be termed, was finally arrived at that a survey should be made and afterward the question be determined whether there should be a location or construction at all. If the action of the Senate did not mean that it meant nothing.

Mr. LOGAN. The Senator will remember that the word "construction" was used in the amendment of the Senator from South Carolina, and that amendment was adopted with the word "construction" in it, and afterward on discussion as to "construction," meaning commencement of the work, I myself offered the word "locate" instead of the word "construct," and it was agreed to by the Senate. That was exactly the language of the amendment. The Senate adopted the amendment of the Senator from South Carolina with the word "construct" in it, and afterward it was stricken out and the word "locate" inserted on an amendment that I moved myself.

Mr. VEST. My recollection in regard to that matter is that the word "construct" was left inadvertently in the amendment of the Senator from South Carolina, and it was discovered and stricken out, and the Senator from Illinois objected. That is my distinct recollection; he objected to striking out the word "construct," although it was manifest that the intention of the Senate was to strike out the words "construct and locate."

Mr. LOGAN. Oh, no. The Senate put the word "locate" in by a vote when the word "construct" was stricken out after the amendment had been adopted with the word "construct" in it; and the Senate will remember that the word "construct" was stricken out after the amendment had been agreed to, and the word "locate" substituted, and afterward the Senator from Ohio offered an amendment and it was decided out of order because the word "locate" had been substituted for the word "construct," which had been stricken out after the amendment had been adopted. That was the proceeding of the Senate.

Mr. VEST. The Senator from Ohio moved to strike out the word "locate," and the point of order was made that the Senate had just adopted the section with that word in it, and it went over in that condition. But obviously, without regard to mere minor details, here is the great issue in the case: the meaning of the action of the Senate was that we did not propose to cut or locate this canal without a survey and without examination afterward; that this was to be a mere preliminary survey.

Why, sir, what is the ordinary meaning of a survey in regard to the construction of a railroad? First, there is a preliminary survey, a half dozen of them frequently, and in almost every instance then the road is located, and when you locate the road that is the first step toward its construction. When a company locates a railroad what does it mean? It means that it proposes to construct the road upon that particular line; and now, if this word is left in the bill, the meaning of it is that we pledge ourselves in advance to locate the canal without reference to the survey; that is to say, we are bound to locate it somewhere, when the very question that the Senate determined the other day was that they did not propose to locate it anywhere until they knew where it was and what would be the cost.

If we did not mean that we meant nothing. The whole object and intent of the discussion and of the action of the Senate was that we should first know what we were doing, first know the cost of the canal, then know where it was to be, which, as a matter of course, forms a part of the cost, and afterward the Congress of the United States was to determine the question whether we should pay so much money for that improvement or not. Therefore the amendment of the Senator from Ohio, in my judgment, has really been passed upon by the Senate, and it ought unquestionably to be adopted.

Mr. CALL. Mr. President, it is a little over two hours until the time the vote is to be taken upon this bill, and there are a number of amendments which I have had no opportunity to offer, small ones, which I wish to offer. I hope the vote will be taken on this question.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Ohio [Mr. PENDLETON] to the amendment made as in Committee of the Whole to strike out the words "and locate" in line 1075.

Mr. MORGAN. The controversy between the Senators as to the meaning of this bill, in the language presented now for consideration, brings up the question that arises on the amendment I proposed to strike out of the bill in relation to the Chesapeake and Delaware Canal. I will therefore occupy the time of the Senate very briefly in presenting views which I think ought to prevail here to prevent the Senate from taking any ground on this question at all, either in the direction of the establishment of the building of the Hennepin Canal or the Chesapeake and Delaware Canal. I would have preferred to have made my remarks entirely on the Chesapeake and Delaware Canal, because that is in a more southern locality and it occupies territory belonging to two States, and therefore presents the question in a rather broader form than the question presented by the Hennepin and Rock Island Canal. Still I cannot get my consent to believe that the Congress of the United States has the power under the Constitution to inaugurate either of these works, and therefore a survey for such a work is just as amenable to the objection as the location of the work or the construction of the work would be.

I took up the New York Herald this morning, and I find some remarks made recently by a former distinguished member of this body at Utica, New York, which I will read, inasmuch as I am entirely in sympathy with his opinions as there expressed. He says to his former constituents and friends:

> We are in a period of peace and great prosperity, but let us never forget that prosperity often tests and tries the wisdom of nations and men more even than adversity. The tendency is to spend largely. The tendency in the Government is to make profuse, perhaps lavish appropriations of the public money. In the affairs of government and in the affairs of business, unless I greatly mistake the lesson, the need and the admonition of the hour is frugality, foresight, and care. We have more need of the brake than of steam in a good many ways just now.

I do not believe that we can calculate with absolute certainty upon the future for as much even as twelve months to come. There is no telling how much the involvements that now appear to be influencing the nations in Europe may affect the markets that patronize our agricultural industries and our manufacturing industries. There is no telling how much the financial condition of the world is to be disturbed by the belligerent operations that have already become terrible facts within the last twenty-four hours. And it seems to me, although we have now a plethora in the Treasury and an income from the various forms of taxation which it is estimated will bring into the Treasury $400,000,000 during the current fiscal year, the time for us to be wise and economical is in the midst of our apparent prosperity.

This bill now under consideration appropriates more than $20,000,000 to the improvement of rivers and harbors, and commits the Government virtually to a future expenditure of not less than $15,000,000 for canals to be dug at the expense of the people of the United States. This vast sum, which may justly be considered enormous for a people owing more than $1,600,000,000, is to some extent, perhaps a great extent, the legitimate result of a bill which rests on false and dangerous principles. It but illustrates the danger of a false principle of action in a government that is under popular control and must be governed by the constraining influence of correct principles, or else by licentious profligacy. It is only surprising that the Senate has been able to cut down the appropriations to $20,000,000 when the engineers demand $75,000,000 to be expended in a single year.

It seems that all questions of public duty in reference to this subject are to be decided by the genius and industry of our engineers in devising new and expensive plans upon which the money of the people can be lavished. We seem to forget the temptation they are under to magnify their office, and to provide themselves with employment which will give them the control of vast public expenditure, and follow wherever they lead in every enterprise that gives any promise of success, no matter how small.

Is the will of Congress the only limitation upon this description of expenditures, or is there a constitutional constraint which fixes a boundary to our zeal, or cupidity, or rivalry, or our selfish love of aggrandizement, or our personal or political aspirations that may be wrapped up in measures like this?

Is this the only matter in which the discretion of Congress is measured merely by its will? More than any other public measure these river and harbor bills tempt legislators from the course of faithful duty they owe to the people of the whole country to advocate expenditures in which their immediate constituencies have a great interest. In the presence of such temptation the only safe course to adopt is to construe our powers strictly, and to deny to ourselves the exercise of any power that is doubtful.

There is scope enough in the powers of Congress, thus construed, to enable us to do all for the commerce among the States and with foreign countries that the general welfare of the country can possibly require. The construction of our constitutional duty which limits our power to expend money for the improvement of rivers and harbors to the navigable waters of the country will enable us to afford to commerce every necessary protection and facility, and will restrain us to certain and definite limits as to the subjects that may receive the benefit of such appropriations.

There is no express power given to Congress by the Constitution to improve rivers and harbors. That is an implied power; and, in my judgment, it is confined to the navigable waters within the States over which they have ceded to the people of the United States a certain right of control. That right of control is limited to the navigation of the rivers and to such acts as Congress may deem expedient to protect the freedom of the navigation, and to remove or prevent obstructions to it. Congress, for instance, can cause a deeper channel to be dredged in the Cooper River, in South Carolina, in aid of its navigation, but with all its powers to regulate commerce it cannot take the phosphates which would thus be removed and sell them to put money in the Treasury.

Congress can deepen the channel of the Potomac, but it cannot authorize the people of New York to take fish in its waters without the consent of the States of which it is the border.

Fish is an article of commerce, and if the power to regulate commerce is coextensive with the will of Congress, why may it not declare the right of free fishery in all the waters that are navigable in the United States?

The Supreme Court in 1876, in McCready vs. Virginia, declared the law on the question of the ownership of the States of the beds and banks of the Potomac River, even of the tide-waters, in a way to close all further debate on that subject.

The only paramount right of the United States is the right of navigation, and this is held by equity or cession, either express or implied, and it extends only to navigable waters.

I will read a brief extract from the opinion of the Supreme Court in the case which I have just cited, on page 394 of 4 Otto's Reports. Mr. Chief-Justice Waite, delivering the opinion of the court, said:

> The precise question to be determined in this case is, whether the State of Virginia can prohibit the citizens of other States from planting oysters in Ware River, a stream in that State where the tide ebbs and flows, when its own citizens have that privilege.
> The principle has long been settled in this court that each State owns the beds of all tide-waters within its jurisdiction, unless they have been granted away. (Pollard's Lessee vs. Hagan, 3 How., 212; Smith vs. Maryland, 18 How., 74; Mumford vs. Wardwell, 6 Wall., 436; Weber vs. Harbor Commissioners, 18 id., 66.) In like manner, the States own the tide-waters themselves and the fish in them so far as they are capable of ownership while running. For this purpose the State represents its people, and the ownership is that of the people in their united sovereignty. (Martin vs. Waddell, 16 Pet., 410.) The title thus held is subject to the paramount right of navigation, the regulation of which, in respect to foreign and interstate commerce, has been granted to the United States.—4 Otto, McCready vs. Virginia, pp. 394–395.

Just here I will ask the question, in the hope that some Senator may be able to answer it, what provision of the Constitution is there to be found upon which this assertion of the Supreme Court is based that the State of Virginia has ever granted to the Congress of the United States or to the Government of the United States the paramount right of navigation? That is not to be found in express terms in the Constitution, but that belongs to the class called great public rights which belonged to the people of Virginia at the time of the adoption of the Constitution, and which tacitly that State and all the other States of the thirteen that comprised the original Union ceded at large to the people of the United States, and as a part perhaps of that other important concession and guarantee in the Constitution of the right of the citizen of one State to enjoy all the rights and immunities of a citizen in all or any of the States.

It will appear further on in my remarks by a citation of the statutes, that the younger States that have been admitted into the Union either from territory comprising a part of the original thirteen States or territory subsequently acquired by purchase, in the acts of their admission did make express concessions to the Government of the United States and the people of the United States of the right of the free navigation of the navigable waters within their borders, and it is stated in these acts that this is done, along with other things, to create a perfect equality between the older and the younger States; so that it may be assumed, and has been well assumed by the Supreme Court of the United States in the words which I have just read, that the paramount right of navigation of the navigable waters is derived by a concession from the States to the United States Government. The opinion proceeds:

> There has been, however, no such grant of power over the fisheries. These remain under the exclusive control of the State, which has consequently the right, in its discretion, to appropriate its tide-waters and their beds to be used by its people as a common for taking and cultivating fish, so far as it may be done without obstructing navigation.—Ibid., p. 395.

It is the right of navigation and no other right that gives to Congress the right to use the beds and banks of rivers for improving navigation.

The "general-welfare" clause in the Constitution, which is sometimes relied upon as a support of the right to make works of internal improvement within the States, is not in any sense a specific grant of power to Congress. It is only one of the declared purposes for the accomplishment of which the specific powers granted may be exercised.

It is a restriction on the powers granted to Congress, if it is any other than a merely declaratory statement of one of the objects to be obtained through the creation of the Federal Government.

This view of the general-welfare clause is indispensable to the rights of the States and the liberties of the people in connection with the powers actually reserved to the States and to the people, which have far more to do with the welfare of the people than any power that Congress can exercise.

We never meant to give up the entire control of the general welfare of the people of the States into the hands of Congress, but we meant to give up the power of Congress to control the Government for the general welfare, that being an incident only of the exercise of the other specific powers granted to the Congress of the United States. The general welfare, as distinguished from the welfare of the people of any particular State or locality, can be promoted by Congress only through the powers granted to Congress either specifically or by necessary implication.

This clause, therefore, has no relation to the improvement of rivers or harbors unless it is to restrict the power of Congress to such improvements as will promote the general welfare of the entire country, rather than that of a certain section.

The power to regulate commerce with foreign countries and the Indian tribes and among the States is also relied upon for the support of bills like this. This power was never intended to include the power to improve the rivers and harbors. That power is derived from another source to which I will presently allude. And it will be seen that when it is traced to that source its definition is clear, its limitations are exact, and its application is not difficult. Is the power to improve the rivers and harbors of the country derived from the power to regulate commerce?

It will be admitted on all hands that the power to regulate commerce resides exclusively in Congress, where it is exercised with reference to commerce with foreign nations, or with the Indian tribes, or among the States. No State or States by any arrangement or treaty can exercise any such power.

The latest adjudication upon that subject is Newport vs. The United States. In that decision of the Supreme Court of the United States, it was held that Congress having granted the right to construct a bridge across the Ohio River, reserving to itself the power to amend, repeal, or modify the act, after the bridge had been constructed had a right to pass a supplemental act, without the consent of either of the two States lying upon the borders of that river, by which that bridge company was required to put in a span or a draw for the more convenient passage of steamers up and down the current of that water-course, and that Congress might impose that duty on that company without any compensation to it for the extraordinary cost which it might incur thereby; that Congress had the complete right to remove an obstruction from navigable waters and that it had the right, as was done in the case of the Wheeling bridge, to grant a partial obstruction and to sanctify it by placing that bridge subject to the governmental uses of the United States, by allowing a post-road to pass across it.

So then the exclusive jurisdiction of Congress to regulate commerce cannot be denied, but that jurisdiction is exclusive only with reference to interstate commerce, commerce with the Indian tribes, and commerce with foreign nations; and the very exclusiveness of the jurisdiction indicates most clearly that it was the intention of the Constitution that this power should not be the foundation upon which should be erected any part of the exercise of its jurisdiction entirely within the limits of a State; for, sir, it cannot be denied that the State of Alabama, subordinate, I will say, to the general laws of the United States, has the right to regulate commerce within that State. It has a right to legislate in regard to dealers; it has a right to tax goods imported; it has a right to do a thousand things which it would have no possible right to do if it undertook to impose its statutes in any wise upon its neighboring State, Georgia.

The power to regulate commerce up to a certain point and under certain restrictions is the power that resides in the State within its own borders, whereas the power to regulate commerce among the States and with foreign tribes and nations is a power that belongs, under the Constitution, exclusively to Congress. Therefore, if the power to improve rivers and harbors is derived from and based upon the power to regulate commerce, it must be neither broader nor narrower than that power; it cannot excel its boundaries; it cannot fall inside of them; it must be coequal with them in all respects, and that very fact would deprive Congress of the power, which I insist does exist, to improve the navigation of a river whose line may be entirely within the borders of a State. I insist that we have the right to vote money from the Treasury of the United States to improve a navigable river that may not connect two States.

It may be five miles long or five hundred; it makes no difference as to the length of it. But that power is derived from our right of navigation of the waters conceded to us by the State itself, and not from the power to regulate commerce among the States or with foreign countries.

The friends of internal improvement make a great mistake when they undertake to base the power of improvement upon a false premise in the Constitution. They can get just as broad a right, or one as broad as the Constitution intended should exist, by taking the ground I take in this matter without the slightest impediment in the world in the nature of a constitutional difficulty. Under the Confederation the States did exercise this power, and in its employment they so clearly demonstrated that the government created by that Constitution was a mere rope of sand, that the yielding up of that power to the new Federal Government was the great impelling cause of its formation.

I will read some extracts from Bancroft's History of the Constitution in support of this statement; and I am proud of the opportunity to say of that work that it is a credit even to its distinguished author and an honor to his country, which he has done so much to honor.

It will be remembered that the State of New York, the State of Massachusetts, the State of Connecticut, the State of Pennsylvania, the State of Virginia, and perhaps other States each had under the Confederation their separate systems of tariff duties upon imports, and their separate systems for the regulation of commerce with foreign nations. That was found to be such a great embarrassment and a cause of so much jealousy between the different States of the Union, that it was made the subject of general discussion throughout all the States, and it led more forcibly the public opinion of that day to concentrate itself upon the establishment of a permanent union than any one discussion that took place; and it may be justly said that the power to suppress the issue of paper money and the power to regulate commerce with foreign countries and among the States and with the Indian tribes were the great propelling questions that caused the people of the United States to come together and form the Constitution. There was an event that occurred here on the banks of the Potomac that illustrates this matter:

> At Mount Vernon, on the 28th of March, 1785, the joint commissioners of the two States divided by the Potomac, George Mason and Alexander Henderson, of Virginia; Daniel of Saint Thomas Jenifer, Thomas Stone, and Samuel Chase, of Maryland, met under the auspices of Washington. As his near neighbor, intimate friend, and old political associate, Mason felt his influence and entered with zeal and a strong sense of duty into the movements that led to union.
> The commissioners prepared the terms of a compact between the two States for the jurisdiction over the waters of the Chesapeake Bay and the rivers that were common to both States; and, conforming to the wishes of Washington, they requested Pennsylvania to grant the free use of the branches of the Ohio within its limits, for establishing the connection between that river and the Potomac.

That was by a canal—

> The primary object of their commission being fulfilled, they took up matters of general policy, and recommended to the two States a uniformity of duties on imports, a uniformity of commercial regulations, and a uniformity of currency. George Mason was charged with the report of their doings to the Legislature of his State.
> When the Assembly of Virginia came together, Congress and the country were rent by the question of investing Congress with an adequate power over trade. The Eastern and Middle States were zealous for the measure; the Southern were divided; Pennsylvania had established duties of its own, with the avowed object of encouraging domestic manufactures; South Carolina was deliberating on the distresses of her commerce. In the Assembly of Virginia, in which there was a great conflict of opinion, Madison spoke for the grant of power as fraught with no danger to the liberties of the States, and as needful in order to conduct the foreign relations, to arrest contention between the States, to prevent enactments of one State to the injury of another, to establish a system intelligible to foreigners trading with the United States, to counteract the evident design of Great Britain to weaken the Confederacy, and to preserve the Federal Constitution, which, like all other institutions, could not remain long after it should cease to be useful. The dissolution of the Union would be the signal for standing armies in the several States, burdensome and perpetual taxes, clashing systems of foreign politics, and an appeal to the sword in every petty squabble. Washington being invited to offer suggestions, answered: "The proposition is self-evident. We are either a united people or we are not so. If the former, let us in all matters of national concern act as a nation which has a national character to support. * * * If the States individually attempt to regulate commerce, an abortion or a many-headed monster would be the issue. If we consider ourselves or wish to be considered by others as a united people, why not adopt the measures which are characteristic of it, and support the honor and dignity of one? If we are afraid to trust one another under qualified powers, there is an end of the Union."—Bancroft's History of the Constitution of the United States, volume 1, pages 249-251.

That was the response of Washington, mind, to the great controversy that was prevailing in the different States as to whether those particular States should yield up the power to regulate commerce to one common head, which they had not done under the constitution of the Confederacy. The result was that after long and anxious debate, and after New Jersey had refused to grant her quota of the taxation which was demanded by the Congress of the Confederation, because New York had levied tariff duties upon foreign goods which she was compelled to consume, and thereby had cut her off from her resources of revenue to be derived from the tariff, and after a long struggle the Union really was formed mainly for the purpose of yielding up to the central Government the power to regulate commerce, not within the States, but between the States, and between the General Government then to be established and foreign countries and the Indian tribes.

In all that long wrangle and discussion which occupied the minds of the greatest men on this continent I think I may safely assume that not one word was ever said and no allusion was ever made to the question of the power of improving the navigable waters within a State. That power was conceded to rest in the Federal Government, based, however, upon the concession which all the States made of the navigability of their water-courses and the right of the Government of the United States in consequence of that cession to go upon them with commerce to be regulated, and go upon them with men-of-war, with armies, with post-routes, with whatever else was necessary for the general welfare of the country.

The Supreme Court of the United States has pronounced its judgment upon this subject in cases from which I will read brief extracts. In Holyoke Company vs. Lyman, 15 Wallace, page 506, Mr. Justice Clifford, delivering the opinion of the court, said:

Rivers, though not navigable even for boats or rafts, and even smaller streams of water, may be and often are regarded as public rights, subject to legislative control, as the means for creating power for operating mills and machinery, or as the sources for furnishing a valuable supply of fish suitable for food and sustenance. Such water-power is everywhere regarded as a public right, and fisheries of the kind, even in waters not navigable, are also so far public rights that the Legislature of the State may ordain and establish regulations to prevent obstructions to the passage of the fish and to promote the usual and uninterrupted enjoyment of the right by the riparian owners.

In Lord vs. Steamship Company, 102 United States Reports, page 543, the court use this language:

Congress has power "to regulate commerce with foreign nations and among the several States, and with the Indian tribes," (Constitution, article 1, section 8,) but it has nothing to do with the purely internal commerce of the States; that is to say, with such commerce as is carried on between different parts of the same State, if its operations are confined exclusively to the jurisdiction and territory of that State, and do not affect other nations or States or the Indian tribes. This has never been disputed since the case of Gibbons vs. Ogden, 9 Wheaton, page 1.

In the County of Mobile vs. Kimball, 102 United States Reports, page 698, the court say:

The uniformity of commercial regulations which the grant to Congress was designed to secure against conflicting State provisions was necessarily intended only for cases where such uniformity is practicable. Where from the nature of the subject or the sphere of its operation the case is local and limited, special regulations adapted to the immediate locality could only have been contemplated. State action upon such subjects can constitute no interference with the commercial power of Congress, for when that acts the State authority is superseded. Inaction of Congress upon these subjects of a local nature or operation, unlike its inaction upon matters affecting all the States and requiring uniformity of regulations, is not to be taken as a declaration that nothing shall be done with respect to them, but is rather to be deemed a declaration that for the time being and until it sees fit to act they may be regulated by State authority.

The improvement of harbors, bays, and navigable rivers within the States falls within this last category of cases. The control of Congress over them is to insure freedom in their navigation, so far as that is essential to the exercise of its commercial power. Such freedom is not encroached upon by the removal of obstructions to their navigability or by other legitimate improvement. The States have as full control over their purely internal commerce as Congress has over commerce among the several States and with foreign nations; and to promote the growth of that internal commerce and insure its safety they have an undoubted right to remove obstructions from their harbors and rivers, deepen their channels, and improve them generally, if they do not impair their free navigation as permitted under the laws of the United States, or defeat any system for the improvement of their navigation provided by the General Government. Legislation of the States for the purposes and within the limits mentioned do not infringe upon the commercial power of Congress; and so we hold that the act of the State of Alabama of February 16, 1867, to provide for the "improvement of the river, bay, and harbor of Mobile," is not invalid.

The case of Veazie vs. Moore was among the first after Gibbons vs. Ogden which presented a cognate question, in which the matter came up as to the power and right of the States over the navigable waters within their domain. It will be seen from this decision that the States and the United States must exercise a concurrent jurisdiction even in respect of navigation over what are called navigable waters, and if they can exercise a concurrent jurisdiction over navigable waters, under the decisions of the Supreme Court that necessarily rules out the power of Congress to improve upon the proposition of regulating commerce, because that is an exclusive power in Congress. There is no partnership in that business. There cannot be under any circumstances. In Veazie vs. Moore the Supreme Court decided the very point in question. Speaking of the decree of the court below, they said:

Upon a comparison of this decree and of the statute upon which it is founded—

That is a statute of the State of Maine—

with the provision of the Constitution already referred to, we are unable to perceive by what rule of interpretation either the statute or the decree can be brought within either of the categories comprised in that provision.

These categories are, first, commerce with foreign nations; secondly, commerce among the several States; thirdly, commerce with the Indian tribes. Taking the term commerce in its broadest acceptation, supposing it to embrace not merely traffic, but the means and vehicles by which it is prosecuted, can it properly be made to include objects and purposes such as those contemplated by the law under review? Commerce with foreign nations must signify commerce which in some sense is necessarily connected with these nations, transactions which either immediately or at some stage of their progress must be extra-territorial. The phrase can never be applied to transactions wholly internal, between citizens of the same community, or to a polity and laws whose ends and purposes and operations are restricted to the territory and soil and jurisdiction of such community. Nor can it be properly concluded that because the products of domestic enterprise in agriculture or manufactures or in the arts may ultimately become the subjects of foreign commerce that the control of the means or the encouragements by which enterprise is fostered and protected is legitimately within the import of the phrase foreign commerce, or fairly implied in any investiture of the power to regulate such commerce. A pretension as far-reaching as this would extend to contracts between citizen and citizen of the same State, would control the pursuits of the planter, the grazier, the manufacturer, the mechanic, the immense operations of the collieries and mines and furnaces of the country; for there is not one of these avocations the results of which may not become the subjects of foreign commerce, and be borne either by turnpikes, canals, or railroads, from point to point within the several States toward an ultimate destination like the one above mentioned. Such a pretension would effectually prevent or paralyze every effort at internal improvement by the several States; for it cannot be supposed that the States would exhaust their capital and their credit in the construction of turnpikes, canals, and railroads, the remuneration desirable from which and all control over which might be immediately wrested from them, because such public works would be facilities for a commerce which, while availing itself of those facilities, was unquestionably internal, although intermediately or ultimately it might become foreign.

The rule here given with respect to the regulation of foreign commerce equally excludes from the regulation of commerce between the States and the Indian tribes the control over turnpikes, canals, or railroads, or the cleaning and deepening of water-courses exclusively within the States, or the management of the transportation upon and by means of such improvements. In truth, the power vested in Congress by article 1, section 8, of the Constitution was not designed to operate upon matters like those embraced in the statute of the State of Maine, and which are essentially local in their nature and extent. The design and object of that power, as evinced in the history of the Constitution, was to establish a perfect equality among the several States as to commercial rights, and to prevent unjust and invidious distinctions which local jealousies or local and partial interests might be disposed to introduce and maintain. These were the views pressed upon the public attention by the advocates for the adoption of the Constitution, and in accordance therewith have been the expositions of this instrument propounded by this court, in decisions quoted by counsel on either side of this cause, though differently applied by them.—Howard's Supreme Court Reports, Veazie et al. vs. Moore, volume 14, page 573.

And then it cites the Federalist and various other authorities which I will not stop now to read. There is a clear judicial exposition by a united Supreme Court in the year 1852, which has been followed by that court in every decision from that day to this and never departed from, showing that the meaning of this part of the Constitution that relates to the regulation of commerce between the States and with the Indian tribes and with foreign countries does not include and has no relation to the subject of the improvement of the navigation of the waters, whether in a State or between States.

Now, Mr. President, with the historical statements of Mr. Bancroft and the judicial expositions made by the Supreme Court it would seem to be sufficiently established that the power of Congress to regulate commerce, in its origin, in the qualifications placed upon it expressly in the text of the Constitution, was not intended to include the power to create canals or other channels of commerce in places where none exist. And that is the point of my argument to-day. I insist that there is no power in Congress to do more than to improve the waters that are navigable within the States, and that they derive that power from the consent of the States themselves, and there is no glimmer of a right in the Constitution to construct works through the country, either canals or railroads, for the facilitation of commerce, by expenditures out of the common Treasury of the United States. If it was intended to confer the power to remove obstructions to commerce in existing channels, which is very doubtful, it is still not the source from which that power is most clearly derived or from which it is safest to derive it, and from the fact that it is vested exclusively in Congress it must lead at times to serious confusion of jurisdiction, and even conflict with the power of the States to improve their own water channels within their own Territory. If the States and the United States have each the same power to improve the water-ways, Congress cannot have the exclusive right to do so. If the only power Congress has to improve the water-ways is derived from the power to regulate commerce among the States, its power must be exclusive, and the States cannot touch the subject any more than they can pass a general bankrupt law or grant to their courts admiralty and maritime jurisdiction on navigable waters within their borders. And so the power of Congress to regulate commerce must be exercised "among the States" and not within a single State, according to the language of the Constitution, and therefore a State cannot exercise that power.

To be a little more specific, in respect to the right to build canals and in respect to the right to build the very canal which is put into this bill, I desire to call attention to the second volume of Bancroft's History of the Constitution of the United States. From extracts which I read a little while ago and some which I omitted to read from Bancroft's History of the Constitution, it will be seen that a project existed between the States of Maryland, Delaware, and Virginia to connect the water-courses of those three States across the country by a canal. Before the adoption of that feature of the Constitution of the United States which prevents the different States from making treaties with each other or entering into any contracts with each other, this power resided in those States, and they had gone a long way toward projecting a system by which the waters of the Delaware River and the Potomac River might be connected through the Chesapeake Bay and across the country. Dr. Franklin, of Pennsylvania, was in the constitutional convention. He was the advocate of internal improvements, and he desired that the power might be placed in the Constitution to build that canal, in which his State was greatly interested. It was also the desire of some of the other States that that power should be put into the Constitution, and thereupon he rose in that convention on the 18th of September, 1787, and moved as follows:

On the same day Franklin, seconded by Wilson, moved to add, after the authority to establish post-offices and post-roads, a power "to provide for cutting canals." "The expense," objected Sherman, "will fall on the United States, and the benefit accrue to the places where the canals are cut." "Canals," replied Wilson, "instead of being an expense to the United States, may be made a source of revenue." Madison, supported by Randolph, suggested an enlargement of the motion into a warrant to grant charters of incorporation which might exceed the legislative provisions of individual States, and yet be required by the interest of the United States; political obstacles to an easy communication between the States being removed, a removal of natural ones ought to follow. The necessity of the power was denied by King. "It is necessary," answered Wilson, "to prevent a State from obstructing the general welfare." "The States," rejoined King, "will be divided into parties to grant charters of incorporation; in Philadelphia and New York to a bank, in other places to mercantile monopolies." Wilson insisted on the importance of facilitating by canals the communication with the western settlements. The motion, even when limited to the case of canals, gained no votes but those of Pennsylvania, Virginia, and Georgia.—Bancroft's History of the Constitution, volume 2, page 211.

The motion was lost. If we have any respect for history in the interpretation of the Constitution of the United States there can be no more perfect demonstration that the very feature was voted down in the convention which honorable Senators upon this floor are now seeking as the foundation of their right to build a canal to connect the waters of the Chesapeake and the Delaware. I may say that I even regret that that vote was had in the convention in the particular case of connecting the waters of the Chesapeake and the Delaware. It occurs to me, without having any special knowledge, but from my general knowledge of the geography and the commerce of that coast, that it would be a great advantage to that locality and a great advantage to the commerce of the country on the Atlantic seaboard to have this communication made. Notwithstanding the value and importance of the proposed water-way across that peninsula through which we can find the opportunity of making this canal, when I come to seek a warrant in the Constitution for it and find that there is no express grant of power, find that there is no implied grant of power, find that there is no navigable water crossing from the Chesapeake to the Delaware which Delaware and Maryland have ceded to the United States, thereby giving the power to improve it and deepen it—when I find nothing of this kind to justify the vote, and then when I find that the proposition was sought to be submitted in the constitutional convention for the purpose of making this very canal, that Benjamin Franklin, of Pennsylvania, offered the amendment in the convention in so many words and it was voted down, I cannot stultify myself after that by saying that that power is in the Constitution.

Mr. GORMAN. Will the Senator from Alabama allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. MORGAN. Certainly.

Mr. GORMAN. I ask the Senator from Alabama whether that special provision in regard to the construction of canals was not voted down because the general provision for the regulation of commerce between the States covered the building of canals as well as other means of transportation? I ask whether it is not a fact that the framers of the Constitution themselves, the gentlemen who were in that convention, afterward voted an appropriation subscribing to the stock of the canal connecting the Chesapeake and Delaware, and other canals throughout the country?

Mr. MORGAN. I cannot better reply to the honorable Senator from Maryland than by recalling his attention to the decisions of the Supreme Court which I have just read, which deny to the Congress of the United States the power either within or between the States to regulate commerce by the construction of canals or roads or railroads. That interpretation must stand for me until at least it is overruled. I have no authority, in my judgment, to overrule it, and it coincides precisely with the view that I would take of that subject if nothing had been written upon it by the Supreme Court.

It makes no difference what efforts may have been made by persons who were members of the convention in regard to bills to build canals, that provision had been voted down. They failed, after an effort, to put that specific power in the Constitution, and they have put in no power which is equivalent to it. No power is in the Constitution to tax the people at large to dig a canal anywhere, unless it may be to enlarge some navigable water-course. I cannot, therefore, fail to yield my judgment as well to the convictions which arise logically upon the proper interpretation of the instrument itself, which are impressed so forcibly by the lessons of history to which I have invited the attention of the Senate. This attempt and its failure should forever put at rest the claim that Congress has a right to construct a canal in any State or between States, especially when Dr. Franklin's amendment was designed to secure the construction of the very canal in question.

I have already discussed the proposition briefly from whence this power was derived. I do not care to amplify my remarks on that point. My purpose was more to place my own views upon record, because I have had the misfortune to vote against the appropriation bills that have come in for this purpose since I have been in the Senate. I have done so because they have transgressed the constitutional jurisdiction of Congress, and I have not as yet got my consent to vote for any bill that I think violates that instrument, no matter of how much advantage it may be to my people.

Senators seem to find it convenient to vote for measures sometimes because their people are largely benefited thereby, or are supposed to be. I have not got my consent to usurp to myself the power to tax money out of the people to be applied by my vote to purposes that the Constitution has conferred upon me no right to deal with. I believe it is the highest duty we owe to the people of this country to-day to restrain the taxing power of Congress within legitimate bounds.

We are gathering during the current fiscal year, we are told, $400,000,000, of which perhaps $150,000,000 will be a surplus fund in the Treasury, thereby laying before the country from year to year an enormous temptation for the swelling up of appropriation bills in the manner that we see this bill has been swollen. We have 50,000,000 people in the United States, and with $400,000,000 of taxation it is a per capita tax of $8 to the human soul. Of these 50,000,000 there are not 10,000,000 laboring-men who are actual producers. The Indians, the women and children, the persons not employed in actual production in the United States must constitute, it seems to me, at least 40,000,000 of our people, and 10,000,000 men are at work (that is about my computation at least) to produce a tax equivalent to $400,000,000 a year. I think the highest duty that we owe to this Government is to reduce the burden of taxation and not merely to devise ways and means by which we can spend the money taxed out of the people.

The people of Alabama are a million and a quarter strong in population. They expend about as much per capita as any other people in the world. If it costs an average per capita of $8 to the people of the United States to raise $400,000,000 in a given tax year, it costs Alabama all of $10,000,000 to supply her quota. She pays for it with her cotton crop, with the little sugar she makes, with a good deal of iron she makes, and with various other articles for export and traffic between other States and herself and with foreign countries; but it costs us at least $10,000,000 a year to pay our quota of the $400,000,000 taxed out of the people through the internal-revenue laws and the customs duties of the United States Government. While we are paying $10,000,000 a year we are reducing our State expenditures inside of $1,000,000, with a view to economy. We actually put the salaries of our judicial officers, our governor, and in fact the whole corps of State officials, at what might be termed starvation rates in order to cut down the State expenditures.

I would very much prefer to take one-half of this $20,000,000 and apply it to the exigencies of the public debt, and thereby relieve the burdens of the people of Alabama to that extent, rather than to have it expended even upon her own water-courses; for you may make the calculation, and after all the figuring you can do you cannot find after you have spent $20,000,000 in this river and harbor bill that the commerce of the United States at large or in particular will be increased to the amount of $10,000,000 thereby. It is a bad investment for commerce. If your object is to increase commerce, to add to commerce, you will find, I think, that you never can work out the sum by which the country will realize $20,000,000 in return for the expenditure of the $20,000,000 involved in this bill.

I say we are in a frantic mood of extravagance on this question. Senators have convinced themselves that it is the popular judgment of the country that large amounts of money shall be expended in works of internal improvement, and if we can only manage to distribute it broadcast throughout the whole land we shall interest so many people in the bill as that it must necessarily be popular. I warn the Senate of the United States of the reactionary effect of this measure. When you jump in a single year and upon a single bill of appropriations from $11,000,000 to twenty-odd million dollars, with an appendix to it also which may cost us in the way of canal building at least $15,000,000 more, making it $35,000,000 in all, you will tax the public faith very strongly, and it will be a wonder if the gentlemen who now invite the Senate of the United States do not live to repent that they did not pay more attention to the use of the taxing power of the Government, and that when fortune and Providence are smiling upon us and throwing the treasure of other countries within our reach, we did not, with a wise forecast, seize the opportunity of extinguishing our public debt to that extent rather than the creation of new means through which future expenditures will come to be demanded of the people.

I feel to-day as if it were laying a predicate for the expenditure of at least $100,000,000 in this bill, for hereafter the measures will come back to Congress, and it will be said: "This work has been started and is incomplete; give us the money to complete it. Why did you ever start us in this direction unless you intended we should consummate the work;" and that plea will have its effect.

I cannot read this bill as meaning anything else to the people of the United States than a committal, as far as the Senate of the United States has power to commit them, to a future expenditure of $100,000,000 of money. I therefore cannot give it my support, and particularly I cannot give my support to this new adventure, this new work, this new departure, the building of canals at the expense of the public Treasury of the United States.

Mr. PUGH. Mr. President, I desire to make a five-minute statement of the reasons that induce me to vote for the bill before the Senate. The title of the bill should satisfy any one that it is impossible for Congress to pass a law for the improvement of rivers and harbors that will give universal satisfaction. Our rivers and harbors cover a country greater in extent than the whole of Europe; a country that is subdivided into States represented in the Senate, and into districts represented in the House; all these representatives anxious to secure as large an appropriation as they can to satisfy their constituents. The insurmountable difficulty is that in framing a bill of this character we never get out of sight of the smoke of our own chimneys, as that shows which way the wind blows at home. Such a bill as that before the Senate and all river and harbor bills are necessarily the result of concession and compromise.

Mr. President, the power of Congress to make appropriations to improve the navigation of our rivers and harbors is too firmly established by authority and practice to be resisted or questioned. The power is expressly delegated to Congress to regulate commerce with foreign nations and among the several States, and it is the same in degree over foreign and interstate commerce. Whether any particular appropriation is within the power of Congress to make depends upon the existence of the fact to be ascertained by Congress whether the proposed appropriation will aid, promote, or regulate commerce. The power to "regulate" has been settled to embrace the power to aid and promote commerce. Every river and harbor in the United States standing by itself is merely local, but when connected with other rivers and harbors by the numerous ways and means of trade and commerce they all become parts of a great national American system of transportation.

There is no power or agency that has more to do with creating and regulating the price of labor and the price of the productions of labor and capital than transportation. It is a large element in the price of almost everything. Transportation is furnished by railways and water-ways. One is made by nature for the use and improvement of man, the other is wholly constructed by capital and enterprise.

In water-ways nature has given the South the advantage. In railways capital and enterprise, fostered by the Federal Government, have given the North the advantage. Mr. Conkling, in his great campaign speech in New York in 1880, that changed the fate of the Republican party in the last Presidential election, boasted that the superior capital and enterprise of the North had overcome the advantages of nature's gifts to the South by running railways across the continent East and West, from the Atlantic to the Pacific Ocean. The bill before the Senate inaugurates a general system of river and harbor improvement that promises in the near future to restore some of the lost power of the South, and to furnish to the whole country waterways, that experience has demonstrated to be the only reliable and permanent controlling power over the extortions and oppressions of railroad corporations. That great and wise Democratic statesman, Horatio Seymour, is reported as having lately expressed the opinion that free canals and free rivers are worth more than all the railroad commissions we can organize to prevent and regulate the abuses of railroad monopoly in transportation.

If Congress can furnish a permanent remedy against the evils of railroad monopoly in transportation, it will be worth more each year in the future than five times the amount appropriated by this bill.

Mr. President, the South has sacrificed everything on the altar of her convictions, and she has nothing left but her honor, her manhood, her history, and her boundless natural resources. She has been standing alone wringing her hands and weeping over the profligate waste of the public money and the usurpation of power by the Republican party in making the North rich, powerful, and prosperous; and while we have been crying the North has been laughing at our abstractions and thanking us for our unselfishness in asking nothing for ourselves. But the South has waked up to the realities of the situation, and hereafter she intends to accept unavoidable results and to conform her action to existing conditions and circumstances and to submit her destiny to the genius and aspirations of Young America.

The South was taunted in the able speech of the Senator from Michigan [Mr. CONGER] on this bill on account of her old boast that she was independent of all aid from the Federal Government and spurned river and harbor appropriations. This reminded me of another taunt by another Northern man, since the war, of Judge Rice, of Alabama, on account of another boast of the South that she could whip the North with corn-stalks, and Judge Rice answered that the South would have made good its boast had it not been for the difficulty she could not avoid, that the North refused to fight with corn-stalks.

Mr. President, the time of the Senate is too valuable for me to consume it in a discussion of constitutional questions which have been worn threadbare and have become seedy. This bill received the unanimous support of my colleagues in the House; I have no doubt that it will pass the Senate, and I shall not attempt further to enlighten the Senate on the subject.

Mr. MORGAN. I desire to ask my colleague whether the Hennepin Canal scheme or the Delaware and Chesapeake Canal scheme received the unanimous support of our colleagues in the House?

Mr. PUGH. It did not, because that is an amendment of the Senate; but I have no doubt that the bill as it will pass the Senate will receive the hearty support of every Democratic member from the State of Alabama.

Mr. MORGAN. Then I should like to ask my colleague if he believes the Congress of the United States has a right to build a railroad through Alabama out of appropriations from the Treasury of the United States?

Mr. PUGH. I do not.

Mr. MORGAN. That settles the matter.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin, in the chair.) The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Ohio [Mr. PENDLETON] to the amendment made as in Committee of the Whole, to strike out the words "and locate."

Mr. PENDLETON. I notice that the Senator from Iowa [Mr. ALLISON] and the Senator from Illinois, [Mr. LOGAN], who are opposed to my amendment, are not at this moment in their seats.

Mr. FRYE. They will be here in a minute.

Mr. PENDLETON. I have sent for them. Perhaps it would be better that the Senator from Florida [Mr. CALL] should proceed with his remarks. It is only out of consideration for those Senators that I make the suggestion.

Mr. CALL. I wish to offer some amendments to the bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senate is now voting on the reserved amendments. If the Senator from Florida will withhold his amendments until the amendments made as in Committee of the Whole are disposed of, it will then be in order to offer amendments to the bill.

Mr. CALL. Very well.

Mr. HARRIS. I do not see why we should not proceed to vote on the amendment of the Senator from Ohio.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Ohio.

The question being put, there were on a division—ayes 19, noes 20.

Mr. PENDLETON. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered; and being taken, resulted—yeas 22, nays 28; as follows:

YEAS—22.

Bayard,	Farley,	Morgan,	Vance,
Beck,	Grover,	Morrill,	Vest,

So the amendment to the amendment was rejected.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on concurring in the amendment made as in Committee of the Whole relative to the Hennepin Canal, so called.

The amendment was concurred in.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The next amendment reserved is the one relating to the survey of the Delaware and Chesapeake Canal.

Mr. MORGAN. On that question I will merely ask the sense of the Senate by taking a yea-and-nay vote.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. HARRIS. What is the amendment?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be read.

The ACTING SECRETARY. In line 139, after the word "dollars," it is proposed to insert:

That the sum of $20,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, be, and the same is hereby, appropriated, to be expended under the direction of the Secretary of War, in completing the surveys of a ship-canal to connect the Chesapeake and Delaware Bays; and the Secretary of War is hereby directed to report to Congress which of the various routes surveyed will afford the greatest protection in case of war and the greatest facilities to commerce by cheapening the cost of transportation from the city of Baltimore to the Atlantic Ocean, together with the cost of said improvement and its approaches, and the annual cost of maintaining and operating said canal when constructed.

Mr. GROOME. Mr. President, I simply wish to say, that there may be no misunderstanding on the part of the Senate as to this amendment, that it does not attempt to locate the canal. It does nothing else except to provide for full and perfect surveys, which up to this time we have never had. We have had incomplete surveys, it is true, but we have never had any surveys of the approaches to the different routes for the proposed canal. Hence the Committee on Transportation Routes to the Seaboard has found itself very much embarrassed by the fact that contending interests appeared before it, each claiming that the particular route recommended by it, all things considered, is the best and cheapest. I repeat, the amendment proposes simply that full surveys of the routes and the approaches thereto shall be made, and that the Secretary of War shall state to Congress which of the several routes is the best, in order that the unseemly quarrel, which has been taking place between these rival interests, may no longer continue, and that the committee may be in a situation to consider the question of the construction of the canal on its real merits. I sincerely hope, as this is all that the amendment proposes, that it may be allowed to remain in the bill.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. It will be noticed by the report of Engineer Craighill that he shows there is a very narrow neck of land dividing these two bays. The intention is to have a complete and perfect survey for building a ship-canal without locks at either end, letting the water flow freely between these two great bays on the ocean, the Delaware and Chesapeake. The object is to make a complete survey and give Congress the information, with a view of connecting the Delaware and the Chesapeake. It will be seen that the neck of land is very narrow, and that the tide is about the same on each side. The intention is to let the waters of those two bays flow together, with no obstruction between them.

There have been two or three surveys made, but, as I understand, they are not now believed to be perfect. There are several routes proposed, and it is intended that some particular route shall be recommended. I hardly think there ought to be any opposition whatever to the amendment. It is, of course, a great national work. It is not off in the country somewhere where you would have to build a lock and bring rivers to the canal. The bays are there. As to the commerce of Baltimore, it will be recollected that it is the third city in tonnage in the Union; so that the great flow of grain and everything coming from the West in going to New York and going abroad in any form or manner may get out to sea by a distance nearly two hundred miles less than it has to go now around by the capes. Thus there will be a great saving to commerce and a great saving generally to the country by uniting these two great bays. I hope there will be no opposition to the amendments.

Mr. MORGAN. If I remember aright, it has only been two or three years since the Senate voted down a proposition to survey a canal between the Harlem River and the Hudson River with a view to facilitating commerce across that peninsula, where I suppose there is as great commerce as there ever will be between the Chesapeake and the Delaware. Our views on this subject are improving very rapidly. Congress then pronounced a judgment against its power to do that thing, everybody admitting the necessity of the work. The Senate is now about to pronounce a judicial opinion upon our constitutional powers, and that was my reason for calling for the yeas and nays upon the proposition. The Senate is now about to determine for itself solidly either that it has or has not the power to build a canal.

It will not do for us to undertake to convince the country that we have no power to build a canal if we have power to survey one. We certainly have not the power to survey railway lines through all the States of the Union whenever we may choose to lay out a line; and if we have not that power, in my opinion we have not got the power to survey a canal line, for if we have the power to survey a canal line we just as clearly have the power to survey railway lines. The power to survey which we exercise by voting any of these amendments on the bill yields the power of construction; and hereafter, when the Senators from Florida shall bring forward their proposition to connect the great traffic of the Gulf of Mexico with the traffic of the Atlantic Ocean and of the vast coast from Maine to Florida to the harbor of Saint John's River, Senators ought to feel themselves estopped from denying the authority to Congress to vote that money unless it can be demonstrated that that ship-canal is not going to answer a good purpose.

We assume here that the commerce of the country is to be greatly benefited by the connection of the Chesapeake and Delaware waters through this canal. That may be so or it may not be so. I know that I can easily believe great benefit will result from it, and I hope that great benefit may result from it; but my opinions are against the power of Congress to inaugurate these works upon the ground that they are not works to be performed upon any of the navigable waters of the United States, but they are works to be performed for the connection only of navigable waters; works to be built across the country, and not in conformity with any grant that has been made by any State to the Congress of the United States of the authority to navigate, for we have no authority from Maryland and none from Delaware to navigate across the peninsula any more than we have authority from the State of Illinois to navigate from Lake Michigan, at Chicago, to Rock Island, on the Mississippi River. These concessions have never been made; they were not made in the nature of the streams which were conceded to us by these States, for there are no navigable streams at these places. If we get the right, it is to be got by a grant of legislation hereafter.

That brings up the question I stated the other day, whether a State Legislature can confer power upon Congress. It has always been decided that no State legislation can confer jurisdiction upon this body. That being so, I do not understand where our power is to come from. It makes no difference whether this survey is to cost little or much, whether the work is to be profitable or unprofitable to the general commerce of the United States; that does not answer the question of power.

I desire that the vote the Senate shall take upon this proposition now shall be a vote finally settling for this body at least its power to engage in the building of canals to connect the great navigable water channels of this country.

Mr. GROOME. The Senator from Alabama has quoted as a precedent which ought to bind the Senate to-day the fact that some years since it voted against the survey of a canal. If precedent is to have any weight in this body, I call attention to the fact that in the river and harbor bill of last year the Senate adopted an amendment without any dissent from any source directing a survey of the several routes of the Maryland and Delaware Ship-Canal, which amendment is of very much the same general character as the one which is now in the bill. That amendment, passed by the Senate without dissent, was objected to by the House, and in the committee of conference was abandoned. Therefore, if precedent is to have any weight, and the Senate desires to be consistent, it should retain in this bill the amendment which in substance it put in a year ago, and should give the House another opportunity to act upon it.

The Senator from Alabama makes another point, which is that there is no constitutional authority to build this canal, inasmuch as the States of Maryland and Delaware have never consented in any way to its building by the Government of the United States. I shall not attempt to answer his constitutional argument, because it is founded upon a grave error in fact. The States of Maryland and of Delaware have by their Legislatures chartered a corporation for the express purpose of having that corporation hand over its franchises to the United States Government, whenever that Government is prepared to build this canal. So that the premise upon which the learned Senator from Alabama founds his argument falls to the ground and his argument falls with it. I hope most sincerely that the amendment will not be stricken from the bill.

Mr. BAYARD. Mr. President, the locality of this canal is perhaps of less importance to the people of Delaware than to the people of almost any other State along the great route of communication which it is intended to open up. I live upon the peninsula that is proposed to be intersected by this ship-canal. On either side there are natural water-ways, and the proposed canal is in effect to do no more than remove obstructions at the headwaters of the different estuaries from the Delaware and Chesapeake Bays. A great portion of the work has been accomplished already by nature.

The proposition is to make a ship-canal from the head of one water-way, to flow from one bay to the head of the other water-way on the other bay. This is an outlet for Western commerce. That is all that it is. It is not a local improvement in any sense. The people through whose land this canal will go, be it long or short, have the slightest possible interest in it. It has originated in the demand for ocean commerce and ocean communication by the great wheat and grain lands of the Western country. Still, for many purposes, not simply those of commerce, but for those of warfare, this work may prove of enormous value to the entire country. The commerce of Delaware Bay and of Chesapeake Bay is wonderfully great, both as to international commerce and coastwise trade.

The same view that caused me to vote for the improvement of the navigation of the Mississippi River, to wit, that I believed it to be a great interior water front for all the States east and west from its banks, makes me see that when the facilities for oceanic commerce by means of improving the harbors of the Atlantic coast are made to the States far west it is their water front upon the Atlantic, and it is just as important for them to have facility there as it is to have it in any point of their connection with the world's markets. I hold that every facility to commerce which enables the farmer of the West to bring his grain to the markets of the world is equally important. It is just as important that he should have facility at the point of embarkation upon the ocean as that he should have facility between his granary and the warehouse to which he takes his produce. It matters not where the obstruction occurs, if anywhere it interferes with him. It matters not where the facility takes place, if anywhere he is benefited.

Here is a proposition now to continue a survey for a ship-canal. The board of engineers having this work in charge have made their report to a standing committee of this body, the Committee on Transportation Routes to the Seaboard, recommending that these surveys shall be completed. The effect of the amendment, as far as I understand it, is simply that Congress shall authorize the completion of the survey which is proposed of a possible route for a ship-canal. It is distinctly and clearly in the power of Congress to make this survey, and I am unable to see the want of power in Congress to construct the work after the survey has been made.

Mr. BECK. Mr. President, I hope that Congress will not yield to the suggestion of the Senator from Alabama, [Mr. MORGAN;] and although he desires this to be a test of what Congress proposes to do, I hope the Senate will not be deterred from giving the committee information. The Committee on Transportation Routes to the Seaboard, a standing committee of this body, has had the question of the survey of this canal before it. Bills for that purpose have been referred to them and the question has been elaborately argued. It has been shown, I will not say conclusively, but shown as far as the best information possible can show anything, that the men of the Northwest are quite as much or perhaps more interested than the citizens either of Maryland or of Delaware in the building of this canal if the United States sees fit to enter upon the work.

It was shown before the committee by facts not to be denied (they never can be) that this is a shorter route to Liverpool than from any of the transatlantic ports by twenty-four hours, and that it would reduce the cost of freights nearly one fourth. When a merchant goes to Chicago, Louisville, Cincinnati, or Saint Paul for the purpose of buying the wheat or pork or anything else that those people have, his first calculation is how much will it cost him to get the product to the seaboard, how much will it cost him afterward, what will be the cost of insurance, interest, and everything else; and the man who produces the wheat or pork in the Northwest only gets what remains after all these charges are deducted.

If it were shown to us, as I think it was, that we save by this canal twenty-four hours in time and nearly one-fourth of the cost of transportation to the men of the extreme Northwest, they are far more interested than the men of Delaware or the men who live in the neighborhood.

All we are asking now is for the engineers to give us the information. A regular committee of the Senate lays this matter before Congress after giving two months of investigation to the subject, and says, "We are unable to determine whether the canal ought to be built at all; if so, where; and we ask that our engineers may make a survey." When a committee appointed by the Senate to act upon bills referred by the Senate to that committee desires surveys made to aid it in coming to a proper conclusion, then we are told we are to be committed to all sorts of schemes because we ask information as to the best place for the canal. First, is it practicable? Next, where is it best to locate it? When that information is asked for, not locating anything, not committing the Senate to anything, but telling on the part of the Senate through our own board of engineers whether the thing can be done, and if it can be done where is the best place to locate it, that is called a stretch of power and is to commit the Senate to canal-building.

Mr. MORGAN. Will the Senator allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. BECK. Yes, sir.

Mr. MORGAN. I should like to know of the Senator whether he is prepared to vote for the survey of a canal or railroad or anything else which he believes Congress has not the constitutional power to build?

Mr. BECK. I am not prepared to propose to make a survey to the moon, nor to do any foolish thing, but I am prepared to vote for whatever will give the Senate information to act upon a subject that is legitimately laid before one of its standing committees by order of the Senate, so as to enable that committee, when a thing has so far received the sanction of the Senate as to be received and referred to a committee appointed to look into it, to tell the Senate what are the facts in regard to it, without committing the Senate to anything.

Mr. MORGAN. Then I understand the Senator from Kentucky to argue and to insist that Congress has the right to build a canal.

Mr. BECK. I do not insist upon any such thing.

Mr. MORGAN. Does the Senator deny it?

Mr. BECK. I am not called upon to deny it.

Mr. MORGAN. This vote calls upon you to deny it.

Mr. BECK. I desire the information; and does the Senator from Alabama say that one of the standing committees, charged with the consideration of an important subject, ought to be deprived of the right to have the information upon which it can act? I will pause for a reply to that question.

Mr. MORGAN. I do not think it is any part of our business either to amuse our committees or to instruct them about matters over which they have no jurisdiction. I should like to be able to write a novel or jest-book, for no doubt the Senator would enjoy it, but still I do not think I could do it as a member of Congress voting under the Constitution.

Mr. BECK. Then I hope the Senator from Alabama will speak for the meaning of his own vote and not tell the country that he seeks to commit the Senate by this vote for information to any scheme that he may imagine exists in the brain of anybody.

Mr. MORGAN. That is all I speak for, and the vote will show.

Mr. BECK. That is right. Then with that understanding I hope the vote will be taken.

Mr. JONES, of Florida. Mr. President, I do not think this is a time to raise the question as to the power of Congress to make a survey for a canal, because under the cautious administrations of the past these things have been done. I remember a year or two ago having my attention attracted to a very elaborate survey made in the early history of Alabama for a canal or an improvement by a series of works to connect Mobile Bay with the bay of Pensacola, looking to connecting it still further with the waters of the Mississippi. It was a work carried out in pursuance of the directions of the War Department in a very elaborate way and was full of information upon that subject. That was half a century ago; it may be found now; and while Congress was then filled up with the most cautious statesmen I do not think any objection upon the ground that Congress had no power was raised in respect at least to the making of that survey and the preparation of the charts. Since then the Government has authorized a survey to be made across the peninsula of Florida. A very careful survey has been made by the authorities at the expense of the Government for a canal across my State, and a public document has been sent into the Senate at the present session embodying full information upon the subject. I supported that appropriation at a former session, and by every rule of consistency I shall feel myself obliged to adhere to this proposition.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on concurring in the amendment made as in Committee of the Whole, on which the yeas and nays have been ordered.

The Acting Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. DAWES, (when his name was called.) I am paired with the Senator from Louisiana, [Mr. KELLOGG.]

Mr. GROOME, (when Mr. GORMAN's name was called.) Upon this question my colleague [Mr. GORMAN] is paired with the Senator from Kansas, [Mr. INGALLS.] If both Senators were here, my colleague would vote "yea."

The roll-call having been concluded, the result was announced—yeas 48, nays 5; as follows:

YEAS—48.

Aldrich,	Conger,	Johnston,	Pugh,
Allison,	Davis of Illinois,	Jonas,	Ransom,
Anthony,	Davis of W. Va.,	Jones of Florida,	Rollins,
Bayard,	Ferry,	Lapham,	Sawyer,

Cameron of Pa.,	Hawley,	Miller of N. Y.,	Walker,
Cameron of Wis.,	Hill of Colorado,	Mitchell,	Williams,
Chilcott,	Jackson,	Plumb,	Windom.

NAYS—5.

ABSENT—23.

Brown,	Garland,	Ingalls,	Morrill,

Dawes,	Grover,	Kellogg,	Saulsbury,
Edmunds,	Hale,	Lamar,	Saunders,
Fair,	Hill of Georgia,	McPherson,	Voorhees.
Farley,	Hoar,	Mahone,

So the amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. No other separate vote being desired, the question will be taken upon concurring in gross in the remaining amendments made as in Committee of the Whole, unless some Senator desires a separate vote upon a particular amendment.

The amendments were concurred in.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill is now open to further amendment.

Mr. RANSOM. I have a couple of small amendments which do not affect the amount appropriated, but simply direct the manner in which the appropriations shall be made. The money has been already appropriated, and it is only a direction as to how it shall be applied. After line 535, I move to add:

Five thousand dollars of which shall be applied to the line of inland navigation from Beaufort Harbor to New Berne.

Mr. McMILLAN. That is subject to the point of order which was decided yesterday.

Mr. RANSOM. I hope the Senator will not raise the point of order. It does not affect the amount appropriated. The money has been already appropriated, and it simply directs that it shall be applied on a part of a certain line. I hope the point of order will not be raised. There can be no objection to the amendment.

Mr. McMILLAN. Very well.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. There being no point of order raised, the question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. RANSOM. I move also to insert after line 535:

Five thousand dollars of which shall be applied to the improvement of the line of inland navigation from New Berne to Beaufort Harbor.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CALL. After line 508, I move to add:

Including the mouth of the river, and Dame's Point, and the shoals near Palatka.

So as to make the clause read:

Improving Saint John's River, Florida, including the mouth of the river, and Dame's Point, and the shoals near Palatka, to the head of the river, $150,000.

Mr. McMILLAN. The Senator has made a mistake in his reference to the line, in the first place. In the next place, I think the amendment is subject to the point of order.

Mr. CALL. I submit to the Senator from Minnesota that the amendment does not increase the appropriation.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator has got the wrong line.

Mr. CALL. The line refers to the original bill as it came from the House.

Mr. McMILLAN. What appropriation does the Senator desire to amend?

Mr. CALL. The appropriation for the mouth of Saint John's River. I will state that the amendment only distributes the appropriation along the river in one or two places, which will probably not require, in the discretion of the engineers, (it will be subject to their discretion,) more than two or three thousand dollars. It does not increase the aggregate amount. The appropriation of $150,000 remains the same.

Mr. McMILLAN. I suppose it should come in at the end of line 583.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That is the place where it should be inserted.

Mr. McMILLAN. Now, let the amendment be read.

The ACTING SECRETARY. In line 582, after the word "Florida," it is proposed to insert: "including the mouth of the river and Dame's Point and the shoals near Palatka;" so as to read:

Improving Saint John's River, Florida, including the mouth of the river and Dame's Point and the shoals near Palatka, to the head of the river, $150,000, in such proportions as the Chief of Engineers shall consider best for the interests of commerce.

Mr. McMILLAN. That is distributing it at that point.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Florida.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CALL. After the word "dollars," in line 590, I move to insert:

That $12,000 of this amount shall be expended for the improvement of the river above Geneva to Newton, Alabama, and $2,000 of the balance for the improvement of La Grange Bayou from its mouth up to the town of Freeport, Florida.

Mr. McMILLAN. Those places are not estimated for, and the amendment makes a new appropriation altogether as I understand it. The amendment cannot be in order. I raise the point of order.

Mr. CALL. I made an appeal upon that question the other day, and withdrew it upon the assurance that there would be no objection to it in the Senate. It is estimated for; it is in the report which is here on my table. There is no question of the importance and necessity of the work. It is recommended by the engineers.

Mr. VEST. I hope there will be no objection to the amendment.

Mr. JONES, of Florida. The representatives of the two States have agreed to it.

Mr. VEST. There will be no objection to it.

Mr. McMILLAN. Perhaps the Senators understood when the matter was up before that they had a right to offer this amendment in the Senate.

Mr. CALL. Certainly.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CALL. Now I offer the amendment for Fernandina which I offered yesterday in Committee of the Whole. In line 148 I move to strike out "$50,000" and insert "$100,000;" so as to read:

Improving Cumberland Sound, Georgia and Florida: Continuing improvement, $100,000.

Mr. McMILLAN. I hope the Senate will not increase this bill further. The appropriation for the great river of Florida has been made, and the increase here will do no good to the improvement.

Mr. SEWELL. I desire to say in favor of this amendment that a company with considerable capital was organized last year in Pennsylvania and New Jersey for the purpose of developing a large tract of land, some four million acres, which it purchased in the State of Florida. Fernandina is their port for the exportation of the natural products of that land and there is an absolute necessity to have the harbor improved in order to get away the lumber of that section. Within the past few years the character of water transportation has changed very largely, requiring deeper harbors. Vessels a few years ago carried only several hundred tons, and they are now built to carry from twelve to fifteen hundred tons.

In addition, I will say that the company to which I have referred is expending a large amount of money in Florida, and where people are willing to spend their capital in order to establish trade they ought to receive some encouragement from the Government. I look upon this as a meritorious improvement, and I think the Senate ought to increase the appropriation above the amount recommended by the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. JONES, of Florida. Mr. President, I have but little to add to what I have already said in regard to this matter. Fernandina is the terminus of a system of railroads which runs through nearly the whole of Florida. As I showed to the Senate yesterday, during the last year five hundred and fifty-three vessels, large and small, engaged in foreign and domestic trade entered that port, and not one of those ships belonged to citizens of Florida. The commerce of that port is conducted and carried on by instruments that belong to citizens residing outside of the State. Of the five hundred and fifty-three vessels that entered and cleared at the port of Fernandina last year not one belonged, as I am informed, to citizens of that State; so that the people of the United States, and not the people of Florida, are concerned in this work.

I know it has been intimated that the proportion which Florida has received in this bill is large and excessive. I have tried to ignore that view entirely, and I ignore it now. I say that after a full review of every appropriation which has been made by this Congress for the improvement of rivers and harbors, the percentage to Florida upon the estimates of the engineers, the representatives of this Government, is less than that to any other State. I have a little table here which shows it. Maine has 30 per cent. of the estimates; New Hampshire, 39; Vermont, 31; Massachusetts, 57; Rhode Island, 89; Connecticut, 38; New York, 57; New Jersey, 60; Delaware, 77; Maryland, 50; Virginia, 55; North Carolina, 38; South Carolina, 40; Georgia, 43; Florida, on the Atlantic coast, 20. Florida has a coast embracing nearly one-third of the sea-line of the Union, 4,036 miles, on the Gulf and on the Atlantic.

The estimate of the engineers has been brought to view here as the foundation for the allowances made by the committee; and why? Because the engineer officers represent the United States. They do not represent any State. They take into consideration the interests of the entire people of the Union; not North Carolina or South Carolina or Florida; but they are the representatives of Federal power. What do they say? They say that the interests of the commerce of the United States require $500,000 for Fernandina, and when the committee come to make up the bill they make an exception against this port that is to be found in the case of no other. The committee, entirely ignoring the recommendation of the engineers, gives 10 per cent. upon the amount recommended by the engineers, which stands a solitary exception to every recommendation made.

I have said that the tonnage of this port, according to the same estimate of the engineers, approximates closely to the tonnage of some of the largest ports which are mentioned in these returns. Take, for instance, Wilmington. The appropriations prior to 1870 were $362,539; to the end of the fiscal year 1879, $1,042,390; in 1880, $210,000. For Charleston, South Carolina, there was appropriated prior to 1875, $134,000; for the new project up to 1880, $745,000; in 1881, $175,000, making $1,054,000; the appropriations in the bill of the present session amount to $300,000, making in all $1,354,000. For Savannah, Georgia, there was appropriated to 1875, $561,043.06; for removing wrecks, $193,000; to June 30, 1881, $482,000; making in all $1,236,043.06. Add $200,000 in the bill of the present session and it makes $1,436,043.06. For Fernandina (Cumberland Sound) there was appropriated, in 1880, $30,000; in 1881, $100,000. Add $50,000 in the bill of the present session and it makes $180,000. I do not complain of those appropriations, but I am only showing what has been done for other places which in the judgment of the board in charge of this matter on the part of the General Government are not any more meritorious.

When I speak of those figures I do not speak in any invidious sense against any State, for I ignore the idea of this being a State matter entirely. No man can defend this bill upon the ground that one State is wealthier or more populous than another, against the interests of the people of the whole Union. If in the judgment of the representatives of this Government the port of Fernandina, which has a large foreign and domestic trade, where ships of the entire country go, ought to be improved, and it is to the interest of the country to improve it, what has the local interest of the place to do with it?

Mr. McMILLAN. I must in justice to the Senate and to the committee of the Senate call attention to some of the errors that I think the Senator from Florida has fallen into. The committee have not appropriated the money according to States; they have not made that the basis of their appropriations. They have taken the improvements of a national, public, important character, and have given to them as great a proportion of the estimates as they deemed it prudent to do. In regard to Florida the improvement that they deemed most important was the Saint John's River, passing through that State and being an important stream and a channel of commerce through to the sea. They have appropriated to the streams and improvements in that State, as the bill now stands, $365,000, believing that the Saint John's River should be improved and the improvement completed as soon as possible.

With reference to the improvements and the extent of coast that Florida has, that is certainly no argument for appropriations. Washington Territory has an ocean coast and has Puget's Sound, one of the most important bodies of water on the continent, and yet there are no appropriations for that Territory. There are railroad communications with the sound and with the Columbia River to Portland, and yet there are no appropriations made. What right has Washington Territory to complain of that? We have appropriated to the great improvements in Florida as much as we believed was fair and judicious, reference being had to the other great public improvements of the country. I merely wished to call attention to the fact, so that the Senate may not misunderstand this subject.

Mr. JONES, of Florida. I do not wish to be misunderstood as saying anything about the Saint John's River. That is a great and important stream, and the improvement now going on at the mouth of it is in the interest of the growing commerce of that river. Fernandina is a deep-water harbor, but the tide rises and falls there some six feet. It is the only deep-water harbor on the Atlantic coast of Florida, unless there is one made. The improvement contemplated at the mouth of Saint John's I hope will give ample water to reach up to the city, but there is deep water at Fernandina already, and the improvement contemplated here is to enable vessels to go in there at low tide, which they cannot now do. Surely a port that has five hundred and odd clearances in a year shows a very considerable beginning in the way of commerce. The railroad system is now extending all through the peninsula, and is directly connected with the system going to Fernandina as well as to Jacksonville.

But I predicated the increase of appropriation upon the estimate of the engineer officer, and I thought it remarkable that there should be such a marked distinction made in the allowances for that place, taken in connection with the allowances made for other improvements, because the percentage hardly falls below 33 per cent. in any other case, while in this it is only 10 per cent.

Mr. CALL. Mr. President, I wish to say but one word. The report of the engineers shows an aggregate tonnage this year of 300,642 tons; 50,000,000 feet of lumber; 547 vessels; nearly $300,000 of exports to foreign countries. I will state that no ship from New York, from Boston, from Philadelphia, or Baltimore passes along the coast of Florida in distress that is not compelled to enter the port of Fernandina. It is within three miles of the ocean and is the only harbor where vessels in distress can find easy and safe access upon the coast from New York to Cedar Keys on account of its being in the vicinity of the coast. A few years ago the country was startled by the burning of a great steamer from New York to New Orleans laden with human life. She was burned within the very sight of the harbor of Fernandina. If proper care and expenditure had been made by the Government, she could have found easy access and refuge within that port in that night of storm and fire.

With these facts upon the records of the country, time and again certified by the officers of the Government of every character and capacity, with these improvements recommended by the underwriters, recommended by the merchants of New York and the whole shipping interest, with a foreign export of $300,000 gold value, five hundred and forty-seven vessels from all parts of the world, it is surprising that there should be any kind of hesitation in giving only the one-tenth part of the amount which the Engineer Department certifies to be necessary, and with a fort there too.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Florida.

Mr. CALL. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered and taken.

Mr. MORGAN. I am requested to announce the pair of the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. GARLAND] with the Senator from Vermont, [Mr. EDMUNDS.]

The result was announced—yeas 20, nays 24; as follows:

YEAS—20.

Brown,	Grover,	Jones of Nevada,	Sewell,
Call,	Hampton,	Lapham,	Vance,
Camden,	Jackson,	Mitchell,	Van Wyck,
Davis of Illinois,	Jonas,	Morgan,	Walker,
George,	Jones of Florida,	Saunders,	Windom.

NAYS—24.

Aldrich,	Conger,	Hawley,	Rollins,
Anthony,	Davis of W. Va.,	McDill,	Saulsbury,
Blair,	Dawes,	McMillan,	Sawyer,
Cameron of Wis.,	Farley,	Miller of N. Y.,	Sherman,
Chilcott,	Frye,	Platt,	Slater,
Coke,	Harris,	Ransom,	Vest.

ABSENT—32.

Allison,	Ferry,	Hoar,	Maxey,
Bayard,	Garland,	Ingalls,	Miller of Cal.,
Beck,	Gorman,	Johnston,	Morrill,
Butler,	Groome,	Kellogg,	Pendleton,
Cameron of Pa.,	Hale,	Lamar,	Plumb,
Cockrell,	Harrison,	Logan,	Pugh,
Edmunds,	Hill of Colorado,	McPherson,	Voorhees,
Fair,	Hill of Georgia,	Mahone,	Williams.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. CAMDEN. After "Buchanan," in line 1537, I move to insert:

And furnish an estimate of the cost of removing the obstructions in the Buchanan River, from the town of Buchanan to the Three Forks of said river.

Mr. CONGER. Does that provide for a survey only?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That is all.

Mr. CAMDEN. My amendment provides for a survey. It simply asks for special information in reference to a portion of the river.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from West Virginia.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CALL. I offer the following amendment, to come in on page 25, after line 592:

Improving Carabelle River at its entrance into Dog Island Harbor, $1,000.
Improving Wacissa River, Florida, $1,000.
Continuing improvement of Withlacoochee River, Florida, $1,000.
Improving entrance to Crystal River, Florida, $1,000.
Improving channel between Cedar Keys and Suwanee River, and continuing improvement at Cedar Keys, $1,000.

These appropriations have all been recommended and estimated for by the Bureau of Engineers. They are all ports that contribute to the foreign commerce of this country; they are valuable ports for improvement, and the small sum of money that is required for them, I think, ought readily to be granted.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Florida.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. FARLEY. I desire to offer an amendment, not in reference to increasing any money appropriation. On page 39, line 939, after the word "river," I move to insert "and Mormon Slough;" so as to make the clause read:

Improving San Joaquin River and Mormon Slough, California: Continuing improvement, $40,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MORRILL. I do not know but that it would be well to have a vote upon the amendment which I offered yesterday in Committee of the Whole.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary has the amendment.

Mr. MORRILL. I offer it.

The ACTING SECRETARY. The proposed amendment is to add to the bill:

Provided, That only one-half of the aggregate amount appropriated in this act shall be expended during the year ending June 30, 1883, and the whole or any part of the different items herein mentioned may be expended at the discretion of the President, but not exceeding one-half of the aforesaid aggregate amount.

Mr. MORRILL. I ask for the yeas and nays on this amendment.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. BAYARD. If I understand that amendment as read at the desk, it provides that one-half of any appropriation made by this bill shall be expended upon the respective works. Is that the case?

Mr. MORRILL. The amendment is very plain. I will read it:

Provided, That only one-half of the aggregate amount appropriated in this act shall be expended during the year ending June 30, 1883, and the whole or any part of the different items herein mentioned may be expended at the discretion of the President, but not exceeding one-half of the aforesaid aggregate amount.

Mr. BAYARD. While this bill undoubtedly contains a great deal that is very wise and a great deal that is very unwise, the appropriations have been made on the basis of estimates by the engineers, and the economy of expending a certain sum depends entirely upon whether it can do the work efficiently. In other words, you can begin extravagance by making an insufficient appropriation as much as you can by making a surplus appropriation. You may fritter away a large sum of money by a series of insufficient appropriations.

A great many features of this bill are sensible in this, at least, that the means is apportioned to the end in view; and while I am not particularly friendly to the bill or to this style of legislation at all, I can see that the suggestion of the Senator from Vermont would lead to perhaps very clumsy results.

Mr. MORRILL. I can say that something like this was proposed in 1869. This leaves the method to the discretion of the Executive to use up the funds for any particular item to the full amount; but if the discretion of the President sees fit to say that it shall not be expended to more than half, or much less than half, he will have the right so to do.

Mr. BAYARD. I do not think the amendment ought to be adopted.

The yeas and nays were taken.

Mr. GARLAND. If the Senator from Vermont [Mr. EDMUNDS] were here, I should vote "nay." I do not know how he would vote.

The result was announced—yeas 16, nays 45; as follows:

YEAS—16.

Blair,	Frye,	Lapham,	Plumb,
Cameron of Pa.,	Hale,	Mitchell,	Rollins,
Chilcott,	Hawley,	Morrill,	Saunders,
Davis of Illinois,	Hill of Colorado,	Platt,	Van Wyck.

NAYS—45.

Aldrich,	Conger,	Jonas,	Saulsbury,
Allison,	Davis of W. Va.,	Jones of Florida,	Sawyer,
Anthony,	Dawes,	Jones of Nevada,	Sherman,
Bayard,	Farley,	Lamar,	Slater,
Beck,	Ferry,	McDill,	Vance,
Brown,	George,	McMillan,	Vest,
Butler,	Grover,	Maxey,	Walker,
Call,	Hampton,	Miller of Cal.,	Williams,
Camden,	Harris,	Miller of N. Y.,	Windom.
Cameron of Wis.,	Ingalls,	Pendleton,
Cockrell,	Jackson,	Pugh,
Coke,	Johnston,	Ransom,

ABSENT—15.

Edmunds,	Groome,	Kellogg,	Morgan,
Fair,	Harrison,	Logan,	Sewell,
Garland,	Hill of Georgia,	McPherson,	Voorhees.
Gorman,	Hoar,	Mahone,

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. CALL. I offer the following amendment, to come in at the end of the bill:

For a survey of a ship-canal and for estimates of the cost of the same and the approaches adequate for the largest ships from the Gulf of Mexico to the Atlantic Ocean, at the most practicable point, across the peninsula of Florida.

The amendment was rejected.

The amendments were ordered to be engrossed and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Shall the bill pass?

Mr. HARRIS. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Principal Legislative Clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. CHILCOTT, (when his name was called.) On this question I am paired with the Senator from Louisiana, [Mr. KELLOGG.] If he were here, I should vote "nay."

Mr. GARLAND, (when his name was called.) I am paired with the Senator from Vermont, [Mr. EDMUNDS.] If he were present, I should vote "yea."

Mr. INGALLS, (when Mr. GORMAN's name was called.) I will announce here that the Senator from Maryland [Mr. GORMAN] having left the Chamber this afternoon, I am paired with him.

Mr. MORGAN, (when his name was called.) I am paired on this bill with the Senator from Georgia, [Mr. HILL.] If he were present, I should vote "nay."

Mr. SEWELL, (when his name was called.) I am paired with my colleague, [Mr. MCPHERSON.]

The roll-call having been concluded, the result was announced—yeas 39, nays 23; as follows:

YEAS—39.

Aldrich,	Davis of W. Va.,	Jones of Florida,	Saunders,
Allison,	Dawes,	Jones of Nevada,	Sawyer,
Anthony,	Farley,	Lamar,	Sherman,
Brown,	Ferry,	McDill,	Slater,

Conger,	Jonas,	Ransom,

NAYS—23.

Bayard,	Frye,	Jackson,	Platt,
Beck,	Hale,	Lapham,	Plumb,
Blair,	Harris,	Logan,	Rollins,
Call,	Harrison,	Mitchell,	Saulsbury,
Cameron of Pa.,	Hawley,	Morrill,	Van Wyck.
Davis of Illinois,	Hill of Colorado,	Pendleton,

ABSENT—14.

Chilcott,	Gorman,	Kellogg,	Sewell,
Edmunds,	Groome,	McPherson,	Voorhees.
Fair,	Hill of Georgia,	Mahone,
Garland,	Ingalls,	Morgan,

So the bill was passed.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. MCPHERSON, its Clerk, announced that in compliance with joint resolution (H. R. No. 176) authorizing the Secretary of War to erect at Washington's headquarters, in the city of Newburgh, New York, a memorial column, and to aid in defraying the expenses of the centennial celebration to be held at that city in the year 1883, Mr. BEACH, Mr. KETCHAM, Mr. CURTIN, Mr. J. C. BURROWS, Mr. KNOTT, Mr. AMOS TOWNSEND, Mr. ELLIS, and Mr. RANNEY had been appointed members on the part of the House of the joint select committee of arrangements to perform the duties prescribed by said resolution.

AMENDMENTS TO BILLS.

Mr. FERRY submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the bill (H. R. No. 6716) making appropriations for sundry civil expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1883, and for other purposes; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. BUTLER and Mr. MAHONE submitted amendments intended to be proposed by them respectively to the bill (H. R. No. 5538) to reduce internal-revenue taxation; which were ordered to lie on the table, and be printed.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. PLUMB asked and, by unanimous consent, obtained leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 2139) granting a pension to A. M. Wilson; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. ALDRICH asked and, by unanimous consent, obtained leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 2140) granting a pension to Mary A. Mykins; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. JOHNSTON asked and, by unanimous consent, obtained leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 2141) for the relief of Marian F. Haynie; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

Mr. BLAIR asked and, by unanimous consent, obtained leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 2142) granting a pension to Ellen Rowan, guardian; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

PUBLIC BUILDING AT POUGHKEEPSIE.

Mr. ROLLINS. I desire to present a conference report.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will receive it.

The Acting Secretary read the report, as follows:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendment of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. No. 1095) to provide for the erection of a public building at Poughkeepsie, New York, having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend and do recommend, to their respective Houses as follows: That the House recede from its amendment.

E. H. ROLLINS,
ANGUS CAMERON,
G. G. VEST,
Managers on the part of the Senate.

W. S. SHALLENBERGER,
J. HYATT SMITH,
J. W. SINGLETON,
Managers on the part of the House.

Mr. ROLLINS. I desire to have a letter of the Secretary of the Treasury not read but entered in the RECORD.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That order will be made if there be no objection.

The letter is as follows:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, July 8, 1882.

SIR: In reply to your inquiry as to the amount necessary to provide for a suitable Government building at Poughkeepsie, New York, I would say that from information received as to the probable cost of a suitable site that not less than $75,000 would be required as total appropriation for both site and building.

Very respectfully,

CHAS. J. FOLGER, Secretary.

Hon. J. HYATT SMITH,
House of Representatives.

The report was concurred in.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair lays before the Senate the unfinished business, which is the bill (S. No. 2114) establishing the Territory of Pembina and providing a temporary government therefor.

Mr. MORRILL. I move that House bill No. 5538, to reduce internal-revenue taxation, be taken up so as to be the order of the day for to-morrow.

Mr. INGALLS. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will state that the unfinished business is the Pembina bill. The Senate can set that aside as the unfinished business and take up any other matter; but the Senator from Kansas moves to proceed to the consideration of executive business, which takes precedence.

Mr. MORRILL. I hope the Senator from Kansas will allow me to have a vote to-night on making this bill the unfinished business, so that it will come up immediately after the morning hour to-morrow morning.

Mr. INGALLS. The Senator from Vermont must be aware that he cannot displace the unfinished business by moving to take up another bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It can be postponed to another day.

Mr. INGALLS. Exactly; but he cannot dispose of the unfinished business by moving to take up another bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That is true.

Mr. MORRILL. I move to postpone all pending and prior orders in order to take up the tax bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. But the pending motion is to go into executive session. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Kansas that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. SAUNDERS. If this motion shall carry it will not displace the unfinished business.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The unfinished business has been laid before the Senate and must be got rid of before any other bill is taken up, but it can be got rid of by a majority of the Senate. The question now is on the motion that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. MORRILL. I hope not until we take a vote on my motion.

The motion was agreed to; there being on a division—ayes 33, noes 16.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

The Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After one hour and five minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened, and (at five o'clock and twenty-five minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

WEDNESDAY, July 12, 1882.

The House met at eleven o'clock a. m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. F. D. POWER.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. HISCOCK. I call for the regular order.

The SPEAKER. The regular order is the call of committees for reports.

Mr. HISCOCK. I move to dispense with the morning hour.

The motion was agreed to, two-thirds voting in favor thereof.

Mr. HISCOCK. I understand there is a conference report to be submitted. That is a privileged question and I must yield to it, but I will yield to nothing else.

POUGHKEEPSIE PUBLIC BUILDING.

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. I submit the following conference report:

The Clerk read as follows:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendment of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. No. 1095) to provide for the erection of a public building at Poughkeepsie, New York, having met, after full and free conference, have agreed to recommend, and do recommend, to their respective Houses as follows: That the House recede from its amendment.

W. S. SHALLENBERGER,
J. HYATT SMITH,
JAMES W. SINGLETON,
Managers on the part of the House.
E. H. ROLLINS,
G. G. VEST,
ANGUS CAMERON,
Managers on the part of the Senate.

The following is the statement accompanying the conference report under the rules:

Statement to accompany report of conference committee on the bill to provide for the erection of a public building at Poughkeepsie, New York:

The House recedes from its amendment to the Senate bill, which amendment reduces the ultimate cost of site and building from $75,000 to $65,000.

The effect of this will be to leave the bill as it was passed by the Senate and recommended by the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds of the House.

In the judgment of the Secretary of the Treasury, recently expressed, $75,000 is necessary to complete the work.

The report was agreed to.

Mr. SHALLENBERGER moved to reconsider the vote by which the conference report was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The SPEAKER. The motion to reconsider is laid upon the table.

Mr. HOLMAN. Mr. Speaker, I wish to have some information in regard to that matter.

The SPEAKER. It has been disposed of, and the motion to reconsider has been laid upon the table.

Mr. HOLMAN. The Chair was announcing it at the moment I rose; but I addressed the Chair before the motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

The SPEAKER. The motion to reconsider is not debatable at all events. The matter has been disposed of.

Mr. HOLMAN. An attempt to bring up this matter and dispose of it when the House is not full, when there is only a small minority present, is not, in my judgment, the proper way to consider public business.

The SPEAKER. There is nothing before the House.

Mr. HOLMAN. This matter is before the House, because the Chair was declaring the result when I rose.

The SPEAKER. The Chair had already declared the result and was in the act of making merely a formal statement that the motion to reconsider was laid on the table, when the gentleman addressed the Chair.

Mr. HOLMAN. I think it will be found out that good faith is a valuable commodity in the proceedings of this House in our ordinary legislation.

SUNDRY CIVIL APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. HISCOCK. I now move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the sundry civil appropriation bill.

The motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, Mr. KASSON in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is now in Committee of the Whole for the further consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 6716) making appropriations for the sundry civil expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1883, and for other purposes.

The Clerk read as follows:

For fish transportation: For the construction of a car for the distribution of carp and other useful food-fishes to distant portions of the United States, $5,000.

Mr. HISCOCK. I move to strike out "5" and insert "8;" so it will read "$8,000."

Mr. BLACKBURN. That is merely a correction of the estimate.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

For the purchase of the plates and manuscript on the insects of America from Professor Townend Glover, $7,500.

Mr. HOLMAN. I reserve the point of order on that paragraph until I can obtain some information in reference to it.

Mr. HISCOCK. That is the item which has been put in this bill, and if the gentleman will wait a moment I will have the volume here that it is proposed to purchase. It is believed it should be preserved and belong to the United States in connection with the National Museum.

Mr. HOLMAN. There is no doubt but the people of the country would obtain the benefit of these plates and manuscripts through the ordinary channel even if the Government did not become the purchaser. Now, there seems to be a disposition to place in the hands of the Government many things which ought to be allowed to remain under the control of private individuals.

Mr. HISCOCK. These are destructive insects, in reference to which we have been constantly making appropriations, creating commissions, &c. It is said to be the most valuable collection of the kind ever made. It is the only copy in existence. It is claimed it will facilitate the researches of commissions from time to time which are being appointed to investigate in reference to insects which are destructive to our cereals, cotton, and other staples. It is invaluable, and is now needed in connection with the Department of Agriculture. Recommendations have come to us from men of the highest character, from scientists, and others in favor of the purchase of this collection.

Mr. HOLMAN. Has it been published?

Mr. BLACKBURN. It has not.

Mr. HOLMAN. If it is so valuable why has it not been published?

Mr. HISCOCK. It is the work of a lifetime.

Mr. HOLMAN. I will ask the gentleman if this is a private publication?

Mr. HISCOCK. No, sir; it has not been published.

Mr. HOLMAN. If it has not been published by private enterprise——

Mr. HISCOCK. I hold in my hands the original plates for publication. This is in manuscript, as will be seen.

Mr. HOLMAN. It seems to me strange that any work of real value, if worthy of being purchased at all by the Government, should not have found a private publisher or been put upon the market at private enterprise.

Mr. HISCOCK. It is the work of this man's life. He has devoted his whole life to it, and his ambition now is that the Government shall have it and that it shall be published by the Government. I will say to the gentleman from Indiana further that this was put upon the sundry civil bill last year by the Senate, but went out in the committee of conference.

Mr. HOLMAN. What I object to is that these publications which do not find private publishers shall be imposed upon the Government, although I believe in this case, after the explanation of the gentleman, I will not insist upon the point of order.

Mr. HISCOCK. It is not subject to the point of order.

Mr. HOLMAN. It is certainly subject to the point of order, but I am inclined to yield it on the statement the gentleman has made. I only desire to repeat that it seems to me that publications of this character which cannot find publishers are as a general rule sought to be worked off upon the Government. I withdraw the point of order.

The Clerk read as follows:

For furniture, carpets, and similar necessaries for the new building for the money-order office, to be paid from the proceeds of said office, $3,000, and in addition thereto any unexpended balance of appropriation for this purpose, under the act of March 1, 1881, "making appropriations for the service of the Post-Office Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1883, and for other purposes," which is hereby continued and made available.

Mr. CASWELL. There is evidently an error in line 1821 of this paragraph. Eighteen hundred and eight-three should read "1882."

Mr. HISCOCK. It is evidently a misprint.

Mr. RANDALL. What is the amount of the appropriation?

Mr. CASWELL. This reappropriates the balance of the amount for 1882, the unexpended balance.

Mr. RANDALL. I am inquiring as to the amount covered by the appropriation.

Mr. CASWELL. That has not yet been ascertained.

Mr. HISCOCK. My recollection is that it is about $3,000. The amount originally appropriated was $10,000 I think, and it has been contracted for or expended up to about $3,000.

Mr. RANDALL. It seems to me that is a large sum of money to be used in buying furniture, carpets, &c., for the money-order office.

The Clerk read as follows:

For a passenger elevator for the Post-Office Department building, $8,000.

And the Postmaster-General is hereby authorized, in his discretion, to purchase, out of the appropriation of $15,000 for marking and rating stamps for the fiscal year 1883, in the act of May 4, 1882, five letter-canceling and post-marking machines, at a price not exceeding $350 each.

Mr. SPRINGER. Mr. Chairman, I have been endeavoring to get the attention of the Chair to make a point of order upon this appropriation for a passenger elevator in the Post-Office Department.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state that the Clerk had already finished the reading of that paragraph and had gotten nearly through the next paragraph before the gentleman from Illinois rose.

Mr. SPRINGER. I was addressing the Chair, but the Clerk did not stop the reading, and he was in the middle of the paragraph before I could secure the attention of the Chair. As soon as he read that provision for the passenger elevator I began to address the Chair, and it was then a race between the Clerk and myself, and the Clerk came out ahead. [Laughter.] I desire to make the point of order upon that provision.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair thinks it is too late to make the point of order after the paragraph has been passed from.

Mr. SPRINGER. But I was on my feet at the time for the purpose of making it, and waited to have the Chair recognize me after addressing him for that purpose.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, on the statement of the gentleman, the Chair will now recognize him on the point of order.

Mr. HISCOCK. I am willing that the point of order shall be made against this paragraph. I have no difficulty myself on that subject.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will hear the gentleman from Illinois on the point of order.

Mr. SPRINGER. When it was proposed to build an elevator here in this Capitol it was ruled out on the point of order. Now, this is a proposition to build an elevator in the Post-Office Department. It is a change of existing law, and does not retrench expenditures. There is no necessity for an elevator in that building, as it is not a very tall structure. Certainly there is no good reason for expending $8,000 for that purpose, when the building consists of only two or three stories.

Mr. HISCOCK. I object to the gentleman going into the merits of the question on the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is entirely ready to rule upon the question. So far as the Chair knows, whatever concerns the repairs and modifications of existing public works, when the subject is presented in a bill properly before the House, is legitimately within the province of the committee presenting the bill, and is a proper subject for legislation. The Chair therefore overrules the point of order.

Mr. SPRINGER. When it was proposed to put an elevator in this House, in this very building, it went out on the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair does not know the circumstance of which the gentleman speaks, or what bill it was on, and he can only rule upon the point of order as it now presents itself.

Mr. SPRINGER. Then I move to strike out that clause.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the Chair will entertain that motion.

Mr. SPRINGER. Now, Mr. Chairman, here is a provision contemplating the expenditure of $8,000 for this passenger elevator. Everybody knows that this building is a very low one, consisting of very few stories as compared with other public buildings here, and nearly all of the offices are on the second floor. I submit, therefore, that the persons occupying that building are not subjected to any material inconvenience by having to climb up one flight of stairs in order to transact the public business. I am very frequently compelled to go there myself, and even if there was an elevator, the distance to be climbed is so short that I would not stop to wait for the elevator, and I do not suppose that any other gentleman would. If this were a tall building, and the work of the various offices was carried on in the upper stories, then there would be some apparent reason for this thing; but to put an elevator there is unnecessary extravagance, and after it is built it will cost $2,000 a year to operate it and keep it up; so that we will have a permanent expenditure imposed upon the Government by this provision. I hope it will be stricken out.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 19, noes 37.

So the motion to strike out was not agreed to.

The Clerk read the following paragraph:

UNDER THE DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE.

For repairs to the court-house at Washington, District of Columbia: For annual repairs to the court-house in the City of Washington, District of Columbia, per estimate of the Architect of the Capitol, $1,000.

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. I offer as an amendment to follow the paragraph just read what I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

For the construction of an elevator, repairs, and furnishing and fitting up of rooms in the building now owned by the Government and known as the Freedman's Bank building, as per estimate of the Supervising Architect of the Treasury Department, $25,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, to be expended by the Attorney-General and under his direction, who shall have control of said building, which shall hereafter be occupied by the Department of Justice.

Mr. SPRINGER. I make the point of order on that amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state his point of order.

Mr. SPRINGER. I ask the Clerk to read the amount of the appropriation.

The CHAIRMAN. The amount is $25,000.

Mr. SPRINGER. This building has recently been purchased by the Government for the use of the Department of Justice, and we have paid $250,000 for it. I do not know whether the deeds have yet been executed or the contract completed. The gentleman from Massachusetts informs me that it has. Therefore the building belongs to the Government. I submit this is a change in existing law and does not decrease expenditures, but increases them. It is not in the nature of a repair, but is a permanent improvement; besides that the appropriation of $25,000 for an elevator is exceedingly extravagant.

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. I do not desire to say anything on the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. It is not necessary to detain the committee on the point of order. The amendment reads:

For the construction of an elevator, repairs, and furnishing and fitting up of rooms in the building now owned by the Government and known as the Freedman's Bank building, &c.

Being property now in the possession and use of the Government, the amendment comes within the rule, which, so far as the Chair knows, is unbroken, of allowing appropriations for such purposes upon a bill where the proposition is germane to the contents of the bill.

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. I desire to submit a letter from the Attorney-General of the United States, and ask the Clerk to read it as introductory to any remarks I may make.

The Clerk read as follows:

DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE, Washington, July 7, 1882.

SIR: I have the honor to call your attention to the fact that the Freedman's Bank building, recently purchased by the United States for the use of this Department, is greatly in need of renovation and repairs. The necessity of an elevator to facilitate the business of the Department is obvious to every member of the House and Senate who has been here. I have had a conversation with Colonel Thomas L. Casey, of the Engineer Corps, whose opinion is that the building, besides needing general repairs, must be strengthened, which is one item of expense covered by this estimate. Supervising Architect Hill, of the Treasury Department, has made an estimate of the necessary work upon the building in the following terms:

"From information as to the extent of work required on the present building, obtained in consultation with the chief clerk of your Department, I estimate that the work of repairs and necessary furnishing and fitting up of the rooms and construction of an elevator will require an appropriation of $25,000. It would not be advisable to locate the elevator in the present building, as a more convenient arrangement could be obtained by constructing an elevator shaft against the west wall of the present building, with connected openings on each floor. The elevator can thus be made available for the entire building without change whenever the extension shall be built."

The above plan will necessitate the removal of a frame building which adjoins the Department of Justice building on the west, which frame structure, without any reference to the construction of an elevator, ought to be removed at once in order to protect the Department building from danger of fire. The tearing down of this frame building will necessarily increase the cost of these repairs. Hence I refer to it in this connection. But this expense could not possibly be avoided by any arrangement that could now be made with reference to these repairs, as it must eventually be torn down.

As to the urgent necessity for this appropriation I beg to repeat that it has been obvious to every member of Congress who has visited this Department and made inquiry upon this subject.

Very respectfully,

BENJAMIN HARRIS BREWSTER,
Attorney-General.

Hon. WILLIAM S. SHALLENBERGER,
House of Representatives.

Mr. SPRINGER. On the point of order, I wish to state now——

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order has been overruled.

Mr. SPRINGER. The point of order I made is shown by this letter to have been well taken. This is to build an addition to the building.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order has been disposed of.

Mr. SPRINGER. But this letter has brought facts to light which sustain the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. SHALLENBERGER] is entitled to the floor.

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. The urgent necessity for these repairs was made apparent too late to have this inserted as an original paragraph in the sundry civil bill. An examination of the building, at the request of the Attorney-General, by the distinguished engineer, Colonel Thomas L. Casey, has revealed the fact that some important strengthening is necessary to insure its security. As is well known, this building now belongs to the Government of the United States, having been recently purchased at an expense of $250,000; and I may say it is the cheapest Government property purchased, to my knowledge, in the city of Washington in the last five years. The Government has saved an annual expenditure of $20,000 in the matter of rent alone by the purchase of this building, while the investment at 4 per cent. will only involve an expense of $10,000 yearly.

But the building having been leased for years is out of repair. This sum of money should be expended upon it in the judgment of the Supervising Architect of the Treasury, and as I am informed, in the judgment of Colonel Thomas L. Casey, one of the most eminent, as he is one of the most efficient and skillful engineers of the Government. The proposition comes here indorsed by the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds of the House, and if it were proper under the rules I might also say, indorsed by the Senate Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, and accepted as I understand by the Committee on Appropriations as a paragraph to be inserted in the bill. We present this as needful repairs properly estimated. The elevator is almost a necessity, as we well know. Besides, this amendment is important in order that we may locate the jurisdiction and custody of this building in the Attorney-General of the United States. We now ask the incorporation in the bill of this paragraph, which has been assented to by the Committee on Appropriations. I hope there will be no serious objection to it.

Mr. SPRINGER. I rise to oppose the amendment. When the bill to purchase this building was pending in this House I opposed it upon the ground that it was not wise legislation on the part of Congress to purchase for Government use old buildings, and buildings especially unsuited to the purposes of the Government. I did not know that before this session adjourned I should have legislative proof or testimonial of the truth of the statement I have made. Before the session has closed a proposition is brought forward by the chairman of the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds to spend $25,000 upon this building to make it tenantable for the purposes of the Government.

This is a proposition for permanent improvements, and involves the tearing down of a building already upon the ground, and the erection on the outside of the present walls of a structure to support an elevator, and what additional repairs inside no one knows except the Attorney-General and those who have found out that this building which was purchased for the Government has now to be practically rebuilt before the Government can occupy it.

If the gentleman who has moved this amendment had embodied a proposition in the bill for the purpose of completing a suitable building for the office of the Attorney-General, fire-proof, having an elevator, and properly provided all the way through, I should not have objected to it. But this patch-work and piece-work and continued extravagance on old buildings I am opposed to; and I hope we will not adopt this amendment, but let this building be demonstrated to be unsuited to the public business as it is, and sell it to somebody who can use it for business purposes.

I yield the remainder of my time to the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. RANDALL.]

Mr. RANDALL. When the purchase of this building was under consideration I took occasion to make some remarks in opposition to its purchase. At that time we were informed, I think, that this was a fire-proof building. Now, if I am not misinformed, the highest bid that was ever made for that property by any private parties was $175,000. And yet the Government has paid $225,000.

Mr. SPRINGER. The Government paid $250,000.

Mr. RANDALL. I am advised that the price paid was $250,000; so that the Government has already expended $75,000 more than the building was worth. There was a redeeming feature about the matter, which we perhaps had no legal right to consider; but, as I then said, the only excuse for this wasteful expenditure of the public money was that it enabled the proper authorities to pay a dividend of 10 per cent. to the creditors of the Freedman's Bank. The Government of the United States was made to pay that dividend in fact. We are now told by this amendment that the building is practically a shell, and that, as was said when we were considering the proposition to purchase it, the better way would be to tear it down and rebuild it entirely.

Mr. SPRINGER. The language of the Attorney-General is that the building "is not strong enough to support itself."

Mr. RANDALL. Well, I will correct myself, and withdraw the word "shell," and state that the building is not strong enough to hold itself up, that the whole thing is liable to fall.

I only want to direct the attention of the House to the fact that the objections which were alleged against the purchase of this building are now confessed by the very people who insisted upon purchasing it. [Here the hammer fell.]

The question was taken upon the amendment of Mr. SHALLENBERGER; and upon a division, there were—ayes 48, noes 35.

Mr. RANDALL. No quorum has voted.

Mr. HISCOCK. Do not make that point.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman insist upon that point?

Mr. RANDALL. Yes.

Tellers were ordered, and Mr. RANDALL and Mr. SHALLENBERGER were appointed.

The committee again divided; and the tellers reported that there were—ayes 61, noes 41.

The CHAIRMAN. Is a further count insisted upon?

Mr. RANDALL. It is.

The CHAIRMAN. The tellers will continue their count.

The tellers continued the count; and reported that there were—ayes 86, noes 61.

So the amendment was adopted.

Mr. SPRINGER. I give notice that I will call for a yea-and-nay vote in the House on this amendment.

The Clerk read the following:

PUBLIC PRINTING AND BINDING.

For the public printing, for the public binding, and for paper for the public printing, including the cost of printing the debates and proceedings of Congress in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, and for lithographing, mapping, and engraving for both Houses of Congress, the Supreme Court of the United States, the supreme court of the District of Columbia, the Court of Claims, the Library of Congress, the commissioners of the District of Columbia, and the Departments, including salaries or compensation of all necessary clerks and employés, for labor, (by the day, piece, or contract,) and for all the necessary materials which may be needed in the prosecution of the work, $2,400,000; and from the said sum hereby appropriated printing and binding may be done by the Public Printer to the amounts following, respectively, namely:

Mr. RANDALL. I move to amend the paragraph just read by striking out "$2,400,000" and inserting "$2,300,000." My object in moving that amendment is to direct the attention of the House to the increased appropriation for the public printing. I presume that the Committee on Appropriations, by the action of the House and of the Senate in ordering the printing of documents, have been compelled to make this appropriation of $2,400,000 for the current fiscal year.

So far as I can ascertain from a hurried examination of the sundry civil bill of last year, the corresponding item in that bill was for $1,700,000. There is therefore practically an increase of $700,000 in this bill for the public printing. I want as well to direct the attention of the Committee on Printing to this condition of things, in order to ascertain whether we cannot call a halt in the expenditures for printing. I think that $2,400,000 is an enormous sum to be expended in that direction.

Mr. HISCOCK. The appropriations for this branch of the public service for the last fiscal year were $2,565,000. The appropriations recommended by the pending bill as reported to the House amount to $2,450,000, or $115,000 less than was appropriated for the last fiscal year.

Mr. RANDALL. Let me ask the gentleman a question. What was the amount of deficiency appropriated this year? In the appropriation bill proper for the last fiscal year there was only $1,700,000 appropriated.

Mr. HISCOCK. Yes; and the appropriations for deficiencies were $865,000.

Mr. RANDALL. There is as yet no guarantee but what there may be a deficiency of some amount required for this fiscal year.

Mr. HISCOCK. If the gentleman had read the bill through he would have discovered that there is a guarantee in this bill.

Mr. RANDALL. There is always a guarantee in all the bills requiring that the Departments shall make no expenditure in excess of the appropriations; and yet they do it every year.

Mr. HISCOCK. There is a sufficient guarantee in this bill.

Mr. RANDALL. I am not reflecting upon the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. HISCOCK. I know you were not.

Mr. RANDALL. I was reflecting upon what I think was an excess of expenditure on the part of the two Houses of Congress.

Mr. HISCOCK. I desire to say this: when the appropriation bill was passed last year containing an appropriation of $1,700,000 for this purpose for that fiscal year, Congress then knew it was making an insufficient appropriation, because that same Congress had voted deficiencies which with the original amount contained in the appropriation bill made the appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1881, $2,100,000. Yet in the face and eyes of that fact the House and the Senate cut down the appropriations for this purpose to $1,700,000, although it knew that for the year then unexpired it had appropriated $2,100,000 altogether.

We have put upon this bill a clause providing that not more than one-half of this appropriation shall be expended during the first six months of the current fiscal year; and we have also provided that for the remaining two quarters of the year not more than one-quarter of the whole appropriation shall be expended in either of those quarters, except in case of unexpended balances coming over from the preceding quarter.

Mr. RANDALL. That will not remedy it.

Mr. HISCOCK. It will remedy it.

Mr. RANDALL. That will perhaps delay the printing of the books which are ordered by Congress until the third or the last quarter of the fiscal year.

Mr. HISCOCK. No, sir.

Mr. RANDALL. The evil is in the House and Senate ordering an excessive amount of this printing, and that is what I want to remedy.

Mr. HISCOCK. The trouble has been that the money would all be expended upon the printing of books and that sort of things, and when Congress came back here we would be confronted with an exhausted appropriation, so that it would be necessary to make an additional appropriation to pay for the current printing of Congress. Now, this limitation will compel the Public Printer to keep back money enough to do our work when Congress gets here.

The CHAIRMAN. Debate is exhausted.

Mr. BLOUNT. I move to amend by striking out the last word. The gentleman in charge of this bill has stated that the last Congress deliberately reduced the amount of appropriation below the wants of the Government. My friend is quite given in the debate upon this business bill to indulge in his little political licks, which I have not seen fit to take up the time of the House in answering. But I deem it due to the last House and due to myself to say that two years ago the Public Printer prepared the appropriation for the sundry civil bill, fixing the amount at $1,600,000; and he assured the Committee on Appropriations that if they would authorize such an arrangement as he suggested for the distribution of this fund there should be no deficiency. The appropriation was made exactly as he requested. There was no paring down; there was no disposition to bring about a deficiency; but the appropriation was made in his own language and upon his own assurance that there should be no deficiency.

But, sir, it turned out that the elections went against the party in power; and then there came in a deficiency of about half a million of dollars for printing. Although we had had the assurance of the Public Printer that with $1,600,000 the printing department could get along, we increased the amount to about $2,000,000; and deficiencies were made upon that. They will be made upon the amount allowed in this bill notwithstanding the provision to which my friend from New York has referred.

We may just as well quit this political wrangling between the sides of this House in reference to deficiency bills. The blame in this matter does not belong exclusively to one party or the other. Gentlemen on either side of this House when the Committee on Printing propose liberal appropriations will sometimes override the recommendation of the committee and double the orders for printing. Thus bills for public printing pass through Congress, and the duty devolves on the Public Printer to do this printing. If a deficiency occurs, the appropriation bill does not restrain him. The law is operative upon him; he has the right to make contracts. There can be no end to these deficiencies unless there is a revolution on the part of the two Houses of Congress by resolving to restrain the excessive printing of public documents, many of which are useless. We may just as well, therefore, look this matter in the face and quit wrangling. When the various propositions are presented from the Committee on Printing let us scrutinize them. You cannot cure the evil in any other way.

Mr. ATKINS obtained the floor.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Pennsylvania withdraw his amendment?

Mr. RANDALL. Yes, sir.

Mr. ATKINS. I renew it. Mr. Chairman, I think the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. BLOUNT] has correctly diagnosed this case, except that he might have gone one step further. I wish to call the attention of the gentleman from New York [Mr. HISCOCK] to the remark I am going to make. I think the fault is not with Congress that we have such large deficiencies piled upon us. The gentleman from New York intimates that it was the studied design of the Democratic portion of Congress, especially the Democratic side of the House of Representatives, to obtain credit before the country for economy in the public expenditures by cutting down appropriations, so that deficiencies would necessarily occur. No such feeling as that, Mr. Chairman, animated the Committee on Appropriations in recent Congresses, as the gentleman well knows. We addressed ourselves to the public service, endeavoring to ascertain as well as we could its requirements; and in every instance, without a single exception, we gave what we believed was essential for the smooth running of the public service, with no disposition to cripple it whatever.

Now, the point I wish to make is that Congress cannot be responsible for the extravagance and the violations of law on the part of the Executive Departments in the administration of these funds. But so long as Congress will come up and promptly make appropriations to meet these deficiencies, as the gentleman from New York seems inclined to do, and has seemed inclined to do through this session of Congress, we may expect these deficiencies to be piled up, Pelion upon Ossa, year after year. The fault is not with Congress; the fault is with the administration.

I will admit that in this particular case the fault is to some extent with Congress and with the Committee on Printing; not that I would charge the fault upon that committee either, except that they make recommendations and the House accedes to them. But the Departments have found that Congress will make appropriations to supply deficiencies, and hence they bring these deficiencies about. When the gentleman from New York intimates, as he has frequently intimated, that the fault is with the Democratic side of the House, (and I am sorry he should make these intimations, occupying the position that he does as the organ of the House of Representatives—a peculiarly non-partisan position; during the four years that I had the honor to occupy that position the word "Republican" or "Democrat" scarcely escaped my tongue in the debates of this House)—I say the fault is not to be laid upon the majority side in the Forty-fourth, the Forty-fifth, or the Forty-sixth Congress, but it is with the Departments, and I think the gentleman ought to know it. So long as he promptly reports appropriations here at the demand of these Departments he may expect these deficiencies to continue.

Mr. HISCOCK. There is a way to remedy these deficiencies, and there has been a way for a long time if it had only been pursued; and this Congress has started upon that course. I mean by the making of specific appropriations. Where the service is to be performed by officers we can provide the number to be employed and the sums to be paid them. These deficiencies have grown up out of the practice of preceding Congresses. I do not charge it especially upon the last three Congresses. I do not know how long the practice has continued; it has grown out of the abandonment of the policy of specific appropriations.

The gentleman from Tennessee says that I have been accustomed during the progress of the consideration of this bill to bring in political discussions. I beg the gentleman's pardon; since we entered upon the consideration of the bill by sections I have foreborne to do anything of the kind unless I have been compelled to do so by some sort of attack or insinuation from the other side.

Again, Mr. Chairman, the gentleman says the responsibility for these deficiencies falls upon the executive branches of the Government, upon the Administration. Mr. Chairman, knowing whereof I affirm, having given full consideration to this question, I say this is not the case.

Mr. COBB. Will the gentleman permit me to make an explanation?

Mr. HISCOCK. I will explain the matter in this way: here is the postal service, for instance, in reference to which general statutes fix the amount of money that must be expended for salaries of postmasters, for transportation of mails, &c. The statute fixes and defines the amount it will cost, and the Administration has no more power to change that than it has to change the law of gravitation.

Mr. COBB. But the gentleman ought to call attention to the fact that there is another law upon the statute-book which provides that no officer of the Government shall contract for the payment of a debt in advance of an appropriation by Congress.

Mr. HISCOCK. I know all about that statute.

Mr. COBB. Of course you do, and you also know it is not executed.

Mr. HISCOCK. We know all about that statute. We have heard that statute talked about. The gentleman from Indiana talks about it and the gentleman from Pennsylvania talks about it.

Mr. RANDALL. Yes, and you ought to execute it.

Mr. HISCOCK. No gentleman on this floor knows better than the gentleman from Pennsylvania it is impossible to execute it——

Mr. RANDALL. I do not know any such thing.

Mr. HISCOCK. And if he will hear me out I will tell him why and he will be compelled to admit it. Take the salaries of postmasters. The law fixes the salaries of postmasters, and when you appropriate less than the law said you should give them there must be a deficiency.

Mr. BLOUNT. You did the same thing during two years, and we had to provide for your deficiencies.

Mr. HISCOCK. Do not say I did it. I am pointing out to the gentleman an instance in which he must recognize the fact there must be a deficiency.

Again, Mr. Chairman, there is the statute that tells us how much shall be paid for the transportation of the mail. It is fixed by law. It depends on the volume of mail and space occupied, and if you do not give money enough to pay according to the statute under which the prices are fixed, then a deficiency must come in from that service, and the gentleman from Pennsylvania knows it; or else the Post-Office Department, the moment the money is exhausted, must stop the mail service and refuse to put the mail matter on the road. That will not stop their salaries, which the law allows them. He knows that as well as I do. And the gentleman from Pennsylvania owes it to himself and to the country—he has standing enough and can afford to be fair and honest—he owes it to himself to admit it.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman's time has expired.

Mr. HISCOCK. I hope some gentleman will take the floor and yield me his time, so that I may conclude my remarks.

Mr. ROBESON. Mr. Chairman, I will take the floor and yield my time to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. HISCOCK. Again, take the public land service. The fees of registers and other officers are fixed by law. Their compensation is fixed by law. It depends on the sales and upon the execution of certain laws, the execution of which they have no power to arrest; and if you do not provide enough for that service a deficiency comes in, and the gentleman from Pennsylvania knows it; and I repeat again that he cannot afford to deny it to the country or to this House.

You may take the courts as another instance. The fees of witnesses, the fees of clerks, the fees of marshals; the law fixes it all, and when Congress deliberately appropriates less for that service than has been paid the corresponding year, it knows there must be a deficiency there. It knows that under the laws which are upon our statute-books the Government moves on and deficiency occurs.

I might go further, but I have had occasion, Mr. Chairman, in the general discussion to point out all these matters in detail. At the cost of having it said I have dragged into this matter political discussion, I say again that when any Congress votes less than what they can by arithmetic figure out must be paid, it deliberately invites a deficiency and legislates knowing a deficiency must come.

Mr. RANDALL. Mr. Chairman, prior to the war deficiency bills were almost unknown. During the war they became necessary, but very soon after the war closed the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. DAWES,] now in the Senate, but then chairman of the Committee on Appropriations, or the Committee on Ways and Means, feeling there was no longer any necessity why executive officers of the Government should be allowed to involve the Government in expenditure beyond the amount of appropriation, introduced two bills. One of the bills provided that no officer of the Government should be allowed to do any such thing. That law to-day is a dead-letter upon the statute-book. No attention is paid to it by any Department of the Government. Another reform introduced by the gentleman, and in which we co-operated with him, as we did in making the other law, was that all balances should be covered into the Treasury at the end of two years. I assert that executive officers of the Government have no right under the spirit and letter of that law to which I first alluded to involve the Government in any expenditure in excess of the appropriation.

Mr. HISCOCK. Now, I trust, since we have drifted into this debate, that the gentleman from Pennsylvania will answer me candidly a question which I will put to him, and it is just this, and I wish to see by it whether the gentleman comes within my view of what may necessitate a deficiency. Here, for instance, is a certain amount of money to be paid under the law for mail transportation. Now, I ask him if Congress refuses to make an appropriation to pay for that transportation according to the law, and the amount provided by the law——

Mr. RANDALL. I understand what the gentleman means.

Mr. HISCOCK. Let me complete the question—would there not necessarily be a deficiency if the law is complied with? Now, that being the case——

Mr. RANDALL. I understand the gentleman's question; I cannot yield my time——

Mr. HISCOCK. What would the gentleman have done then in such a case as that?

Mr. RANDALL. There never was during the Forty-fourth, Forty-fifth, or Forty-sixth Congresses any occasion when there was not money enough appropriated for the Post-Office Department, and if conducted with honesty and economy that appropriation would have been adequate for that service. Moreover, under a recent Postmaster-General, a Republican, that fact has been demonstrated without dispute.

Mr. HISCOCK. I beg of the gentleman that he will not get from the point, but will come directly to the question and answer it.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Pennsylvania yield?

Mr. RANDALL. I do not. The gentleman has asked a question and I have made the answer.

Mr. HISCOCK. No; you have not answered. You are seeking to abuse some Postmaster-General——

Mr. RANDALL. I am not.

Mr. HISCOCK. And I ask the gentleman to answer categorically the question, which admits of a direct answer.

Mr. RANDALL. I say again that so far as the Post-Office Department is concerned, if you put a man in there at the head of the Department who abides by the law and keep him there, the Department can be made self-sustaining, and needs no appropriation except that under the general law which permits the Department to use certain funds for necessary expenditures to carry on the business of the office.

Mr. HISCOCK. I sincerely hope the gentleman from Pennsylvania will not get away from the question.

Mr. RANDALL. State it again. I have answered the question as I understood it.

Mr. HISCOCK. I asked the gentleman from Pennsylvania, in the nature of a "whereas" that under the statutes a certain amount of money shall be paid, and is fixed by law for mail transportation upon railroads, for instance, and Congress refuses to appropriate enough to discharge the obligation to these railroads for transporting the mails. Now, that being the case, does the gentleman from Pennsylvania not know, and will he not in all candor concede that there must, of necessity, be a deficiency on that account, if the law is complied with and the service performed? Now, if the gentleman understands the question I hope he will answer it.

Mr. RANDALL. In so far as the railroad companies are concerned, and their payments from the Post-Office Department for the transportation of the mails, there has been permitted on the part of the companies a power to exercise a coercion over the Department and force excessive payments——

Mr. HISCOCK. That does not answer the question. The gentleman says again and again, and he has stated on the floor of this House frequently, that you need have no deficiencies. Now, I cite him an instance where the law requires a certain thing to be done and the appropriation is not adequate for it. Must not there be a deficiency? This is capable of a direct answer, and I ask the gentleman to give it.

Mr. RANDALL. During the entire period of the Democratic administration of this House there was an amount of money appropriated for this service that if it had been economically expended would have allowed no deficiency.

Mr. HISCOCK. This is no question of economy. I have asked the gentleman a simple question.

The CHAIRMAN, (Mr. ROBINSON, of Massachusetts, in the chair.) The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. RANDALL. Now, here we have at this session of Congress——

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is obliged to state that the time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. RANDALL. All of my time was taken up in that long question of the gentleman

Mr. ATKINS. This is the finest specimen of two men speaking at the same time I have ever seen.

Mr. HISCOCK. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry. I asked the gentleman from Pennsylvania a question to which I desired a direct answer, and if he will give me a direct categorical answer to it he shall have all the time he wants.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair understood the gentleman from New York to rise to a parliamentary inquiry.

Mr. HISCOCK. Well, it was a parliamentary suggestion. I want the gentleman from Pennsylvania to have time to answer the question.

Mr. RANDALL. On the subject of deficiencies I only desire to say in this connection that we have already had a little deficiency bill which we have disposed of, and a large deficiency bill, and perhaps there will be others——

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair must insist that the gentleman's time has expired.

Mr. SCALES. I will take the floor and yield to the gentleman.

The CHAIRMAN. Debate is exhausted upon the pending amendment.

Mr. HISCOCK. I move to strike out the last two words, and yield the time to the gentleman from Pennsylvania, so that he may utilize it by giving a direct answer to the question I have asked him. And after he shall have answered that question I will give him a dozen other instances of the same character in which it is equally plain that if you do not appropriate money enough for the absolute requirements of the Government under the law a deficiency must inevitably follow.

Mr. RANDALL. Now, I will show to the gentleman from New York something about the Post-Office Department in its mismanagement.

Mr. HISCOCK. In reply to the question I am asking the gentleman? I hope the gentleman will answer that first.

Mr. RANDALL. I have tried to answer it. I understood it to be rather in the nature of a suggestion than an inquiry.

Mr. HISCOCK. No; it is a direct inquiry which admits of a direct, categorical answer, and I wanted the gentleman to come to that point.

Mr. RANDALL. I was going to say that I know something of the manner in which these deficiencies in the Post-Office Department work out, for facts have been developed in that connection which are sufficient to demonstrate that a proper management of it will not create a deficiency, and there are trials now going on in this city in which that question will be demonstrated. But it has been also demonstrated by the action of the late Postmaster-General that a vast amount of money has been expended for which there was no occasion.

Again, the Post-Office Department has power whenever it chooses to reweigh the mail and to regulate the compensation therefor; and it has been the practice to do that every four years. But recently this reweighing has been more frequent; I think there were two weighings in the past year. And a discretion has been given in the law that there shall be 50 per cent. only of the appropriation expended when the Postmaster-General thinks the efficiency of the service will make that permissible.

So much for the Post-Office Department. The gentleman cannot hang his banner on that, because when there was a discreet Postmaster-General who knew his business and had experience in the administration of post-office matters he brought back the Department to be a self-paying establishment, so that there need be no deficiency in that Department at all; and the gentleman from New York when he cites that case gives up his case entirely.

As to the other matters he directed my attention to: occasionally by the act of this House, as in the case of the public printing, the amount of the appropriation may be exceeded. But that does not give justification for the enormous deficiencies in almost every branch of the service of this Government, in utter violation, as I have already said, of the law. I will join the gentleman in stopping this thing, and I am glad to see he is directing his attention for the first time to this very matter of preventing these extravagant and unwarrantable and illegal expenditures of the public money. And when that comes to pass, when the executive officers of this Government see that they are controlled by the laws of the land and do not have countenance from outside, come from where it may, in violating the law and expending in six months the amount appropriated for the entire year, then you will have broken up this system. I maintain under that law these executive officers have no right to expend a larger sum of money relatively through the year than the aggregate amount of money appropriated for the whole year. If the gentleman is sincere we will have that law executed; and if that gentleman or that party will not execute it, then somebody or some party will come here that will.

Mr. ROBESON. I desire to repeat, in perhaps different form, the question to the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. RANDALL.] If the law fixes the salary of the postmasters and allows them to collect it out of their receipts, as the law does, and if Congress does not appropriate enough to cover that amount, how is Congress to escape a deficiency upon that point? And how else are the books in the Treasury to be settled and the two sides of the account balanced? Now, the gentleman may take the next five minutes in answering that.

The next point is this: the gentleman says that under the last Postmaster-General, whom I think he insinuated we turned out, a discreet Postmaster-General——

Mr. RANDALL. He resigned, I think.

Mr. ROBESON. That it was shown that the receipts of the Post-Office Department could be made under business management to cover the expenses. And in the next breath the gentleman complained that additional expense had been put upon the Post-Office Department by more frequent weighing within the last year. Now, was it not that discreet and business Postmaster-General, whom the gentleman lauds as the representative of his ideas, who increased the expenses of that Department by that additional weighing? The gentleman will answer that question.

Mr. RANDALL. I commended only his good deeds, not his bad.

Mr. ROBESON. Now, then, to the point of this provision. For the first time we are endeavoring under the lead of Republican ideas to fix the limit to this thing. It is utterly impossible usually for Congress or for the Committee on Appropriations to avoid a deficiency. Why? Because the Printing Office Bureau comes up to the Committee on Appropriations and says, "All the money appropriated for the year has been spent, you must pass a resolution of deficiency or pass a deficiency act, or the current printing of the House record, its bills, and its reports must stop." Now, we have tried to provide against that. We have fixed specific amounts in this appropriation for particular objects; and we have provided that only one-fourth of it shall be spent each quarter; so that they cannot come up and say at the end of six months that the whole appropriation has been spent, and that the wheels of government must stop unless we appropriate a deficiency.

Now, nobody can control the action of the House in printing books. Nobody can control the action of the Senate; certainly we cannot. Nobody can say we must not appropriate money according to laws that are passed by both Houses of Congress. But what we can do is to attempt to bring this within definite limits, to have the sums divided up into smaller parts and reported more frequently; to have certain appropriations for certain specific times, so that deficiencies will be less and the accountability greater. And this Appropriations Committee has recommended this for the action of the House. Not only is this appropriation less by $115,000 than it was for the same subject-matters last year, but we have taken measures as far as can be taken to hold them within still more narrow and responsible limits.

Mr. RANDALL. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. MILLER. I wish to ask the gentleman from New Jersey whether he said that this bill appropriates less money for these matters than the same bill of the Forty-sixth Congress?

Mr. ROBESON. Yes, sir; $115,000 less.

Mr. MILLER. Then what is the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RANDALL] making this fuss about?

Mr. RANDALL. But we have not heard of the deficiency that is going to occur. Will the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. ROBESON] allow me to ask him a question? He has alluded to the pay of postmasters. He knows that comes out of the receipts of the respective post-offices over which they have control, and it increases according as the business increases; so that there is really no excuse for a deficiency in that particular.

Mr. ROBESON. I hope the gentleman will pardon me for interrupting him right there. We must appropriate from the Treasury; it is a deficiency and goes into the deficiency bill.

Mr. RANDALL. It is, in fact, no deficiency, because as you increase the salaries of your postmasters you receive an increased amount of revenue, which warrants that increase, and it is paid from the receipts of the respective offices.

Mr. ROBESON. But every dollar of it has to be appropriated.

Mr. ATKINS. I move to strike out the last word. The gentleman from New York, [Mr. HISCOCK,] supported by the gentleman from New Jersey, [Mr. ROBESON,] has presented an extreme case, that of appropriations by Congress for the payment of salaries, as instanced in the case of postmasters which they have mentioned. Now, I am frank to acknowledge that if Congress should fail to make an appropriation sufficient to pay the salaries of postmasters under the law, it would be a legitimate deficiency. There is nothing to be gained by denying that proposition.

Mr. HISCOCK. That is right.

Mr. ATKINS. But I propose to meet every proposition upon its merits; I propose to stand by the logic of the case. The gentleman from New York in his astuteness has selected a very extreme case to put to the House.

What has the gentleman to say in answer to the point I made, that the Departments have by virtue of their own imperial will exceeded the appropriations made, not alone in the payment of the salaries of postmasters, or the payment of the salaries of any other officers of the Government, but in thousands—I will not say thousands—but in hundreds of instances? They have exceeded the law, not in the payment of salaries alone, but in contingent expenses of various kinds and miscellaneous expenses, and for almost everything for which appropriations are made by Congress.

Here is the deficiency bill which was passed by the House, sent to the Senate, and has just been returned to the House with amendments. It is full of just such instances as I have spoken of. Here are deficiencies for contingent expenses in almost every Department of the Government. Were those contingent expenses intended to pay the salaries of postmasters, or to pay the salaries of any other officers?

Why, then, does the astute gentleman from New York [Mr. HISCOCK] plant himself upon the single proposition, upon the narrow proposition, that Congress must make appropriations to pay salaries under the law, and if it fails to do so it is a legitimate deficiency? Nobody denies that.

Does the gentleman say that it is a legitimate deficiency for lithographing or otherwise producing plates for the Official Gazette? Not a bit of it. Does any gentleman say that it is a legitimate deficiency to pay the current expenses of the commission to investigate the habits of the Rocky Mountain locust?

This deficiency bill is full of items of deficiencies for contingent expenses and miscellaneous expenses which might have been avoided. Do you pretend to tell me that it was necessary to make a deficiency for the Rocky Mountain locust commission? Why did not they stop when the money gave out? Why did not they stop when the money gave out for the contingent expenses of the Treasury Department? Here is a volume which shows the malpractice of the Treasury Department in the administration of its contingent fund. It is too voluminous to be alluded to in detail.

Mr. RANDALL. And too damning to mention.

Mr. ATKINS. I hope the gentleman in pleading for the necessity of these deficiencies will stand upon the merits of this question, and not plant himself upon a little narrow limit, which is correct enough within itself, but is not at all applicable to the vast number and amounts of deficiencies asked for for the interminable and multifarious objects which this deficiency bill and kindred bills show are asked for.

Mr. REAGAN. I understood the gentleman from New Jersey, [Mr. ROBESON,] and I believe I understood the gentleman from New York, [Mr. HISCOCK,] to assume that the unpaid accounts of postmasters created deficiencies in the appropriations for the postal service. Perhaps I did not correctly understand their statements; if I did, then certainly they have made a great mistake.

The payment of postmasters is regularly estimated for by the Department in its annual estimates. It is true that the accounts of postmasters, at least for the last quarter of the fiscal year, are not settled until perhaps three months after the fiscal year expires. But they are regularly appropriated for, and they could not otherwise be paid.

The estimate is made, and the postmasters themselves retain out of the proceeds of their offices the amount due them for their salaries. The books of the Department are kept regularly, with debits and credits based on the preceding appropriations made for the Department. And the mere fact that the books are not balanced until the quarter after the fiscal year expires has nothing on earth to do with the creation of a deficiency. The appropriations are made; otherwise they could not retain the money for their salaries. But they are charged with the amounts retained out of the proceeds of their offices for the payment of their salaries pursuant to the previous appropriation made by Congress.

Mr. CANNON. Suppose there is no appropriation?

Mr. REAGAN. Then they cannot take the money out of the proceeds of their offices for the payment of their salaries, for that would be embezzlement.

Mr. CANNON. They do do it; that is the rule.

Mr. REAGAN. There can be no such rule, for it would be a plain and palpable violation of the law.

Mr. ROBESON. Does not the law authorize them to retain out of their receipts the amount of their salaries? And has not that been the universal custom?

Mr. REAGAN. I am not aware that that is the law.

Mr. ROBESON. And that being so, if Congress does not make an appropriation equal to the amount which the law authorizes them to retain, the excess of the amount which the law authorizes them to retain over the appropriation made by Congress becomes a deficiency. It takes no money out of the Treasury to pay it, but it is necessary to appropriate as a deficiency, and it is appropriated as a deficiency, for the settlement of the books at the Treasury.

Mr. REAGAN. That is a hypothetical case.

Mr. ROBESON. It is a case that occurs every year.

Mr. REAGAN. I say there is no case in which the annual appropriation does not provide money for the payment of these postmasters.

Mr. ROBESON. But not enough.

Mr. REAGAN. I will not say the law is not as the gentleman states it, because I am not sure about the matter; but if it is not, the Department instructs the postmasters to retain so much as will pay their salaries, they being charged with the amount on the books of the Department. But if this were done without an appropriation, whether with or without the authority of the Department, it would be a violation of law.

Mr. ROBINSON, of Massachusetts. Mr. Chairman, I have listened with a great deal of patience during the last fifteen or twenty minutes to find out what this discussion has to do with the pending appropriation. I have tried to get the wisdom that should come out of the present Committee on Appropriations, and also out of the ex-chairman of that committee [Mr. ATKINS] and my illustrious friend from Pennsylvania, [Mr. RANDALL.] I want to know what all this has to do with the question of printing. This debate, as I understand, grew out of a remark of the gentleman from Tennessee, [Mr. ATKINS,] in the first instance, that the deficiency in the printing department arose from a violation of law on the part of the Public Printer. I think it was intimated that there was a violation of law on his part, and that this was the reason for the large sum of money required as a deficiency.

Mr. ATKINS. It was the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. BLOUNT] who said that.

Mr. ROBINSON, of Massachusetts. Very well; if anybody says there has been a violation of law in that branch of the public service, this Congress wants to know it; and somebody outside of the Appropriations Committee ought to be able to tell us something about it. The rest of us do not care anything about these used-up quarrels. There is a Congressional election coming, perhaps, by and by; but the people care very little about this quarrel between the two Appropriations Committees or the various gentlemen who have held the position of chairman of that committee. I say very respectfully that matter is of no sort of consequence. The question is what has the Public Printer done? Where is the violation of law? In this bill we appropriate $2,400,000 for the public printing for the fiscal year; that is the sum of money which the Public Printer is authorized to expend. Now, he does not violate the law by spending this money. This bill divides the appropriation and declares that $1,304,650 of this sum shall be for printing and binding for the use of Congress. When the Public Printer spends this amount for the printing and binding of Congress he is within the law. If he stops there and says to Congress, "Unless you give me more money I cannot complete your work," that is not a deficiency; there is no violation of law.

I believe that gentlemen who have good sense enough to be members of Congress ought to have sense enough to discriminate between a real deficiency and an exigency that they themselves create by their legislation. The gentleman from Georgia hit the nail squarely on the head in the first instance when he said if you do not want these large applications for money on the part of the Public Printer, stop sending your orders for printing. That is all there is of it. There is no party capital to be made out of this matter. Democrats and Republicans alike vote for large orders for the printing of books and documents; and then because there seems to be a large expenditure, it is quite the fashion to abuse somebody on the ground that he has created a deficiency. It is astonishing to me that some gentlemen who, when appropriations are proposed, say, "Give us $30,000 instead of $20,000, the sum reported; give us $50,000 instead of $30,000"—it is astonishing to me that gentlemen who thus pile up expenditures should three months afterward come in and make flaming speeches upon the text of economy, because the Public Printer cannot do all they have ordered him to do with the money that has been given.

Mr. BLOUNT obtained the floor.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair begs to remark that this general debate is running rather by consent than under the rule.

Mr. BLOUNT. Mr. Chairman, the discussion which has been going on, if I may be allowed to say it, grew out of a general commentary upon the non-observance of the statute providing that there shall be no expenditures in excess of appropriations, and the remark that in this way deficiencies arose. The gentleman from New York, [Mr. HISCOCK,] instead of meeting that issue presented by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. RANDALL,] avoided the real difficulty by taking up a case as to deficiencies in compensation for carrying the mails and in pay of postmasters. This is an avoidance of the issue. The great bulk of deficiencies do not arise in that way. They come from an excess of expenditure over the amounts authorized by law. Even the mail service will illustrate this remark. Gentlemen of the House will remember that at the beginning of the Forty-fifth Congress we made a very largely increased appropriation for postal-car service; but when we came here in December, the fiscal year beginning in July, the Second Assistant Postmaster-General declared, in a communication to this House, "I have made contracts that will exhaust the appropriation, and unless you give me a deficiency appropriation I will have to discontinue every postal car in the United States." Is there any law for such a thing as that? Is that a deficiency arising under the law? The gentleman from Pennsylvania has rightly referred to the fact that, while the law required the reweighing of the mails only once in four years, a reweighing was sometimes ordered on the great trunk lines twice a year, involving the Government in an additional expenditure of over $700,000, an amount which would have more than met the exigency for which a deficiency appropriation was asked in those years. This act, not required by law, may be said to have created those very deficiencies in the postal service.

My friend has charged that we did not appropriate enough for the transportation of the mails, and in that way seeks to escape the issue. We did appropriate all we were asked to appropriate, and said so to gentlemen on the other side, but they sought to increase the postal-car clerks and route agents and matters of that sort, knowing in reality there would come back a deficiency against which I struggled. There was not any complaint made by any Republican member of the Committee on Appropriations. They had my vote and my voice for this increase. I believed a deficiency would come.

The gentleman said the mails were obliged to go on, that this deficiency comes about legitimately. I recollect when the Republican party did not think so. When we were in session in the Forty-fourth Congress there were hundreds of miles of railroad in Texas where there was not a mail, as was the case in various other parts of the country, in order to create a prejudice against the party in power in this House, and we were compelled to provide for their own shortcomings by the hue and cry that the mails were not being carried at all. As soon as the Republican party came into possession of this House we heard for the first time that the mails had to be carried and that deficiencies were a necessity. [Here the hammer fell.]

The pro forma amendment was withdrawn.

Mr. SPRINGER. I move to strike out, in line 1859, "400,000," and insert in lieu thereof "300,000." I will, however, state, Mr. Chairman, before making my remarks, that while on its face it is a bona fide amendment, I will treat it as a pro forma amendment, for the purpose of submitting the statements which I propose to submit in reference to the public printing done by the Government.

In the first place, Mr. Chairman, I desire to learn from the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations whether any portion of this large increase is required during the present fiscal year growing out of the necessity for printing the reports of the Census Bureau?

Mr. HISCOCK. There is an appropriation outside of this bill for that purpose.

Mr. SPRINGER. Yes; and that is to say that appropriation for taking the census also included an appropriation for the printing of the census reports. That, however, does not include the printing of the reports for the use of members of Congress, but only includes the printing of the reports for the use of the Census Bureau.

I call the attention, therefore, of this House to the fact that there is not now any provision of law for the printing of census reports for general distribution among the people. The law only authorizes the stereotyping of the various reports and the printing of a few volumes for distribution by the Interior Department. It will be necessary, therefore, for the Committee on Printing of the two Houses before we adjourn to report some measure for the printing of these volumes for public use, and that printing will have to come out of this appropriation, so that if no estimate has been made for it, it will vastly increase the amount for printing even during the present fiscal year which has just begun.

Let me call attention further to the magnitude of the work. I have been informed by the Superintendent that the monographs will cover from 18,000 to 20,000 pages of quarto form and when completed will consist of from eighteen to twenty quarto volumes of 1,000 pages each. It is the most stupendous work of the kind ever begun by any government in the world. It will cost a vast sum of money to print this work, and I do not believe there is enough in this appropriation, considering the ordinary expense of the Government Printing Office, to print that work of the Census Office. It does not include the large edition Congress will order of the compendium of the census. It does not include one of these volumes for public distribution.

Having called attention to this, now I wish to come to some other matters connected with the public printing which gentlemen, in my judgment, seem to overlook.

The aggregate number of reports of the Agricultural Department have amounted to enormous sums of money for their printing.

We have also reports for the Bureau of Statistics in the Treasury Department, covering many thousands of pages of the most expensive character of printing.

Then there are reports of the Bureau of Education, the reports of the Signal Service, tabulated reports expensive for type-setting and printing, and the reports of the National Board of Health as well.

In addition we have the expensive publication of the results of the United States Geological Survey and the reports of the United States Fish Commission. At this particular time the United States Fish Commission has sent to Congress a special report on food-fishes, covering some 2,400 quarto pages, to be printed in three volumes. The attention of members will be called to this report in their morning mail, because we must call it up at an early day for consideration and action.

We have besides all these the reports of the marine hospitals, of the Smithsonian Institution, and of the several Executive Departments, more voluminous and expensive than members generally are aware of.

I see my time is about to expire.

Mr. RANDALL. I will take the floor and yield my time to the gentleman from Illinois. At the proper time I should like to ask the gentleman a question.

Mr. SPRINGER. Certainly.

Mr. ROBINSON, of Massachusetts. I hope the gentleman will be allowed to proceed, as the information he is giving us is extremely valuable.

Mr. SPRINGER. We have the reports of the Executive Departments to print, and these are much more expensive than gentlemen have any idea of. Their publication is provided for under general orders, and does not come under the supervision of the Committee on Printing. There are 25,000 volumes printed for the use of Congress of the Abridgment of the Executive Documents, a publication beyond the needs of the country. It ought to be cut down, four-fifths or nine-tenths; and I have introduced a bill for that purpose.

We have also the consular reports from the State Department, which contain valuable information.

We have various scientific publications coming from the Departments recommended by the Secretary of the Interior and others.

More scientific publications have been ordered by this Government than any other government in the world has ever attempted. These publications, by the increase of our population and the growing interest manifested by our people, have grown from time to time until they are getting so expensive Congress must adopt some other and more economical method of publication. England has taken hold of the subject and provided a system of publication of scientific works to be sold a little above cost to persons desiring them and thus makes its establishment self-sustaining. Until we can begin that system in this country we must expect these large appropriations.

I yield now to the gentleman from Pennsylvania to ask me a question.

Mr. RANDALL. I merely want to ask the gentleman from Illinois if he can inform the committee how many distinct printing establishments supported by this Government are now ramified around this town in the various Departments?

Mr. SPRINGER. I am very glad the gentleman from Pennsylvania has called my attention to this point, for I had desired to invite the attention of the committee to the fact that nearly every one of the Departments of the Government maintains a separate printing office down in its basement, with a separate establishment connected with it for the purpose of running their little printing offices to get out blanks and other matters connected with the particular Department where it is located. I believe this is the case in almost every one of the Departments if not in all of them. It is entirely wrong, and all of these separate establishments should be abolished, with the exception of the Bureau of Engraving and Printing, where the United States bonds and notes are engraved and printed; but all of these others, requiring machinery, a separate corps of officials to manage them, foremen and others, ought to be wiped out altogether; and when we come, in the consideration of this bill, to those provisions of the bill which allow these, if they exist in the pending bill, I shall move to strike them out, and that all of them be consolidated in the Public Printing Office.

Now I ask gentlemen to consider this subject of public printing, and at some future time I hope the Joint Committee on Printing of the House and Senate will report some permanent system for publishing all such matters as the Government may desire to have published from year to year.

There is at present no system whatever about this thing, either with reference to the number of volumes required to be printed, or in the manner of distributing the volumes after they are printed. There is an entire want of system and harmony which certainly needs correction. Let me call the attention of this committee to a fact which I doubt not will surprise many gentlemen present, that although we have been publishing the reports of the Hayden and Wheeler surveys for many years, and have published at a great expense of money valuable reports upon the geological resources of the country obtained from these surveys, there is only one complete set of these reports in the possession of the Government at this time, and that will be found at the Interior Department, which has recently purchased it from a second-hand book store for a large sum of money. There was no law at the time of the publication of this work which directed the deposit of it, or of copies of works published generally by the Government, in the public libraries; and the Congressional Library, with all of its resources, cannot at this time furnish a complete set of Government publications.

Mr. RANDALL. Will the gentleman permit me to ask him what does the Agricultural Report cost to print?

Mr. SPRINGER. About $300,000.

Mr. RANDALL. I mean per volume.

Mr. SPRINGER. About sixty-five cents.

Mr. RANDALL. Then, further, I wish to ask does not the gentleman know that you can buy as many of these volumes as you want at second-hand book stores at ten cents a volume?

Mr. SPRINGER. I believe they are sold in the second-hand book stores at very low rates.

Mr. HISCOCK. I desire to ask in this connection a question in justice to the Public Printer——

Mr. RANDALL. I am not attempting to criticise the Public Printer or charge him with this abuse.

Mr. HISCOCK. But I desire to put in a question here which I hope the gentleman from Pennsylvania or the gentleman from Illinois will answer, and give the committee the information as to how these publications get upon the market?

Mr. RANDALL. I am not able to answer the gentleman.

Mr. SPRINGER. I do not know.

Mr. HISCOCK. Will the gentleman from Pennsylvania or the gentleman from Illinois state what they believe to be the facts?

Mr. RANDALL. I believe they can be bought for ten cents a volume.

Mr. ROBINSON, of Massachusetts. By whom are they sold to the dealers?

Mr. RANDALL. I do not know.

Mr. HISCOCK. But the point I want to get at is, how do gentlemen account for the fact that these books are upon the market; and also whether there is any ground for the story that comes around so frequently that members of the House, who receive them under the law, sell them themselves to the dealers?

Mr. RANDALL. I make no such charge.

Mr. HISCOCK. Well, is there any other way that they can get upon the market?

Mr. RANDALL. I do not know how they get upon the market, and I do not propose to say anything that I do not know. I merely state the facts as they exist.

Mr. ROBINSON, of Massachusetts. But this statement ought not to be allowed to go out without some explanation, as it would seem to be a reflection upon the Public Printer.

Mr. HISCOCK. I can say this, that I have investigated that matter thoroughly, and am satisfied that these volumes do not get upon the market through the agency of the Public Printer.

Mr. RANDALL. I have not said so.

Mr. HISCOCK. I repeat that I have investigated and believe they do not get upon the market through the Public Printer.

Mr. RANDALL. I have not said they did.

Mr. HISCOCK. And, therefore, the only way they can get there is by members of the House or Senate selling their quotas.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. SPRINGER. I withdraw the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

For printing and binding for Congress, including the proceedings and debates, $1,304,650; for the State Department, $15,000; for the Treasury Department, $250,000; for the War Department, $166,000, (of which sum $10,000 shall be for the catalogue of the library of the Surgeon-General's Office;) for the Navy Department, $60,000; for the Interior Department, $364,000, (of which sum $10,000 is appropriated for rebinding tract-books for the General Land Office;) for the Department of Justice, $10,000; for the Post-Office Department, $150,000; for the Agricultural Department, $15,000; for the Supreme Court of the United States, $34,000; for the supreme court of the District of Columbia, $1,000; for the government of the District of Columbia, $11,350; for the Court of Claims, $10,000, and for the Library of Congress $19,000. And no more than an allotment of one-half of the $2,409,000 hereby appropriated shall be expended in the two first quarters of the fiscal year, and no more than one-fourth thereof may be expended in either of the two last quarters of the fiscal year, except that, in addition thereto, in either of said last quarters, the unexpended balances of allotments for preceding quarters may be expended: Provided, That printing and binding, or either, shall not be done at the Government Printing Office for Senators and Representatives or Delegates in Congress except upon the payment by them of the estimated cost thereof.

Mr. SPRINGER. I move to strike out the last word here for the purpose of asking the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations a question in regard to the printing establishments maintained in the different Departments. Do the various items which are mentioned here for printing in this bill cover the cost of maintaining these separate printing establishments?

Mr. HISCOCK. No; it has nothing to do with it.

Mr. SPRINGER. Where is that provided for?

Mr. HISCOCK. In the legislative appropriation bill.

Mr. SPRINGER. I withdraw the amendment.

Mr. DINGLEY. I renew the pro forma amendment for the purpose of asking the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations to explain the meaning of the proviso. I thought it was the law now that there should be no printing or binding done at the Government Printing Office for any member except on the payment of the cost thereof.

Mr. HISCOCK. I ask my colleague on the committee, the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. CANNON,] to give the explanation.

Mr. CANNON. At the request of the gentleman from New York I will try to answer the question of the gentleman from Maine. I understand the facts to be these: for such printing as individual members may require at the Government Printing Office, speeches and matters of that kind, we pay the cost thereof. Then every member and Senator is entitled to a calf-bound set of documents by general provision of law, covering all the documents of the Congress of which he may be a member. In addition to that, strange to say, the practice has grown up, and the accounting officers have passed the accounts, that in pursuance of a mere resolution of the Senate any individual Senator can have any number of copies of any public documents from the foundation of the Government to the present time, bound in any conceivable style of binding without limit; and under that resolution the money appropriated is held for payment.

We passed a resolution in the House early in this session giving the same privileges to the members of the House. Some binding was done under that, but upon the motion of the gentleman from Tennessee that resolution was changed. Last year, as I recollect, there was about $7,000 worth of this extra binding done for individual Senators. The committee thought that that thing ought either to be cut up by the roots or regulated by law as to amount, and if it continues that it should extend to Members as well as Senators. We have therefore put in the provision to which the gentleman from Maine refers.

Mr. DINGLEY. I am glad to hear this explanation, and I am glad this proviso has been introduced into the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. If there be no objection the formal amendment will be considered to be withdrawn, and the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read the following paragraph:

United States courts:

For expenses of the United States courts: For defraying the expenses of the Supreme Court; the circuit and district courts of the United States, including the District of Columbia; of the jurors and witnesses, and expenses of suits in which the United States is interested; of the prosecution for offenses committed against the United States; for the safe-keeping of prisoners; for defraying the expenses which may be incurred in the enforcement of the act approved February 28, 1871, entitled "An act to amend an act approved May 30, 1870, entitled 'An act to enforce the rights of citizens of the United States to vote in the several States of the Union, and for other purposes,'" or any acts amendatory thereof or supplementary thereto, namely, those stated in the following itemized list:

For payment of district attorneys and their assistants, $325,000.
For fees of clerks, $160,000.
For fees of United States commissioners $130,000.
For fees of jurors, $450,000.
For fees of witnesses, $600,000.
For support of United States prisoners, $325,000.
For rent of United States court-rooms, $70,000.
For fees and expenses of marshals, $600,000.
For fees and expenses of bailiffs; furniture; for payment of expenses of district judges who may be sent out of their districts, in pursuance of law, to hold a circuit or district court; and other miscellaneous expenses, $325,000.

Mr. McLANE. I offer the amendment which I send to the desk, to come in after line 1975.

The Clerk read as follows:

For supervisors of election in the city of Baltimore, for fifty days, in the year 1882, at $5 per day, $30,000, said payments to be made on accounts audited and approved by the Attorney-General of the United States, for services required by section 2016 of the Revised Statutes of the United States.

Mr. CASWELL. I make the point of order on the amendment.

Mr. McLANE. I ask the gentleman to allow me to make an explanation.

Mr. CASWELL. Reserving the point of order, I will hear the gentleman.

Mr. McLANE. I ask the attention of the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations for a moment. The Revised Statutes, first of all, in section 2016, provide absolutely for the attendance of supervisors at any registration where voters at a Congressional election are registered. Further on, in section 2031, the pay for these supervisors is provided.

In that section 2031, where the pay is provided, the statute evidently contemplates only the attendance at the election, for it provides for ten days' service, and for the ten days' service fixes a compensation of $5 per day. It permits, therefore, only the payment of $50 to a supervisor.

Now, in the ordinary course of this service the ten days are sufficient. But where a State should require a special registration, then the supervisors are obliged to attend as often as the registers of the State attend. And that is not provided for in section 2031. That section fixes the compensation, but section 2016 requires absolutely the attendance of the supervisor, no matter how long the State register may take for his registration. For this year, 1882, the supervisor appointed by the United States court and instructed in pursuance of 2016 will have attended fifty days, counting the attendance at the election. For that there is no provision. For ten days' service there is a provision of existing law, section 2031. Under that section $50 for ten days' service will be paid out of the Treasury in pursuance of existing law. But for the remaining forty days no payment will be made at all. Yet the law requires the service.

I submit to the honorable chairman of the Committee on Appropriations that if the existing law provides the service, requires the attention of the supervisor for the whole fifty or forty days, as the case may be, then it is quite in order on this bill to provide pay for those forty days.

I do not think the point of order lies at all. I admit there is no existing law to pay for more than ten days. But there is a law requiring service for forty days additional, and in virtue of the law which requires forty days' service over and above the service for which that $50 is paid it is entirely competent; indeed, I think it is the duty of this House in this bill to provide compensation for those forty days. My amendment requires that the account shall be audited and approved by the Attorney-General. Of course, no payment will be made except for a legal service. Indeed, the amendment stipulates that the amount shall be for service required by law, referring to that particular section, section 2016.

Mr. CASWELL. I concede that section 2016 requires the attendance of the supervisor. But the difficulty arises from section 2031, which provides that the supervisor performing duties under the preceding section shall receive for his compensation at the rate of $5 per day for not exceeding ten days.

Mr. McLANE. That is what that statute contemplates.

Mr. CASWELL. Here is an express prohibition of the payment for more than ten days. When the supervisor entered upon the duties of his office he did so with the expectation and understanding that he would receive the compensation provided by law, and no greater.

Now, there is no provision of law which authorizes the Committee on Appropriations to place upon an appropriation bill an appropriation for the payment of any sum in excess of the fifty-dollar limitation in the statute. For that reason it seems to me that the point of order is perfectly good. I will read the section of the statute if it is deemed necessary.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair has the law before him which has been quoted. If the gentleman desires to refer to any special clause the Chair will hear him.

Mr. McLANE. On the point of order I desire to submit this fact: section 2031 of the Revised Statutes very clearly contemplates only ten days' service. I made that statement when I offered the amendment. That section provides that $50 and no more than that sum shall be paid for that ten days' service. But the point I make, and I ask special attention to it, is that although section 2031 provides for the payment of only $50 for ten days' service, it is not at all an express prohibition against paying for forty days' service if forty days' service is rendered. I admit that it is an implied prohibition, but it is not an express prohibition.

Mr. CASWELL. Let me inquire why there should be a limitation at all placed on the amount to be paid unless it was in anticipation that there might be an excess of service?

Mr. McLANE. The answer to that is very simple. There was of course a desire to prevent abuse in the administration of the law. The committee will remember that these supervisors are supervisors at Congressional elections; they were appointed expressly to supervise Congressional elections. It was considered that ten days was ample to enable them to supervise a Congressional election. And so it is. Neither in Maryland nor in any other State of the Union would more than ten days be necessary for the supervision of a Congressional election.

Mr. CANNON. Will the gentleman allow me——

Mr. McLANE. Directly. But the committee must remember that another section, not section 2031 but section 2016, requires the attendance of the supervisor at any registration where the voters registered are to vote at a Congressional election.

Therefore, when a State comes to make registration in cities of over twenty thousand inhabitants, the United States supervisor is required by law to attend that registration. The provision to pay him for the ten days' service, which was deemed altogether sufficient to pay him for supervising a Congressional election, does not pay him at all for his forty days' service at the registration.

Now, I submit to the equity if not to the good sense of Congress, that when you have by law required a hundred days' service, it would be absurd to give a compensation which would be equivalent to only fifty cents a day.

Remember that this duty, and that is a point to which I ask especial attention, was supposed to be worth $5 a day. In other words, it was supposed that the class of men which you ought to have for supervisors was a class of men to whom you ought to pay $5 a day. And you provide for that, because you contemplated that only ten days' service should be rendered, and you provide for paying $50 for that ten days' service.

Now, the fact is that in this case fifty days' service is rendered. All I ask Congress to do is to provide for the payment for the days over and above the ten days provided for in section 2031. Let the ten days' service be paid for under section 2031, but let the extra service required by section 2016 be paid for by a special appropriation.

I think this amendment is perfectly in order. It appeals to the equity of the House. Common sense and common justice require that you should pay these men for the services they have rendered at exactly the same rate that you pay them for the ten days' service.

Mr. CANNON and Mr. URNER rose.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] desire to be heard upon the point of order?

Mr. CANNON. I believe the point of order is well taken. I do not desire to take up time in discussing a matter about which the Chair has made up its mind.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is willing to hear what the gentleman may desire to say. If he does not desire to speak, the Chair will recognize the gentleman from Maryland, [Mr. URNER.]

Mr. CANNON. I do not desire to say anything upon the point of order unless the Chair is in the condition which a court ordinarily is, ready to hear the other side.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair does not desire to make his decision until gentlemen shall have said what they desire to say.

Mr. CANNON. I will state this: the law makes a permanent appropriation for the payment of these supervisors, and the rates of payment of the supervisors under that law are fixed by the law. If they are entitled to the pay which the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. McLANE] says, all they have to do is to go to the Court of Claims, or go to the accounting officers of the Treasury. The money is there; and a permanent appropriation is made for supervisors under the law. It strikes me that the bare reading of this section will determine the whole thing:

> And there shall be allowed and paid to each supervisor of election, and each special deputy marshal who is appointed and performs his duty under the preceding provisions—

What are the preceding provisions? All the provisions contained in the chapter—> compensation at the rate of $5 per day for each day he is actually on duty, not exceeding ten days.

An express limitation, confining it to ten days.

Mr. McLANE. But you have another section requiring these supervisors to serve one hundred days if necessary.

Mr. CANNON, (reading)— > but no compensation shall be allowed in any case to supervisors of election, except to those appointed in cities and towns of twenty thousand or more inhabitants.

That is a limitation upon their compensation. The gentleman from Maryland [Mr. McLANE] says that there is another section which may require them to perform services for fifty days.

Not at all. This compensation refers to all services required by every provision referred to, that is, the whole chapter. The bare fact that the gentleman is here asking a specific appropriation upon this bill answers him entirely. I again call the attention of the Chair to the fact that there is a permanent continuing appropriation to pay supervisors of election, not special deputies. If the Government owes these men anything the appropriation is already made. Let them go to the accounting officers or to the Court of Claims.

Mr. URNER. It is not my purpose to take up the time of the committee to a great extent in the discussion of this point of order. The amendment offered by my colleague [Mr. McLANE] proposes to pay the supervisors of election in the city of Baltimore during the time that they are required under the law to perform their duties. This point of order I presume is raised under clause 3 of Rule XXI, which provides that—

> No appropriation shall be reported in any general appropriation bill, or be in order as an amendment thereto, for any expenditure not previously authorized by law, unless in continuation of appropriations for such public works and objects as are already in progress. Nor shall any provision in any such bill or amendment thereto changing existing law be in order, except such as, being germane to the subject-matter of the bill, shall retrench expenditures, &c.

Now, I suppose it is not contended that this amendment changes existing law. The law upon the subject is found in sections 2016 and 2030 of the Revised Statutes. Section 2016 requires the supervisors of election to attend at every registration of voters if the voters when registered are to vote for Members of Congress or Delegates from the Territories. Section 2030 provides that supervisors of registration shall for their services receive $5 a day for not exceeding ten days. Now it is evident that the limitation of ten days was inserted because it was supposed this time would be sufficient for the purpose of registering any new voters who, within the course of a year, might have attained their majority or acquired a residence within the voting district; and the correction of these lists does not ordinarily require more than ten days. But in this case, under a recent act of the Legislature of Maryland, a new registration of voters is required. The old registration is to be wiped out entirely. Under the law the registering officers in the city of Baltimore are required to sit more than forty days. Under section 2016 the supervisors of registration are required to be present every day during the registration and to perform their duties. The law says that this service is worth $5 a day.

Now, an appropriation has been made—an appropriation which is ordinarily sufficient—which was expected to be sufficient at the time it was made; but it is now found to be insufficient in this particular case, and it is necessary to make an additional appropriation in continuation of that object. Congress has very wisely adopted a policy of requiring some national supervision where voters are registered to vote for members of the national Legislature. Therefore the supervisors of election are appointed to superintend this registration. The language of the rule is:

No appropriation shall be reported in any general appropriation bill, or be in order as an amendment thereto, for any expenditure not previously authorized by law—

This is authorized by law—

unless in continuation of appropriation for such public works and objects as are already in progress.

The policy has been adopted; the work is in progress; the money at the disposal of the Government is not sufficient to make payment to these officers; an additional appropriation is required, and under the third paragraph of Rule XXI, I contend it is perfectly competent and entirely in order for this Committee of the Whole to adopt this amendment, making such appropriation as may be necessary to pay these officers for the performance of their duty imposed by act of Congress.

The CHAIRMAN. In the decision of this point of order it is necessary to refer to only three sections of the Revised Statutes. Sections 2016 and 2017 refer to the duties of supervisors of registration at elections, and section 2031 provides the scale of fees—a per diem compensation—for their services, which is fixed at $5 and limited to the period of ten days. In the opinion of the Chair, a change in a State law rendering necessary an increased compensation in point of time can hardly justify an amendment which changes the existing limitation in an act of Congress, and therefore changes the compensation provided by existing law.

The amendment is understood by the Chair to apply to a coming election, although it does not state whether the election is past or coming.

Mr. McLANE. A coming election is always contemplated.

The CHAIRMAN. The language of the amendment might cover some election that had already taken place in the year 1882.

Mr. McLANE. It refers to a coming election.

The CHAIRMAN. The amendment proposes to extend this compensation in the present case to fifty days. The Chair was somewhat in doubt in view of the fact that this is a duty authorized and required by law; but the only solution he can give is that it is the same duty the compensation for which is provided under existing law, that compensation being limited to ten days. The amendment proposes to enlarge the limit, and therefore the Chair thinks is not admissible under the rule. An amendment of the law must be made by some separate provision. The Chair sustains the point of order.

The Clerk read as follows:

To supply district judges, district attorneys, and clerks of the United States courts who have not already received the same with the Revised Statutes of the United States, a sufficient sum of money is hereby appropriated; and the Attorney-General is hereby authorized, should it be necessary, to cause the reports of the Supreme Court of the United States upon which the copyright has expired to be republished, and cause the same to be annotated under the act of March 3, 1881.

Mr. NEAL. I rise to offer an amendment.

Mr. HOLMAN. I rise to make a point of order on the paragraph.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair entertains the point of order.

Mr. HOLMAN. My point applies to that portion of the paragraph after the word "appropriated," in line 1985, the language being as follows:

And the Attorney-General is hereby authorized, should it be necessary, to cause the reports of the Supreme Court of the United States upon which the copyright has expired to be republished, and cause the same to be annotated under the act of March 3, 1881.

I have not looked at that subject, but I take it for granted that act does not authorize the republication of any volumes of the decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States. If, then, there is no law authorizing the republication of the decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States, I submit that it is subject to the point of order.

Mr. HISCOCK. The fact is, Mr. Chairman, that law does authorize it. It does not authorize in terms, to be sure, the republication, but it directs the Attorney-General to furnish the courts with these volumes of the decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States, and it becomes necessary in furnishing them to reprint them or to buy them in the market.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. Does it contemplate they shall be printed by the Public Printer, or done by some private publisher?

Mr. HISCOCK. It does not contemplate any such thing.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. Does it contemplate they shall be printed by the Public Printer?

Mr. HISCOCK. It does not.

Mr. HOLMAN. I concede, Mr. Chairman, that if there is a law directing the Attorney-General to furnish these volumes to the Federal judiciary, under that provision Congress might make the appropriation and direct the manner in which it shall be done. I withdraw the point of order; but I wish to call the attention of the gentleman from New York to the fact that this is an entirely unnecessary expense. This work need not be published by the Attorney-General at the Government Printing Office. There is no scarcity of volumes of the decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States. Every volume can easily be procured.

Mr. HISCOCK. The gentleman asks an explanation and I will give it to him. In the sundry civil appropriation bill last year there was included the following:

To supply district judges and district attorneys, who have not already received the same, with the reports of the Supreme Court and Statutes at Large of the United States, and also to furnish complete sets of the same, where there are none, to such points where United States courts are authorized to be held and to supply broken sets where there are missing volumes, a sufficient sum of money is hereby appropriated.

We found that law in that form exactly as I have read it. The Attorney-General comes to us and says it will be necessary to furnish certain volumes of the reports of the decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States, and that in order to do so some of them must be reprinted, and in so doing he suggests that he can vary the old print by placing annotations to the volumes reprinted.

Mr. HOLMAN. That would be the only possible object for reprinting these volumes; for, as I have already said, there is not a volume of the decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States which cannot be obtained in the open market and purchased at a low price in comparison with what the reprinting by the Government Printing Office will cost. It seems to me the importance of the syllabus of the decisions is not a matter of sufficient importance to justify such reprint.

The index to the volumes and the analysis of the decisions of the Supreme Court have been good and better than those of the supreme courts of several States. It will be seen we are authorizing the reprint of certain volumes of the decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States which are within the reach of every lawyer and can be found in every book store, simply for the purpose of making some additions to the annotations of the decisions. Now, can Congress afford to publish volumes of decisions for that purpose? I have not heard a word of complaint they cannot be had.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. To how many volumes does the copyright law apply?

Mr. HOLMAN. All publications. The reporter of the decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States has the benefit of the copyright.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. Upon what volumes has the copyright expired?

Mr. NEAL. I wish to offer an amendment.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. I move to strike out the whole section.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. NEAL. I move the following amendment:

Provided, That the reports so republished shall be printed at the Government Printing Office and sold at 10 per cent. above the cost of publication and printing.

Mr. HISCOCK. I make the point of order on that amendment that it is new legislation and does not reduce expenditures.

Mr. NEAL. I desire to be heard on that point of order.

Mr. SPRINGER. The whole thing is new legislation, and not in the interest of economy.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair thinks it is germane, when the text provides for republication, to amend as to the method of republication.

Mr. NEAL. I desire to be heard on the point of order. The point is made this does not reduce expenditure. Under existing law the contract made with the publisher of this book authorizes the sale of the current series of the Supreme Court Reports at $5 a volume. In the Forty-fifth Congress a bill was introduced looking to the publication of these reports by the Public Printer. Thereupon the reporter had the price reduced to $4 a volume——

Mr. HISCOCK. I hope the gentleman will confine himself to the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair has already overruled the point of order, as the gentleman would have heard if he had been listening, on the ground that the text orders a republication of these reports, and the amendment proposes to regulate that republication and provide how it shall be made.

Mr. NEAL. Then I wish to address myself to the merits of the amendment.

Mr. HOLMAN. Will the gentleman allow me a moment? The present law provides for exactly what his amendment covers; the printing has to be done, under the law——

Mr. NEAL. The gentleman can reply, if he chooses, in his own time. If the present law provides for it the amendment can do no hurt. But I desire to be heard without interruption.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman is entitled to be heard.

Mr. HISCOCK. I hope I may be allowed to appeal to the gentleman from Ohio to withdraw his amendment. This matter is not of great moment, and if the expense of the publication of the reports is to be considered at any time, or a change is contemplated in the manner of printing or sending them to the Public Printing Office, let that be launched against the law when the whole subject is up for consideration in proper form. I ask him to withdraw his amendment.

Mr. NEAL. Shall I be heard now?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman is entitled to the floor.

Mr. NEAL. I was going on to say that when a bill was introduced in the Forty-fifth Congress upon which the Judiciary Committee reported, the price was reduced to $4 a volume. Afterward, in the Forty-sixth Congress, the bill passed the House, and the price was reduced to $3 a volume. So there is beyond controversy the fact, which must be apparent, that the publishers and the reporter of the Supreme Court had been charging $2 a volume more than the work was worth, or more than it cost to print it. In other words, they had been levying contribution upon the legal profession of the United States to the extent of $2 a volume in excess of what was necessary for the expense of preparing the work.

Now, it is well known that the decisions of the Supreme Court are the supreme law of the land to the same extent that acts of Congress are; and they should be sold at a price that would place them within reach of every person who desired to know the law and the decisions of the court upon the law.

We distribute gratuitously 10,000 copies of the acts of Congress, but we compel every one who wishes to know what the decisions of the Supreme Court are to pay $3 a volume, after waiting for a year or two, to ascertain that. The Superintendent of Public Printing has reported upon the thirteenth volume of Otto exactly what they can be furnished for, and he says that the first edition of 2,000 copies can be furnished at about $1.50 a copy, or a little less than that, so that they can be sold to the profession and others who desire to know the decisions of the Supreme Court at $1.65 a volume, and that for the second edition of 1,000 copies, if necessary, they can be furnished in the same style of the first edition and for less than a dollar a volume.

Mr. BAYNE. And bound?

Mr. NEAL. Yes, sir; complete.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. At $1.50 a volume?

Mr. NEAL. No; the first edition would be $1.50 a volume, but the second can be furnished at a dollar a volume.

Mr. DINGLEY. That does not include the binding?

Mr. NEAL. Yes, sir; that is the report of the Public Printer. It will be found in the RECORD on the day that the legislative appropriation bill was passed, and upon that estimate the committee by unanimous consent adopted the section of that bill which requires the Supreme Court reports to be printed hereafter at the Government Printing Office, and sold at ten cents in advance of the cost of publication.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman's time has expired. The question is on the amendment of the gentleman from Illinois.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 51.

Before the negative vote was announced,

Mr. HISCOCK said: I desire to call the attention of the committee to this fact: that this work is in progress——

The CHAIRMAN. The committee is dividing. The ayes are 51 and the noes are 32. The amendment is agreed to.

Mr. HISCOCK. I will ask for tellers, and I desire to say to the committee that the work was ordered a year ago and contracts were made for it——

Several MEMBERS. Regular order.

Mr. CANNON. I rise to ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from New York may have an opportunity—— [Cries of "Regular order!"]

Mr. ATHERTON. I object.

The CHAIRMAN. Objection is made.

Mr. CANNON. I have not asked the unanimous consent yet. I am entitled, surely, to submit my request.

Mr. ATHERTON. Let us have the rule enforced.

Mr. CANNON. I am entitled to make my request, under the rule.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair understood the gentleman from Illinois wished to say something under unanimous consent. The Chair asked if unanimous consent was given, and objection was made.

Mr. CANNON. I asked to be permitted to submit a request for unanimous consent; but before I did so the objection was interposed.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state what he asks.

Mr. CANNON. I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from New York [Mr. HISCOCK] may state what the facts are about the contract for this work about which you are now determining.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

Mr. ATHERTON. I object.

The CHAIRMAN. A quorum not having voted, the Chair will order tellers.

Mr. ATHERTON. I withdraw my objection.

Mr. HISCOCK. I desire to state——

Mr. RANDALL. The gentleman is not in order to address the Chair when the committee is dividing.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair submitted a request that the gentleman from New York [Mr. HISCOCK] be permitted to make a statement. Objection was made by the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. ATHERTON,] but that objection was withdrawn.

Mr. RANDALL. I renew it.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair thinks the objection now comes too late.

Mr. HISCOCK. I desire to say that on the sundry civil bill of last year authority was given for commencing this work, and so far as the publication of these volumes is concerned, I understand the contracts have all been made for the Government through the Attorney-General.

Mr. MILLER. At what price?

Mr. HISCOCK. I do not know the price, but I know the contracts have been made.

Mr. BLOUNT. Will the gentleman from New York yield to me that I may make a statement?

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. BLOUNT] making a statement?

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. I insist that some one shall be permitted to reply.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair hears no objection to the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. BLOUNT] proceeding.

Mr. BLOUNT. I desire to make a statement of fact. During the last Congress, from various sections of the country, members were insisting that the courts were not supplied with reports of the Supreme Court. In the first session of that Congress we provided several sums of money for the several courts. The Senate refused to accede to these appropriations, saying that there ought to be a general provision. At the last session of that Congress a provision was placed on the sundry civil bill directing the Attorney-General to provide the courts all over the country where there were missing volumes with the missing volumes, and where there were no sets at all with complete sets, and appropriating such sum of money as was needed to meet the emergency.

Mr. SPRINGER. What necessity is there for an additional appropriation?

The CHAIRMAN. With the permission of the gentleman from Georgia the Chair will direct the Clerk to read the clause to which he has referred as part of the gentleman's remarks.

The Clerk read as follows:

To supply district judges and district attorneys, who have not already received the same, with the reports of the Supreme Court and Statutes at Large of the United States; and also to furnish complete sets of the same, where there are none, to such points where United States courts are authorized to be held, and to supply broken sets where there are missing volumes, a sufficient sum of money is hereby appropriated.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. I want to say a word or two in reply, after the gentleman from Georgia has concluded.

Mr. ROBESON. I wish to ask the gentleman from Georgia a question. If these contracts have not been entirely in pursuance of that law, and if this amendment is now passed, does it not simply mean a duplication of the fund?

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. I wish to ask the gentleman from Georgia a question.

Mr. BLOUNT. I wish to answer one at a time.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. That does not give any authority to make a contract for republishing.

Mr. BLOUNT. That law does not direct how this shall be done. It was intended to give to the Department of Justice the power to supply the courts with what everybody admitted they ought to have. There is no restriction on it. The Attorney-General has resorted to various sources of information to ascertain what was the cheapest mode of getting this done; and, as I understand from the Department, contracts have been made for the publication of the reports. They are not intended for individuals, they are not intended for sale, they are intended to go wherever a court is held, and the judges want them. This and nothing more.

Mr. BAYNE. Will the gentleman from Georgia allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. BLOUNT. Yes, sir.

Mr. BAYNE. How did the Attorney-General make contracts for these works before the money was appropriated?

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. And without any direct authority?

Mr. BLOUNT. The Clerk has read the law authorizing him to do it, and appropriating in terms such sum of money as may be necessary.

Mr. MILLER. Why should we pay $5 for a report that can be published for $2?

Mr. BLOUNT. I deny the gentleman has any information that such a contract has been made.

Mr. MILLER. I know the Pennsylvania reports are published for $2, and those of Ohio for less.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. TOWNSHEND] asks consent to say a few words on the other side. Is there objection? The Chair hears none.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, the act that has been read by the Clerk confers no authority on the Attorney-General to make contracts for the publication of the reports. The authority given in that language is simply that he shall procure such volumes of the reports as are needed in order to make complete sets for the district attorneys and the courts.

Mr. BLOUNT. Not for attorneys.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. The act does not confer any authority whatever upon him to publish or reprint these reports. If you were to authorize the Clerk of the House to procure for the use of Congress copies of books that have been published, would he have authority under that order to make contracts for the publication of the work? Not at all.

If the bill of last Congress authorized the reprinting or publication of the reports out of print, as is contended by the gentleman from New York, [Mr. HISCOCK,] why do you by this provision again confer such authority upon the Attorney-General?

It is clear to me that the act simply authorizes him, as it would authorize any other agent of the Government, to procure the volumes by purchase, in order to make complete sets of these reports for the judges and district attorneys.

Mr. HOLMAN. I wish to make an inquiry. Suppose that this action of the last Congress authorized the reprinting of certain volumes; in that event did not this section of the Revised Statutes apply?

The printing, binding, and blank books for the Senate and House of Representatives, and the executive and judicial departments, shall be done at the Government Printing Office, except in cases otherwise provided by law.

With that provision of law in force, even if there had been authority given to the Attorney-General to supply these works, would it have been authority for him to make contracts for publishing these volumes?

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. It is probable that the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] is correct. But I say that under the original act the Attorney-General has no authority to make a contract which will bind the Government for the republication of perhaps fifty volumes of the reports of the Supreme Court. There are now about a hundred volumes of those reports; I do not remember the exact number.

Mr. HARRIS, of Massachusetts. Over a hundred volumes.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. Over a hundred volumes. I insist that under the clause of the bill of the last session, which has been read by the gentleman from New York, the Attorney-General has no authority to make a contract with private publishing-houses binding the Government so as to impose upon it enormous expenditures in order to supply district judges and district attorneys with these reports.

And should they be supplied with them, what disposition would be made of them? The attorneys receiving them would very probably keep them in their libraries, and when their term of office expires there would be very few instances, if any, where they would be turned over to their successors. And then when the successors are appointed they would come clamoring for complete sets of these reports, and the Attorney-General would buy them a hundred volumes or more in order to furnish sets to the new attorneys under the terms of this bill, and so it will go on about every four years, or as often as the change in appointments of attorneys may occur.

Now, I am satisfied that the Attorney-General had no authority to make this contract, and if he has it is time for us to strike out the whole paragraph and put a stop at once to this expensive undertaking.

Mr. NEAL. I ask unanimous consent to modify my amendment by adding to it the words "but any contract now existing shall not be affected by this provision."

The CHAIRMAN. If there is no objection the modification of the amendment will be made. [After a pause.] The Chair hears no objection.

Mr. SPRINGER. This amendment having been modified, it presents another question. I move to strike out the last word.

Mr. HISCOCK. I will withdraw my call for a further count.

Mr. SPRINGER. I move to strike out the last word, and desire to call the attention of the committee to the language of the statute which has been read from the Clerk's desk.

Mr. HISCOCK. I suppose that when unanimous consent has been given for a modification of the amendment of the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. NEAL,] and I withdraw my call for a further count, the amendment as modified stands adopted in the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will ask consent of the committee to that understanding. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none, and the amendment as modified is adopted.

Mr. SPRINGER. This amendment having been adopted——

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. If the gentleman desires to speak on a substantial amendment, I will move to strike out the whole paragraph, and will take the floor when he gets through.

Mr. SPRINGER. I desire to call the attention of the committee to the language of the statute passed at the last session. It is perfectly harmless. It was merely to provide for the expense of transmitting by express or otherwise these volumes from the place where they might be stored to the parties entitled to receive them. It is this:

To supply district judges and district attorneys, who have not already received the same, with the reports of the Supreme Court and Statutes at Large of the United States, and also to furnish complete sets of the same, where there are none, to such points where United States courts are authorized to be held and to supply broken sets where there are missing volumes, a sufficient sum of money is hereby appropriated.

Now, take that language in connection with the language of the pending bill, and it will be seen that the pending bill recognizes the fact that there was no authority to print one volume of these reports. What is the language of the pending bill?

And the Attorney-General is hereby authorized, should it be necessary, to cause the reports of the Supreme Court of the United States upon which the copyright has expired to be republished, and cause the same to be annotated under the act of March 3, 1881.

That is the act from which I have just read. Here, then, is authority enlarging the act of March 3, 1881.

Mr. HOLMAN. And that is the object of this clause in the pending bill.

Mr. SPRINGER. Yes, the object of the clause is to enlarge the authority of the act of March 3, 1881, so as to authorize the republication of these reports. And gentlemen on the other side say that the Attorney-General has made a contract for this republication. If so, then it has been done in violation of law. I want to know where that contract is, and with whom the Attorney-General has made it. It is illegal and void, and the law officer of the Government ought to know better than to make a contract right in the face of the statute, and then ask us here to ratify his action by the apparently harmless clause which is in this appropriation bill.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, I have moved to strike out the whole of the pending paragraph. I make this motion for the purpose of getting rid of this whole question. The provision of this paragraph simply gives authority to the Attorney-General to have many volumes of these reports republished without regard to the amount that it may cost, and to furnish complete sets of them, consisting of over one hundred volumes, to every district attorney and every district judge and clerk of the Federal courts in the United States. What will be the cost of this? You cannot estimate it. You have no data upon which it can be estimated. You put no restrictions upon the expenditure, but give the Attorney-General liberty to enter into a contract to reprint them with anybody at any price that he may deem proper.

These volumes when distributed will, in many instances, be considered as a perquisite of the district attorney; and when he retires from office he will regard them as a part of his private library. The new appointee will come up and demand a complete set, and the Attorney-General, under this provision, will have it in his power at any time in the future when the supply is exhausted to make another contract for republishing them. No restriction whatever is put upon him. In my judgment, the Committee of the Whole should strike out this whole paragraph and prevent the abuse which is likely to grow up under, and the enormous expenditure which will result from, its adoption.

The question being taken on the motion of Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois, it was not agreed to.

Mr. SPRINGER. I move to amend by striking out all of the paragraph beginning with the words in line 1995, "and the Attorney-General is hereby authorized," and extending to the end of the paragraph.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman include the proviso in his motion to strike out?

Mr. SPRINGER. Yes, sir.

Mr. ROBESON. The gentleman will permit me to ask him a question. Does he not perceive that this is a provision only for supplying those volumes of the reports which are now out of print? Does the gentleman wish the Attorney-General to go round and buy those at $25 or $50 a volume rather than have the volumes reprinted?

Mr. SPRINGER. I wish nothing of the kind.

Mr. HOLMAN. They can be had at $2.50 a volume.

Mr. ROBESON. These volumes of which the editions are exhausted, and which are out of print, are very expensive.

Mr. HOLMAN. Not when the copyright has expired.

Mr. SPRINGER. The language which I propose to strike out is in these words:

And the Attorney-General is hereby authorized, should it be necessary, to cause the reports of the Supreme Court of the United States upon which the copyright has expired to be republished, and cause the same to be annotated under the act of March 3, 1881.

How many volumes of these reports upon which the copyright has expired are there? Will any gentleman tell me? And how much will it cost to reprint this vast number of books and furnish them to these district attorneys and judges? Here is an unlimited appropriation. I challenge any gentleman on the other side to give me this information.

Mr. CANNON. Will the gentleman yield to me a moment?

Mr. SPRINGER. I will if the gentleman will give me the information I have asked for.

Mr. CANNON. Under the decision of the Supreme Court, there is no copyright in the decisions, but in the head-notes. Besides there is already under the act of the last Congress an unlimited appropriation—controlled somewhat, but an unlimited appropriation.

Mr. SPRINGER. No, sir.

Mr. CANNON. Yes, sir.

Mr. SPRINGER. Now, the gentleman has not answered my question. I challenge the Appropriations Committee or any gentleman on the other side of the House or on this side to tell me how many volumes are authorized to be published by this provision. Nobody can tell me. Nobody knows.

Mr. CANNON. I will tell the gentleman. Just that number——

Mr. SPRINGER. That is not the information I want.

Mr. CANNON. It is the information you want. Just that number that the Attorney-General can republish at less cost than by buying them in the open market.

Mr. SPRINGER. Now, if the gentleman has any information I shall be glad to hear it; but these general statements I do not want. They do not throw any light upon this subject. I have asked the question, and nobody can answer it, how many volumes are to be republished under this provision and how much will be the cost?

I call attention to the further fact that under the law as it stands there is no authority whatever on the part of the Attorney-General to make a contract or to print a volume. He is only authorized to use such volumes as the Government already has on hand, and send them to the parties designated. He has no authority under the existing law, as the gentleman from New Jersey intimated he has, to go into the book-stores and buy these volumes—nothing of the kind. All that he can do is to send to these judges such volumes as the Government has.

Mr. BLOUNT. I rise for the purpose of opposing this amendment. The gentleman from Illinois says that no man can tell what amount will be needed. That is true, and why? Who can tell what is needed at a certain court in Georgia, Mississippi, or Illinois? There is no way of ascertaining it. The law is being observed by the Attorney-General. He is directing the judges and district attorneys to make out official statements for his information. That statement, I believe, has been made very generally. I cannot say it is complete. It seems to me it should be satisfactory. I do not know how we are to make it any more so, unless we investigate in each case the action of these officials. As far as I am concerned, and I think it is so with other gentlemen of the House, I will ask for no other information than that given by the Attorney-General.

I am quite sure in my own State and in the State of Tennessee, and I speak on information from the gentleman from Tennessee, [Mr. ATKINS,] and in the State of Kentucky, and I speak on information from the honorable gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. BLACKBURN,] and from various other sources all over the House, there is great necessity for action in this matter. I speak on information from the judges of the Supreme Court, that there has been great embarrassment because of the lack of these books. Recognizing this fact, and ignoring whatever legislation has been in existence before, a provision was put into the sundry civil appropriation bill in the last Congress, not appropriating money for the purpose of having these books reprinted, but appropriating money, leaving it to the Attorney-General to provide these reports in his discretion by contract or by purchase in the market. That is the fair inference. It gives him a sum of money to provide these books, and that is all there is of it.

The gentleman has read the statute providing that it shall be done at the Government Printing Office. I recognize the statute, but it does not apply here.

Mr. HOLMAN. Why not?

Mr. BLOUNT. I ask the gentleman not to interrupt me. This sundry civil appropriation directed the Attorney-General, and not in a qualified way, to provide the books designated, and such sum of money as was necessary to do that thing was thereby appropriated. They did not intend to limit him and it was not so intended in this House. I trust gentlemen on either side of the House will appreciate the necessity there is for relieving the courts of their present embarrassment because of the lack of these books. I am as careful, I trust, as other gentlemen on the floor about appropriations, but when it comes to embarrassing the courts all over the land because of the lack of reports in connection with the administration of justice for the American people, I say we ought not to stand here on a question of dollars and cents. [Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. I desire to offer an amendment to the amendment. I offer it as a compromise with the committee, and I hope it will be acceptable. I move to strike out the words "district attorney," in the first line. Now, Mr. Chairman, I desire the attention of the Committee on Appropriations for a few moments as I think we can reach a compromise on this question.

The original act provides that these books shall be furnished to district attorneys as well as to judges and clerks of the courts. I admit there is great force in the claim that the courts should have complete sets of these reports, but there is no force whatever in requiring sets of these reports shall be furnished to the district attorneys. If, however, the committee will consent to limit the appropriation so as to provide that the reports furnished district attorneys shall be turned over to their successors, it will be better than leaving the bill as it now stands.

Mr. ATHERTON. Does the gentleman understand this provision for district attorneys gives the individual who occupies the office these books, and that they are not to be transmitted to their successors in office?

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. It would very probably be so construed by the district attorney.

Mr. BLOUNT. The regulations of the Department of Justice require that they shall be turned over to their successors.

Mr. ATHERTON. Let the language be changed so that they shall go to the district attorney in his official capacity.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. I know how it was in reference to State reports in Illinois and some other States, where the State attorneys have been furnished with reports. Of course the understanding was the attorneys should turn them over to their successors, but there were few, if any, instances where that was done.

Mr. ATHERTON. They were district attorneys in Illinois, but in Ohio they would have promptly turned them over to their successor. [Laughter.]

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. Is the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. ATKINS] willing that modification shall be made?

Mr. SPRINGER. I withdraw my amendment, and renew it for the purpose of making an additional statement in regard to the number of volumes to be reprinted under this order. I understand they are printed up to volume 103 of the United States reports, which is 13 Otto, and that leaves ninety volumes before Otto began. Those are the volumes upon which the copyright has expired. This order, then, is to print ninety volumes of a book like that, and it is left to the Attorney-General to provide them. Can gentlemen tell me how much that is going to cost? When they do that we will have some information upon which we can act intelligently.

Mr. ATHERTON. Will the gentleman let me ask him a question?

Mr. SPRINGER. Certainly.

Mr. ATHERTON. How much do they cost now?

Mr. SPRINGER. I cannot tell, but I know that the least expense for the printing of each volume will be $1.50.

Mr. ATHERTON. Well, if they now cost $3 or $4, and they can be reproduced at $1.50, which is best for the profession throughout the country—to pay $1.50, or $3 or $4 a volume?

Mr. SPRINGER. But this involves another proposition; that is, the printing of some ninety volumes of these reports similar to the one I hold in my hand, at an expense which no gentleman can now estimate. It may extend up to an immense amount.

The CHAIRMAN. Debate is exhausted. The question is on the amendment of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SPRINGER] to strike out that portion of the paragraph indicated, beginning with line 1985.

The committee divided, and there were—ayes 18, noes 51.

Mr. SPRINGER. No quorum having voted, I demand tellers.

Mr. CALKINS. Let me suggest to the gentleman from Illinois that this paragraph be amended in the first instance by inserting before the words "district judges," in the nineteen hundred and eighty-second line, the words "the offices of."

Mr. BLOUNT. I object; the committee is dividing.

The CHAIRMAN. That is not now before the committee.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. Then I hope when the next administration changes, and the Democratic party gets control, that these gentlemen will be directed to turn them over to their Democratic successors.

Mr. HISCOCK. And I will say to the gentleman from Illinois that we will do so as soon as it changes; but we expect to hold onto them until they are worn out before that shall occur.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair must insist that this discussion is not in order, and can only be permitted by unanimous consent.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. If the gentleman from New York will permit a vote on this to be taken in the House, I think the point of no quorum will be withdrawn.

Mr. HISCOCK. That I will not do, and I do not desire to be discourteous about it, but simply answer in the interest of saving time. I have no great objection to a quorum being called from time to time, for it will keep our folks here on both sides of the House, where they ought to be.

Mr. SPRINGER. If the gentleman from New York will agree that the amendment of the gentleman from Ohio shall be so modified as to strike out the words which require the reviving of existing contracts, I shall have no objection to withdrawing the point.

Mr. HISCOCK. If I understand the proposition of the gentleman from Illinois I am perfectly willing, because it is my desire to have the bill remain exactly as it was reported from the committee to the House.

The CHAIRMAN. That requires unanimous consent.

Mr. SPRINGER. That requires unanimous consent, but that modification can be made by consent by striking out the words "except existing contracts."

Mr. HISCOCK. I am unwilling, of course, to do that. I understood the gentleman to apply it to the whole amendment.

Mr. SPRINGER. No. I refer to that portion of the amendment which provides that existing contracts shall not be affected by this provision. I want to strike that out.

Mr. HISCOCK. Let the whole amendment be stricken out, and leave the bill as originally reported from the committee; that I do not object to.

The CHAIRMAN. This debate has been proceeding by consent only. The gentleman from Illinois makes the point of no quorum. The Chair will appoint tellers.

Mr. SPRINGER and Mr. HISCOCK were appointed tellers.

The committee divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 23, noes 124.

So the motion to strike out was not agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. There is still pending an amendment of the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. TOWNSHEND.]

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. I withdraw that for the purpose of hearing the amendment which I understand the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. CALKINS] will offer.

Mr. CALKINS. I now offer an amendment to insert after the word "supply," in line 1982, the words "the offices of," and in line 1983 insert the word "which" in place of the word "who;" so that it will read "to supply the offices of district judges, district attorneys, and clerks of the United States courts which have not already received the same, the Revised Statutes of the United States," &c.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. I ask the gentleman to accept an addition to that amendment, "and that the same shall be delivered by the incumbents to their successors in office."

Mr. CALKINS. That clearly follows as a matter of course, and as far as I am concerned I have no objection to it.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. I think it had better be put in.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will suggest to gentlemen that these amendments properly apply to that portion of the paragraph referring to the Revised Statutes of the United States.

Mr. HISCOCK. That amendment is accepted so far as I am concerned.

Mr. CALKINS. And so far as I am concerned.

Mr. HOLMAN. I wish to offer an amendment to the amendment. I think the language here should not be "delivered," because difficulties may arise in carrying it out. For instance, in the case of the death of the district attorney or clerk they could not deliver these volumes to their successors. I suggest to the gentleman that he modify his amendment by providing that they shall go to their respective successors in office. I had myself prepared an amendment providing that the volumes of such decisions which shall be furnished to such district judges, attorneys, and clerks shall belong to their respective offices and shall go to their respective successors in office.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will remark to gentlemen that they are applying these amendments to that part of the paragraph which refers to the Revised Statutes. If it is designed to apply it to the whole paragraph the Chair will suggest that the Clerk be permitted to read on.

Mr. HOLMAN. But I wish to call the attention of my colleague to the fact that under the provisions of the law this will require three sets of these volumes to be distributed in each case, and a complete set can be furnished to three officers of the district court, the district judge and district attorney and the clerk, when, if I remember now correctly, but one set is furnished, and one set is found to be sufficient. If I understand this provision, it would require a complete new set to go to the clerk and to the district attorney in addition to those authorized by law.

Mr. CALKINS. This applies to the Revised Statutes only, to supply the clerks and district attorneys and district judges.

Mr. HISCOCK. The gentleman from Indiana must bear in mind we are not legislating here with reference to any book except the Revised Statutes.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. The gentleman from New York is mistaken. The last clause of the paragraph applies to the reports of the Supreme Court.

Mr. CALKINS. But it does not furnish them to these officers.

Mr. HOLMAN. I think it must be so construed.

And the Attorney-General is hereby authorized, should it be necessary, to cause the reports of the Supreme Court of the United States upon which the copyright has expired to be republished, and cause the same to be annotated under the act of March 3, 1881.

I admit there is some ambiguity, but I think it must be held that the first terms of this paragraph are intended to apply to the whole.

Mr. CALKINS. Oh, no.

The CHAIRMAN. Will the gentleman permit the Chair to say that all that gentlemen can desire to be accomplished can be arranged in an additional proviso if some one will prepare it.

Mr. BRIGGS. I have prepared such a proviso and offer it as an amendment. I ask the Clerk to read it.

The Clerk read as follows:

And provided further, That all reports and statutes furnished by the United States to district judges, district attorneys, and clerks of the United States courts under this or any other law shall not become the property of these officers, but on the expiration of their official term shall be by them turned over and delivered to their respective successors in office.

The CHAIRMAN. Are the other amendments which have been proposed withdrawn? The Chair hears no objection; and the amendment just read is the only amendment pending.

Mr. BRAGG. I desire to make a single suggestion. If that amendment be adopted, by implication we say to every district attorney, "All the books which have been heretofore furnished to your office belong to you," because now we make a law which provides that all that are furnished in future belong to the office. Therefore, by implication we give him the title in fee to all the books heretofore published.

Mr. BRIGGS. The gentleman misapprehends my amendment.

Mr. HISCOCK. I will say to the gentleman from New Hampshire that his amendment is the law to-day.

Mr. BRAGG. Let it be again read.

The amendment proposed by Mr. BRIGGS was again read.

Mr. BRAGG. That would not be construed to be retroactive. It applies in futuro, unless by the language you make it retroactive.

Mr. HISCOCK. That is the law to-day.

Mr. BRIGGS. So I understand. We have wasted an hour to prevent these officers from stealing these reports, and I wanted an amendment which would end this controversy so that we might proceed with business.

Mr. ROBINSON, of Massachusetts. And you deserve the thanks of the House.

Mr. HISCOCK. My experience is that it is a waste of time to introduce an amendment which is not necessary and which is the present law, that it invites further amendments to it, and that such an amendment had better be resisted at the outset.

Mr. SPRINGER. I move as an amendment to the amendment of the gentleman from New Hampshire to insert the words "heretofore or hereafter" after the word "statutes."

Mr. BRIGGS. I accept that. [Cries of "Vote!" "Vote!"]

Mr. SPRINGER. Before the vote is taken on the amendment let me say that the House seems this morning to manifest a passion for economy in the public printing. Let me say you have ordered more public printing by this clause than has been ordered by the Joint Committee on Printing during this entire Congress; more than for any one work except the Official Records of the Rebellion. Here is the most stupendous job of public printing that has been ordered here in this Congress.

Mr. HISCOCK. I desire to say that this stupendous and colossal job, that rears itself even above the Dome of the Capitol, was put upon a sundry civil bill reported to this House by a Democratic Committee on Appropriations, and that it comes to us as a legacy from them.

Mr. SPRINGER. I take issue with you on that assertion.

Mr. HISCOCK. The only new provision that this House is responsible for, is for the furnishing of the Revised Statutes. The provision to furnish these reports to the district attorneys, and to the clerks, and to the judges, comes over to us as a legacy from a Democratic House. The only thing we have done upon this bill in reference to what they ordered last year——

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. We did not order it.

Mr. HISCOCK. Is to provide that a clerk who may cost $1,200 a year may devote himself to annotating the volumes that the last Congress have made necessary for publication. I hold in my hands the legislation for which they are responsible.

Mr. SPRINGER. Let it be read.

Mr. HISCOCK. The Department was ordered to purchase these volumes if they should cost their weight in gold. They were ordered to "supply" them. The word "supply" covers the purchase or printing or any mode whatever known to man's ingenuity by which the volumes could be procured.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. I ask the gentleman to put his finger upon a word in the act of last year that authorizes the reprinting or republishing of any of these volumes.

Mr. HISCOCK. Certainly a gentleman with the intelligence of the distinguished gentleman from Illinois is able to construe this language:

To supply district judges and district attorneys who have not already received the same with the reports of the Supreme Court and Statutes at Large of the United States.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. Do you hold that that authorizes the republishing of them?

Mr. HISCOCK. I hold that it authorizes the republication or the purchase. It says to the Department, "You can go on the market to get them or you can do anything in the world necessary to supply them." This, gentlemen, is your chicken; take care of it.

Mr. BLOUNT. I move to strike out the last word of the paragraph.

I trust I have been long enough a member of this House and have earned enough of the confidence of the House to prevent my feeling the slightest embarrassment at any announcement by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SPRINGER] that this is a job. If it is a job, I am for the job.

Mr. SPRINGER. All right.

Mr. BLOUNT. And I can stand, I think, any comparison with my friend on that subject before the country without any danger. The simple proposition in this bill, authorizing this reprinting, was because the Attorney-General believed, and rightfully, that he could reprint these books cheaper than he could go into the market and get them. I have no doubt that is true. They have investigated it, and I have learned it from that office itself. I am not afraid to trust the word of the Attorney-General of the United States as to a fact of this kind, when he has better opportunities for information than anybody else; I accept his statement. If there is a job about it I am not responsible for it. But I do not believe that there is any job connected with it. It is the most economical and the simplest way of supplying to the judges and the district-attorneys the books which they need, and notably several judges of the Supreme Court of the United States have avowed that they are a necessity. With those judges indicating the necessity of this thing, and with the details intrusted to the Attorney-General of the United States, I can give my vote for this amendment with that confidence in others which I trust others have in my official action.

Mr. CASWELL. I desire to make a correction of the statement of the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. SPRINGER.] He announced a short time ago that this bill would permit the republication of at least ninety volumes of the reports of the Supreme Court of the United States.

Mr. SPRINGER. How many will it be?

Mr. CASWELL. I want to say to my friend that the copyright is still preserved upon all the volumes of the reports of the Supreme Court issued since 1840. Therefore this bill can extend to very few volumes at the most.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. The copyright does not exist upon the decisions, but only upon the head notes.

Mr. SPRINGER. All this shows that we want more light upon the subject.

Mr. HOLMAN. I move to amend the amendment by adding to it the following:

But the reports of the decisions of the Supreme Court shall only be furnished to the district judges under this provision and said act.

Mr. RYAN. That is right.

Mr. HISCOCK. Wait a moment. I would ask the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] if his amendment should not refer to the act of 1881?

Mr. HOLMAN. It does in expressed terms.

Mr. BAYNE. Do you not want to furnish these reports to circuit judges?

Mr. HOLMAN. This provision does not apply to them.

The question was taken upon the amendment to the amendment; and upon a division there were—ayes 34, noes 13.

So (no further count being called for) the amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is now upon the amendment as amended.

Mr. HISCOCK. I hope that will be withdrawn, for it is the law now.

Mr. HOLMAN. Oh, no.

The amendment as amended was then agreed to.

Mr. HISCOCK. I desire to offer an amendment, not as coming from the Committee on Appropriations, but I offer it as an individual member of the House. It is to insert the paragraph which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

To pay the expenses of circuit judges in going to and returning from their courts, and while in attendance at courts at places where they do not reside, $15,000; but not exceeding $10 a day shall be paid to a judge for traveling expenses and for attendance.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. I make a point of order on that amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. It is new legislation and does not retrench expenditures. It changes existing law and does not economize expenditures. I will reserve my point of order until the gentleman from New York [Mr. HISCOCK] explains his amendment, if he desires to do so.

Mr. HISCOCK. Take the case of Judge McCrary; he has to travel perhaps six or seven hundred miles, and his expenses are nearly enough to eat up his salary. Take the case of a circuit judge in one of the Eastern States, it is about the same in reference to him.

Mr. REED. Why not include district judges?

Mr. HISCOCK. The district judges get it now, not when attending district courts, but when attending circuit courts.

Mr. CALKINS. They do not get it where they are attending courts in the State where they reside.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. I understand that this amendment applies to circuit judges. It will not be long before the same allowance will be asked for district judges.

Mr. CALKINS. And they ought to have it.

Mr. HISCOCK. I have no objection to including district judges.

Mr. CALKINS. Very well, I will move to amend by inserting "district judges."

Mr. HISCOCK. I will accept that amendment.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. I will not insist upon my point of order, if the House desires to adopt the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is upon the amendment as modified.

Mr. WHITE rose.

The CHAIRMAN submitted the question, and announced that the "ayes" appeared to have it.

Mr. WHITE. I claim the right to be heard.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman was on his feet, but the Chair did not hear him ask to be heard.

Mr. WHITE. I make the point of order that the amendment is not germane, that it increases expenditures, that it raises the salaries of judges indirectly, and is not a proper amendment to this bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair thinks, as to the point of order, that the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. WHITE] had time to make it before the amendment was explained, and is not in time now with his point of order. The Chair supposed that the gentleman wished to speak to the amendment.

Mr. BLACKBURN. I call for a division on the amendment.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 53, noes 48.

Mr. BLACKBURN and Mr. HOLMAN. No quorum.

Tellers were ordered; and Mr. HISCOCK and Mr. BLACKBURN were appointed.

The committee again divided; and the tellers reported that there were—ayes 74, noes 79.

So the amendment was not agreed to.

The Clerk read the following:

MISCELLANEOUS.

That John W. Thompson, Henry A. Willard, John A. J. Cresswell, and others, constituting the executive committee on the inaugural ceremonies of March 4, 1881, are hereby relieved from the findings of a board of survey whereby the said executive committee is held responsible in the sum of $616.22 for the loss and damage by the elements to certain flags, the property of the United States, used in decorating the public buildings at Washington, District of Columbia, during the ceremonies attending the inaugural proceedings of March 4, 1881.

Mr. DEERING. I move an amendment, to come in after the word "miscellaneous," preceding the paragraph just read.

The Clerk read the amendment, as follows:

To enable the Secretary of the Treasury to pay for services rendered in connection with the duties of the late chairman of the committee on experiments and chairman of the Light-House Board, in conducting scientific researches for the light-house establishments, as recommended by the Light-House Board, $2,925.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read the following:

That hereafter all advertising in newspapers required by existing laws to be done in the District of Columbia, by any Department of the Government, shall be published only in two daily newspapers, one of each of the two political parties.

Mr. MUTCHLER. I make a point of order on that paragraph.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. MUTCHLER. I make a point of order under clause 3 of Rule 21, that it is new legislation, repealing existing law, namely, the act of January 21, 1881, which provides for public advertisement in the District of Columbia, and is not in the interest of economy. I send a copy of the existing law to the Clerk's desk to be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

That all advertising required by existing laws to be done in the District of Columbia by any of the Departments of the Government shall be given to one daily and one weekly newspaper of each of the two principal political parties and to one daily and one weekly neutral newspaper: Provided, That the rates of compensation for such service shall in no case exceed the regular commercial rate of the newspapers selected; nor shall any advertisement be paid for unless published in accordance with section 3828 of the Revised Statutes.

SEC. 2. All laws or parts of laws inconsistent herewith are hereby repealed.

Mr. MUTCHLER. I desire to call the attention of the Chair to the fact that in the existing law the rate of compensation is limited to the commercial rates usually charged by the paper receiving payment. Under this paragraph, which repeals the existing law, the rate of compensation is not regulated; consequently the two papers that are to do this advertising can receive the same amount that has heretofore been paid to four. For this reason the provision of the bill does not retrench expenditures.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from New York [Mr. HISCOCK] wish to be heard on the point of order?

Mr. ROBESON. I would like to understand what the point of order is.

Mr. MUTCHLER. I make the point of order, in the first place——

Mr. ROBESON. The provision may change the existing law; but does it not reduce expenditures by reducing the number of these newspapers just one-half?

Mr. MUTCHLER. No, sir.

Mr. ROBESON. I thought it did.

Mr. MUTCHLER. I call the attention of the gentleman from New Jersey to the fact that under the existing law the rate of compensation is regulated; the newspapers doing this advertising can charge only a particular rate. Under the law, as sought to be amended by this paragraph, these newspapers may charge whatever they please.

Mr. ROBESON. Oh, no.

Mr. MUTCHLER. Oh, yes.

Mr. ROBESON. Under the law as it now exists authority is given to publish these advertisements in four newspapers at a certain rate. The provision in the bill reduces the number of newspapers from four to two, without changing the rate of payment.

Mr. MUTCHLER. I do not look at it in that way. That does not appear on the face of the paragraph.

The CHAIRMAN. In the opinion of the Chair this provision leaves in force all existing laws except as to the number of newspapers. But the point of order which the gentleman raises rests upon that fact, that this does change existing law. In that case the rule provides that it shall not be in order unless it shall be germane to the subject-matter of the bill, and "shall retrench expenditures by the reduction of the number and salary of the officers of the United States, by the reduction of the compensation of any person paid out of the Treasury of the United States, or by the reduction of amounts of money covered by the bill."

The Chair again calls the attention of the committee to the fact that amendments changing existing law and retrenching expenditures generally do not become legitimate except when reported by committees having jurisdiction of the subject-matter. If this provision were reported by the Committee on Printing, or perhaps by the Committee on the Judiciary, the Chair would consider it germane and as tending to retrench expenditures; but the Chair is inclined to consider the provision subject to a point of order upon the ground that, while it changes existing law, it does not retrench expenditures in one of the three modes named. The Chair will be glad to hear further discussion on the point of order.

Mr. HASKELL. May I call the attention of the Chair to the fact that under the clause of the rule which he has cited, one of the three modes in which an amendment must retrench expenditures, to be in order, is by the reduction of the compensation of any person paid out of the Treasury. Now, in this case there is a reduction of the compensation to be paid out of the Treasury because you reduce the number of newspapers that are to publish these advertisements.

Mr. MUTCHLER. But there is no reduction of compensation.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair thinks that the clause which the gentleman from Kansas cites refers to the compensation of specific persons.

Mr. HASKELL. But in the clause of the rule, the reduction of salaries is provided for specifically. Now, this amendment provides that a smaller number of persons shall do this work, and therefore there will be a less compensation. It seems to me that the provision comes within the rule.

Mr. HISCOCK. I will simply make a suggestion to the Chair as bearing on the question, because whatever the effect of the decision may be, it is of course desirable that the question should be decided rightly.

I call the attention of the Chair to the proviso at the close of the subdivision 3 of Rule XXI:

Provided, That it shall be in order further to amend such bill upon the report of the committee having jurisdiction of the subject-matter of such amendment, which amendment, being germane to the subject-matter of the bill, shall retrench expenditures.

If the pending provision were out of the bill it would be entirely proper upon the part of the Committee on Appropriations to propose just such a provision as an amendment, because the question of the expenditure of this money and how many papers may be employed, how many officers may do this business, is peculiarly within the jurisdiction and province of the Committee on Appropriations.

Suppose that I had presented here as a committee amendment this provision embraced in lines 2004 and 2008. That clause, if it had not been in the bill, but were offered as an amendment from the Committee on Appropriations, would be a proper amendment, and no point of order would lie against it, because it would retrench expenditures and in this way come within the terms of the proviso which I have read.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair would be glad to hear from the gentlemen who took part in revising the rules whether he is mistaken in supposing that this proviso referred to amendments reported from committees who would have jurisdiction of the subject-matter.

Mr. HISCOCK. I say that as to this branch of the service the only committee that has jurisdiction of it is the Appropriations Committee.

Mr. SPRINGER. As to this subject-matter properly coming from the Committee on Appropriations, which was the remark of the gentleman from New York, [Mr. HISCOCK,] I wish to say it should properly come from the Committee on the District of Columbia. This is for advertising in the District of Columbia.

Mr. HISCOCK. I beg the gentleman's pardon.

Mr. MUTCHLER. The gentleman from Illinois is right. You cannot advertise anything here except what appertains to the District of Columbia.

Mr. SPRINGER. The advertising for the Post-Office Department is provided for by the postal laws.

The CHAIRMAN. The separate act of printing is entitled "An act to regulate the mode of and compensation for public advertising in the District of Columbia." It is exclusively confined to the District.

Mr. SPRINGER. I so understand it.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is further informed this act was reported by the Committee on Printing. It was in that view the Chair felt bound to consider the proviso to the rule.

Mr. SPRINGER. I wish to say that it should either come from the Committee on the District of Columbia or the Committee on Printing. Either one of those committees would have properly jurisdiction of the subject.

Mr. ROBESON. This bill is full of appropriations for supplies for the various Departments, for which under the law advertisement is required.

Mr. MUTCHLER. In the District of Columbia?

Mr. ROBESON. In the District of Columbia; yes. Supplies for the Post-Office Department and other Departments are required, many of them, by law to be advertised for in the District of Columbia.

Mr. MUTCHLER. I think the gentleman is mistaken.

Mr. ROBESON. No; I am not mistaken. Supplies for the Navy Department, no matter where it comes from, supplies for the navy-yard here, are all advertised for in the District of Columbia. This bill covers hundreds of such items in all of the Departments. Now, we regulate and restrain the expenditure of the money required to be expended by law under those appropriations. If this is not within the province of the Committee on Appropriations, then I cannot see what is.

The CHAIRMAN. Will the gentleman inform the Chair whether there is an appropriation in the pending bill for advertising? The Chair does not recollect of any such appropriation.

Mr. MUTCHLER. I think there is none.

Mr. ROBESON. I do not know that there is, but there are appropriations for hundreds of objects under the various Departments which the law requires shall be advertised for.

Mr. ROBINSON, of Massachusetts. Mr. Chairman, a single question as to the history of the third clause of the twenty-first rule. That was adopted in order that certain committees having charge of certain subject-matters might present them to the House, although they would not come within the prior clauses of that rule. In the last Congress, after the rules were adopted, gentlemen will remember the Committee on Military Affairs, as one instance, brought in a proposition particularly within their jurisdiction and did retrench expenditures, as they claimed, but not within the three methods prescribed. I see the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. RANDALL,] who was one of the committee which drew up this new code of rules, and he will agree I think that this was not a modification reported from that committee, but made in the House.

Mr. RANDALL. This was not reported by the committee.

Mr. ROBINSON, of Massachusetts. I think it was suggested by the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. MORRISON.] He proposed some change should be made. It seems to me gentlemen will admit it was adopted for this purpose: that a subject which could not be introduced under the first part of that rule might come in under the latter part, if the committee charged with that matter should bring it before the House, if that provision should retrench expenditure in any way.

Mr. RANDALL. My recollection is this proviso was an amendment to the recommendation of the Committee on Rules. It was added by the House on motion of the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr MORRISON.] If I recollect the debate correctly, it developed what it was intended for, and that was that any committee of the House having jurisdiction of a subject might introduce from that committee an amendment, provided it was germane to the subject-matter and retrenched expenditure. It gave to the Committee on Naval Affairs the right to introduce amendments on an appropriation bill when naval matters were under consideration, provided they were germane and reduced expenditures; and so it was with other committees. It was a sort of compromise, and I thought at the time quite a proper provision; and I have seen no reason since then to doubt its propriety.

Mr. CALKINS. Let me ask how the proviso to this clause applies to anything before the House now?

Mr. RANDALL. It was intended, and the language taken together showed it had no application except to appropriation bills.

Mr. CALKINS. The gentleman and I will not disagree that the proviso to this clause of the rule simply applies to amendments offered by committees by authority of the committee where that committee was charged with a certain subject in cases where it retrenched expenditure.

Mr. RANDALL. I have illustrated it by a case in point.

Mr. CALKINS. That is my idea. Now, one word further. That proviso can have no application to the subject under consideration, because this amendment does not come into the bill on the recommendation of any other committee.

Mr. RANDALL. I do not see the application at all to this case. I will illustrate, however, a case in point, and one that is within the memory of everybody present. The naval appropriation bill contained features of legislation relating to the organization of the Navy. Now, it would be competent under this proviso for the Naval Committee to come in and introduce any amendment which is germane to the subject-matter of the bill and which reduced expenditures.

Mr. CALKINS. I agree with the gentleman from Pennsylvania, but with only a suggestion, with his permission——

Mr. RANDALL. Certainly. I shall be glad to hear the gentleman.

Mr. CALKINS. If this clause stands in the bill under the point of order made by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, it must stand under one of the provisions of this third clause of Rule XXI, namely, that it retrenches expenditures by the reduction of the number and salary of the officers of the United States. Now, it does not do that. Or by the reduction of the compensation of any person paid out of the Treasury of the United States. Now, does it do that? If it does upon its face it is in order. If it does not upon its face retrench expenditures it is not in order, and is subject to the point of order made against it. Or, third, by the reduction of amounts of money covered by the bill. Now, it does not come in under that provision of the rule, for it does not reduce the sum covered by the bill. So it is remitted to the second clause and limited to that; and if it upon its face reduces expenditures by reducing the amount of compensation paid to any person out of the Treasury of the United States, then it is a reduction of expenditures and is not subject to the point of order.

Mr. RANDALL. A fair construction of that proviso and a common-sense interpretation of it would only go to the extent that where a bill is introduced from the Committee on Appropriations it is competent for any other committee of the House having charge of the subject-matter to make an amendment which would be germane to something in that appropriation and have the right to introduce such an amendment provided it retrenched expenditures. The Committee on Appropriations may perhaps have that same privilege, in introducing a separate amendment from their committee, if they had jurisdiction of the subject-matter to be legislated upon, and coming within the purview simply of the Committee on Appropriations.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is ready to rule upon the point of order, and begs only the attention of the committee to say that the difficulty in these several points of order arises from the confusion attending the words "retrenching expenditures," and he has repeatedly in this bill been compelled to rule out propositions changing general law and which have attached to them something reducing expenditures covered by the bill.

Under the proviso of the rule alone can an amendment be entertained which, being germane, shall retrench expenditures in any general sense. The Chair does not regard this provision in the bill, however, as coming from a committee having jurisdiction of the matter.

As to the other clause of the rule, this provision does not, in the opinion of the Chair, reduce expenditures in either of the three ways in which the rule limits it. The Chair therefore decides that the section is not in order and must be stricken from the bill upon the objection made. The Chair desires to express his perfect willingness, however, to submit the matter to the committee for its decision if objection is made.

The Clerk read as follows:

To pay to Edward J. Gurley, of McLennan County, Texas, the sum of $1,000 for himself and $1,000 as trustee for the law-firm of Blocker & Gurley, for legal services rendered the Government of the United States.

Mr. HISCOCK. I desire to move to strike this provision from the bill.

Mr. MILLS. There is no objection to that.

The motion was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

To pay James L. Andem for reporting testimony before the Committees on Foreign Affairs and Public Buildings and Grounds, $598, the bills for the same to be approved by the chairmen of said committees and by the Committee on Accounts of the House of Representatives.

Mr. SPRINGER. I reserve on this provision the point of order. If gentlemen desire to explain it, I will withhold the point of order and hear an explanation.

Mr. BLACKBURN rose.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman desire to be heard upon the point of order?

Mr. BLACKBURN. No; I desire to offer an amendment.

Mr. SPRINGER. I will withhold the point of order if gentlemen desire to make an explanation of the necessity for this paragraph.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will hear the gentleman upon the point of order.

Mr. SPRINGER. The first point of order is that it is not an appropriation authorized by law, and does not retrench expenditures in the manner indicated by the Chair in its recent decision.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair hardly understands the point of order as applicable to the payment of necessary expenses under orders of the House of Representatives.

Mr. ROBESON. If the gentleman from Illinois would like an explanation, I will give it to him.

Mr. SPRINGER. I will withhold the point of order to hear that.

Mr. ROBESON. It is exactly in accordance with the law and the construction placed upon it by every Democratic Congress for the last ten years.

Mr. RANDALL. I do not think that is the fact.

Mr. BRAGG. I would like to inquire of the gentleman from New Jersey if that, in his opinion, makes it good law and good morals?

Mr. ROBESON. It is for that side of the House.

Mr. HISCOCK. It is good for them as an estoppel.

Mr. RANDALL. It is not well founded.

Mr. ROBESON. We authorize the committees of our House, certain of them, when they require to do so, to take testimony; to have hearings before the committee; to have the testimony taken down by the stenographers or reporters. We provide two reporters, who usually take down that testimony and do the reporting. But they cannot do it all themselves. Each reporter has to pay, of course, for all his own work, for all his own transcribing, for his own amanuenses, and everything of that kind. But if we have got a dozen committees hearing testimony at once, the reporters are not birds, as Sir Boyle Roche put it, to be in two places at the same time, and they cannot do it. And the past Democratic Congresses have recognized just that thing. I hold in my hand the report of the second session of the Forty-fifth Congress, when $6,000 were appropriated for just this thing to a dozen different people. I hold in my hand the report of the third session of the Forty-fifth Congress, when $4,000 were appropriated for the same thing. And I have here the report of the last session of the last Democratic Congress, when nearly $400 were appropriated for exactly the same thing. I give that as an answer to the point of order.

Mr. RANDALL and Mr. SPRINGER rose.

Mr. SPRINGER. I yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. RANDALL. I will say in reply to the gentleman from New Jersey that this is to pay for a stenographer who was employed by the committees named in this paragraph to take the place of the regular stenographers of the House. I am generally disposed to be liberal about such matters where the service is rendered in good faith; but I want to put on file in answer to the statement of the gentleman from New Jersey a letter I have received from the two former reporters of the committees of this House.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Pennsylvania desire to have the letter read?

Mr. RANDALL. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. On the point of order?

Mr. RANDALL. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SPRINGER] yielded to me. The gentleman from New Jersey made his statement on the point of order, and I want to make answer on the part of the late stenographers of committees of this House to the particular point or assertion which the gentleman from New Jersey has made.

The CHAIRMAN. In the absence of objection, the Clerk will read the letter.

The Clerk read as follows:

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, July 12, 1882.

DEAR SIR: Please do us the justice to put on record, in some form, the following statement, to correct an erroneous one which has been made:

1. During the time we served the House as official stenographers for committees there was never a dollar appropriated to pay others for acting as our personal substitutes.

2. The appropriations to pay additional stenographers were made only when there was an unusual "run" of work—never in such a session as the present, the lightest in this respect for many years. During February and the first three weeks of March last, the stenographic work done for committees was probably twice as much as the work since; yet it was all done by us alone.

At several sessions within the past eight years the committee work was very heavy, (sometimes considerably exceeding the debates in volume,) and of course others had to be employed to aid us; but we always did the most important and difficult work ourselves; and in no case were we ever interested, directly or indirectly, to the amount of one cent, in any appropriation made for the payment of other stenographers. We are,

Yours, very respectfully,

HENRY G. HAYES,
ANDREW DEVINE.

Mr. HORR. I want to know what that has to do with this question of order?

Mr. RANDALL. It has this to do with it, that this paragraph is to pay for services given in lieu of the services not rendered which should have been rendered by the recent appointees.

Mr. HORR. How do these men know anything about it?

Mr. RANDALL. They know what occurred in their own case.

Mr. ROBESON. How did these appropriations in previous sessions of $6,000, of $4,000, and of $400 occur?

Mr. SPRINGER. This is an appropriation to pay the person who is named here for reporting testimony before these committees. Now the law has provided two official reporters for that purpose.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will remind the gentleman that there was an order of the House for the taking of this testimony.

Mr. SPRINGER. I desire to remind the Chair this appropriation is brought forward by reason of the fact that the persons appointed to do this work by the Speaker of the House were utterly incompetent to do it, were unable to do it; and we are now paying them their salaries under the law. And here is a provision requiring us to appropriate money to somebody else for doing the service they should have done.

I ask to have printed as a part of my remarks a portion of the proceedings of the Committee on Foreign Affairs, showing that they were compelled to discard the work of the official stenographers and employ others to do the work. They employed Mr. Andem and others. The Committee on Foreign Affairs employed Mr. Hayes, one of the discharged reporters, to furnish the committee with the report he had made for the Associated Press. The gentlemen appointed by the Speaker were incompetent to do the work, and were compelled to employ a substitute to do it. I ask that this be printed as a part of my remarks.

The following is the portion of the proceedings of the Committee on Foreign Affairs referred to by Mr. SPRINGER:

WASHINGTON, D. C., April 12, 1882.

At the opening of the session of the committee the witness, Mr. Jacob R. Shipherd, addressing the chairman, said: "I would like to say a word or two in reference to the official report of my testimony I am compelled to ask the attention of the committee to that report, about one hundred pages of which I have had this morning put in my hand for the first time. So far as a general examination of it allows me to judge, it is fairly accurate; but I notice constant errors, some of which are most serious; for example, one on page 103, in reply to a question by Mr. BLOUNT, in that answer I am reported as saying:

"'The WITNESS. The fund of humor, as the examiner characterizes it, will be found to be carefully qualified. It had occurred to me that he would do something for us upon reading his letter—I don't know just where I will find it—his letter of October 1, in which he says that he very sincerely wishes that he could appear to have as solid a basis as we thought it had, because in that case it would be of great advantage to us. That letter of October 1 was written two days, I think, after Calderon had been taken away, and I understood the letter—and others understood it the same way—to imply a suggestion on the minister's part that he really wished it might be put in such shape that it might be of very great use. That is, if our company could be brought to the front it might be made a basis for the return of Calderon and the restoration of the Peruvian Government, which General Hurlbut thought it ought to be restored to.'"*

"Now, I ask to be excused from the supposition that I could be possibly responsible for such idiocy as that. I could point out twenty errors which I discovered within the last ten minutes, errors just as gross as this. The testimony is almost unintelligible."

Mr. RICE. Some members of the committee, of whom I am one, sympathize with you, Mr. Shipherd.

Mr. BELMONT. There is no doubt about that.

Mr. RICE. The questions and answers as printed are, many of them, entirely unintelligible, and by no means give an idea of what took place at the time. I have read enough of the official report to know that it is necessary for us to rely upon our memory rather than upon that report.

Mr. BELMONT. I found that out before to-day, and I made arrangements to have a special report made for myself.

The WITNESS. This testimony, as I understand, must be submitted to the House, and, conceivably, members of the House may take the pains to look into it. If it is possible to have the official report revised so that it will be intelligible it would seem to me desirable to have that done. I venture on making that suggestion. I have followed the reports in the New York morning papers with some care, and have read them attentively, and those reported have been remarkably accurate. I think that if those reports were taken as the standard a very accurate report might be made. The only exception that I make is that I notice that, after these reports reached New York, each editor, in turn, omits such passages as he deems inexpedient to disclose to his readers. But I think that, if all the reports as published in the New York morning papers were taken and collated, a full report would be found of each day's proceedings. If the committee will take steps to have a revision made on that basis I think a good report can be had, and I submit the question to the committee.

The CHAIRMAN. The committee has seen the defects in the official report. Of course it should be a literal transcript of what occurs here, and we have all noticed that it is not. If any member of the committee has any suggestion to make the Chair will be glad to hear it.

Mr. RICE. It is very evident, Mr. Chairman, that where a report of testimony is taken to be put into the archives of Congress, and to furnish a basis for present action and for future reference, if that report is not a transcript of what actually occurs it can be of no possible use, except to deceive.

Mr. ORTH. Of course it would be better for us not to have any report at all than one that is not accurate.

The CHAIRMAN. We all agree that it is of the utmost importance to have an accurate report. As Mr. Shipherd says, I have myself noticed in the New York papers a very accurate and literal report indeed.

Mr. ORTH. So have I.

Mr. BLOUNT. We can consider this question at some future time.

The CHAIRMAN. Perhaps we had better go on this morning, but I hope that the stenographer will be very careful.

The official stenographer [Mr. Dawson] asked and obtained permission to make a statement. He said that his colleague, Mr. Devine, was sick, and that for the last three or four days he had been doing this work. He had had to read his notes to an amanuensis, or to two or three different ones, and whatever corrections he made had to be made in a great hurry. The copy had to be sent to the Printing Office immediately, and he could see no proof and had no chance to compare the copy as written out with his own notes. He had to rely upon a lady whom Mr. Hayes had been employing heretofore, and she had come to him last afternoon and informed him that she could not help him any more, so that he had had to go out and get two or three other stenographers to dictate his notes to. He had not been able to compare the copy as written out with his notes; and that was all the excuse he had to make for the state of the report. He had been very closely rushed. He did not feel that he ought to sit here after the criticism of the committee, as his work was not satisfactory.

The CHAIRMAN. The committee appreciates your embarrassment, but of course an official report should be literally accurate.

Mr. WALKER, (to the stenographer.) Do I understand that your notes are entirely correct, but that the difficulty lies in the transcribing?

The STENOGRAPHER. I think that my notes are equal, or very nearly equal, to the average. Before I came on here I had done a good deal of short-hand work, but I have not done any lately. I am out of practice just now and for that reason I would hardly say that I am absolutely as correct as men who have been in practice all the time. But I am rapidly gaining the facility which I had formerly when I was regularly in the business. I submit to the chairman recommendations which I have in order to show the opinions of men for whom I did work seven or eight years ago, when I was regularly in the business. The fact is that I am out of practice. I have not had any practice in this work for three or four years. My work has been amanuensis work in the War Department, so that I have been out of practice in this kind of work. Besides I learned from members—friends of mine—when I first went to work that an effort was going to be made to show that I was incompetent. I went to work, therefore, with nervousness, and I found a great deal of difficulty in reading my notes, just as a man would in reading long-hand written under a pressure and when he is in a state of mind in which he is not in a condition to do the work.

The CHAIRMAN. I feel very sure that there is no prejudice or bias against you on the part of the committee; but, for some days, members have mentioned, and I have noticed, some of these inaccuracies.

The STENOGRAPHER. Gentlemen will recollect (my attention has been called to it by a friend) that the speeches reported in the House are all revised by members; but no committee work is revised.

Mr. ORTH. Not one speech in ten is revised.

The STENOGRAPHER. I do not want to go ahead with this report under the present circumstances. It would not be fair to the committee, nor would I be able to do it, probably.

The CHAIRMAN. What is the pleasure of the committee?

Mr. RICE. I see no way but for us to adjourn.

The STENOGRAPHER. On account of the rush in getting out this work I had made an arrangement to have another stenographer come in at half past eleven.

The CHAIRMAN. Can you you send him now?

The STENOGRAPHER. I will try to.

Mr. WALKER. Is he an official reporter?

The STENOGRAPHER. No, sir; he is clerk to a committee.

Mr. ORTH. We must apply to the House to furnish us a reporter.

The CHAIRMAN. It seems too bad to lose the entire session to-day. If we had a reasonably accurate reporter we might go on.

Mr. RICE. There are some things wholly omitted from the record that occured here; and there are other places where the sentences are so constructed as to be utterly ungrammatical and illogical. In some cases they vary from the sense very essentially. What is the use, therefore, in our going on with this reporter?

The CHAIRMAN. Certainly not.

Mr. BLOUNT. Suppose we relieve Mr. Shipherd? We can do nothing this morning.

The CHAIRMAN. We must adjourn the hearing.

* The corresponding paragraph in the corrected report is on page 101.

Mr. LORD inquired whether the reporter of the Associated Press might not report the testimony this morning.

The REPORTER declined doing so, saying that he had been removed from his office by the Speaker in order to make place for the stenographer who had just been reporting for the committee.

The OFFICIAL REPORTER remarked that if he had been appointed to the position a month or two before he would have employed some man to take his place, because he was on the point of being sick.

The committee adjourned with the understanding that the matter should be brought to the attention of the House or of the Speaker.

At a subsequent session of the committee it was ordered that a correct report of the testimony from the 5th to the 12th of April inclusive, should be obtained from the reporter of the New York Associated Press and should be substituted for that already printed. In compliance with that wish of the committee, as communicated in the following note, Mr. Henry G. Hayes, who had reported the investigation specially for the New York Associated Press, prepared an official report of the testimony taken within those dates, and which is substituted in this record for that previously printed, except as to the portion of the testimony taken on the 8th of April up to noon, (pages 80 to 91,) which was reported by Mr. Andrew Devine, the other official stenographer, and which is printed from the original text.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
COMMITTEE ON FOREIGN AFFAIRS,
Washington, D. C., May 1, 1882.

DEAR SIR: I am directed by the chairman of the Committee on Foreign Affairs, pursuant to a resolution of the committee, to inform you that he desires to use your notes of the testimony taken in the Chili-Peruvian investigation on April 5 to April 12, 1882, inclusive.

Very truly, yours,

BYRON ANDREWS,
Clerk of Committee.

HENRY G. HAYES, Esq.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is ready to decide the point of order. The House has ordered certain investigations, including the taking of testimony, and has given the usual powers for that purpose. In the absence of proof to the contrary, it must be presumed it was in the execution of these powers this liability was incurred. The point of order is overruled.

Mr. SPRINGER. I make the further point of order that the person named here is already in the employment of the Government, and, under the law, cannot receive compensation for work done in another capacity.

Mr. SINGLETON, of Illinois. I will state that he furnished the committee with a substitute, who has given entire satisfaction. He did so at the request of the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds. He is now in the employment of the tariff commission.

Mr. SPRINGER. I concede all that my colleague states. The point I make is that at the time the service was rendered, this reporting for the Committee on Foreign Affairs and the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, Mr. Andem was clerk of the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds. Therefore this paragraph is subject to the point of order under the general law which provides that no officer of the Government receiving compensation from the Government for his services as such officer shall receive any additional pay or compensation for any other service he may do for the Government.

Mr. SINGLETON, of Illinois. I would state to my colleague that this gentleman turned over his compensation to a substitute who performed the service, and the arrangement was entirely acceptable to the committee.

Mr. SPRINGER. I am speaking of the time when he was on the roll as clerk of the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

The CHAIRMAN. When the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SPRINGER] rests his point of order on a fact which is not on the record, the Chair can hardly take notice of it.

Mr. SPRINGER. I will produce evidence that he is the clerk of the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, and I say the Chair ought to take notice of who are the officers of this House without my proving it. It is a part of our record here that this gentleman is a clerk of one of the committees of the House.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair must depend on the gentleman from Illinois to furnish the record to show that this gentleman is a clerk of a committee; for the Chair does not know the names of all the clerks of committees.

Mr. SPRINGER. I say that the Chair should take cognizance as a judicial fact of the officers of this House. If a page will bring me the Congressional Directory I will give the Chair the information.

Mr. HORR. I take it that that will not make any difference.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order as presented requires the investigation by the Chair of a matter of fact——

Mr. SPRINGER. It does not require the investigation of a fact. Will not the Chair take cognizance of the officers of this House?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will not take cognizance, for he cannot know, of all the clerks and doorkeepers and other officers about the House.

Mr. REED. Allow me to suggest that the Chair takes judicial cognizance of a thing upon proper information, not otherwise.

Mr. SPRINGER. And I will give the proper information.

Mr. ROBESON. Even if it were true, does the scope and intent of that provision of law, which says that clerks shall not be paid extra for clerical work, mean that a clerk of a committee shall perform the duties of stenographer and reporter for other committees without any further compensation? That does not apply at all. All that that provision means is that no clerk in any Department, no officer of the Government who is obliged to do extra work in the line of his duty, according to his ordinary appointment, shall receive extra compensation for it. But if he is called upon to do something in which he is an expert, and devotes his hours of leisure and his labor to that work, the provision does not apply to that case at all. Neither does it apply to clerks of committees of this House, or to members of this House, in so far as they may be regarded as officers.

Mr. SPRINGER. I produce here the Congressional Directory showing that this man was the clerk of the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

Mr. SINGLETON, of Illinois. That is not the question; it is admitted that he is the clerk.

Mr. SPRINGER. But the Chair does not admit it, it seems.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair does not think it necessary to prolong this inquiry. There are gentlemen on the floor making different statements as to a question of fact. Now, the rules cannot require that the Chair shall stop public business in order to settle a disputed fact.

Mr. SPRINGER. There is no disputed fact; here is the record.

The CHAIRMAN. But that does not settle the point.

Mr. SPRINGER. Then there is nothing that can settle it.

Mr. HISCOCK. I hope the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SPRINGER] will desist——

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will recognize the gentleman for debate upon an amendment.

Mr. SPRINGER. "The gentleman from Illinois" is very much obliged to the gentleman from New York [Mr. HISCOCK] for his suggestion. The gentleman from New York has occupied nine-tenths of the time of the House for the last week, and nobody has asked him to desist.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will rule formally upon the point of order. The only evidence produced with regard to this disputed fact is the Congressional Directory of February 1, 1881. The Chair is not aware of who are now the clerks of committees. It is said that the man has resigned, but the time when he did so is uncertain. The Chair will not hold that he is obliged to suspend business for the purpose of ascertaining facts on which to rule, and therefore overrules the point of order.

Mr. COX, of New York. I move to strike out the last word to say this——

Mr. SPRINGER. I move to strike out the whole clause, and the gentleman can speak on that.

Mr. COX, of New York. That is right. I presume this item in this bill is made possible by the action of the Speaker of this House, whether in removing from office, rightfully or wrongfully, two of our official reporters, experienced men, competent men, against whom there was not a shadow nor a scintilla of complaint.

By Rule XXXVI of this House no stenographer can be removed by the Speaker except for cause. I understand that Mr. Hayes, our reporter, inquired of the Speaker the cause for his removal and received no reply. The removal, therefore, so far as I can understand it, was made on the mere caprice, will, or pleasure of the Speaker, and not for cause.

I do not know that we can debate the legality of that removal on this provision, but certainly there will be no other opportunity to call the matter in question. Although the matter has been sent to the Committee on the Judiciary by a resolution offered here by the distinguished gentleman from Georgia, [Mr. STEPHENS,] no report has been made from that committee. Perhaps the gentleman from Maine can tell us why no report has come from that committee.

Mr. REED. "The gentleman from Maine" can just do that.

Mr. COX, of New York. I wish he would.

Mr. REED. The matter was referred to a sub-committee, consisting of the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. ROBINSON,] the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. CONVERSE,] and myself. The gentleman from Massachusetts and myself have examined the question, and I have twice personally suggested to the gentleman from Ohio that I would be obliged if he would examine it, but some business of his intervened to prevent it.

Mr. COX, of New York. I am very sorry that the committee has had so long a time and so little fruit is the result of it. If I understand it, the case stands in this way, and it may as well be understood by the House: Mr. Hayes was removed, so far as we know, not for cause, not on any ground of complaint, according to the ordinary meaning of the word "cause" in a legal sense, but simply at the whim and caprice of our Speaker. And no account has been given to Mr. Hayes or Mr. Devine looking to a case of removal "for cause." Who was appointed in place of Mr. Hayes? A Mr. Dawson. Am I right?

Mr. HORR. Yes, sir.

Mr. COX, of New York. Utterly incompetent, as was shown by his efforts before the committee of which you, Mr. Chairman, were a member.

Mr. STEELE. Is there anything in the rules requiring the Speaker to report to Mr. Hayes?

Mr. COX, of New York. Wherever a removal is required to be "for cause," as the gentleman must know, notice must be given, and in that notice the cause of complaint must be stated.

Mr. MOULTON. And opportunity given for defense.

Mr. COX, of New York. Yes, opportunity given for defense. What is the meaning of "cause?" Surely, if there was ever a case so plain that a wayfaring man could not err therein, it is this. The meaning of the rule is that some reason must be given outside the mere will or pleasure of the officer making the removal. I am not complaining of the honorable Speaker in regard to any particular cause he may have had for removing these men.

It was said that one of these reporters was connected with the Associated Press; that was given at one time as a cause. But that is denied; it was not true. Why could not Mr. Hayes have been advised as to the real reason, if there was any, for his removal? Why was Mr. Devine removed without cause, against our rule? Are we not here to defend our own rules? Is not the Speaker only the creature of this House? Is he not, therefore, bound under the rule to state something either to the House or to the officer removed as a "cause" for such removal? Therefore, when it comes to paying a man who acted in the place of an incompetent person who was appointed to the position of one of these men removed—men who had served the House for ten, fifteen, or seventeen years—men of the highest probity, against whom not a word can be said as to their skill or honesty or fair dealing with the House, it becomes us to vindicate the House and exhibit the facts not only to the press and the country but to the House itself, that seems to be ignorant of them. [Cries of "Vote!" "Vote!"]

Mr. HORR. I wish to say to the Committee of the Whole just a word in reply to the gentleman from New York [Mr. COX] and the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. SPRINGER.] The gentleman from New York states that these persons were removed without cause, which is simply not true although he may think it is true. They were removed for cause and good cause——

Mr. COX, of New York. What was it?

Mr. HORR. Such as was satisfactory to the Speaker; and when he becomes satisfied it does not matter whether you are satisfied or not.

Mr. BLOUNT. What does the rule mean?

Mr. HORR. The rule means that the Speaker shall be governed by good common sense. It is stated that the gentlemen put in these places were not competent. I deny it. They were able, reliable stenographers.

Mr. COX, of New York. Will my friend from Michigan tell us what the causes for removal were, if he knows, for I declare I do not know?

Mr. HORR. My friend from New York would not be any happier if I did so, not a bit. [Laughter.]

Mr. COX, of New York. The Speaker is our organ, and we have a right to know the cause under the rules.

Mr. HORR. I will tell you what I think is the matter with my friend from New York and my friend from Illinois. It is this: that the two gentlemen who have been selected and put in these places are both Union soldiers of long service——

Mr. COX, of New York. I never knew anything about that.

Mr. HORR. And the men put out happened to be Democrats of their ilk. That is where the trouble is.

Mr. COX, of New York. I never knew anything about the politics of these gentlemen who were removed; and I did not know that there were soldiers put in their places. Therefore my friend is entirely at sea on this subject.

Mr. SPRINGER. I do not know either of these persons appointed; I would not know them if I saw them now.

Mr. RANDALL. In my intercourse with the two gentlemen removed I never had any knowledge of their politics.

Mr. SPRINGER. Both of them were appointed by Republican Speakers; one by Speaker Colfax, the other by Speaker Blaine.

Mr. HORR. I believe I have the floor. I will say to my Democratic friends, since they deny all knowledge on this subject, or perhaps are ignorant of it—I hope they are—that it somehow happens in the history of this Government whenever a soldier gets into any place there is always trouble about it on the other side of the House. You commence worrying all the while.

Mr. COX, of New York. We have appointed soldiers.

Mr. BRAGG. May I ask the gentleman from Michigan a question? Because a man was a good soldier does it follow that he is a good stenographer?

Mr. HORR. No; but when a man was a good soldier and is a good stenographer he has just as much right to a place under this Government as a man who is simply a good stenographer and was not a good citizen. Is that satisfactory? I am not going into the causes for the removal of these men. That was a matter upon which the Speaker had to be satisfied. I have known him from his boyhood. He is a conscientious man; he is as honorable a man as any of you gentlemen who are assailing him. I say that he had good reason for the removal of these men; and he put in their stead men who had done long and valued service for this Government.

Mr. MCMILLIN. If the gentleman knows that there were good reasons for these removals, will he do us the favor to say what the reasons were?

Mr. HORR. That is not a question for the House to determine.

Mr. RANDALL. Oh, yes.

Mr. HORR. I beg the gentleman's pardon.

Mr. RANDALL. The rules are the property of the House.

Mr. HORR. It is a matter for the Speaker to determine, as the gentleman from Pennsylvania well knows, for he has determined matters of this kind scores of times during his service as Speaker.

Mr. RANDALL. Let me answer that. That modification of this rule changing it from what it was formerly was for the purpose, and the words "for cause" were put into that rule, drawn by the gentleman from Georgia, [Mr. STEPHENS,] a member of the Committee on Rules, and adopted by the unanimous vote of that committee on both sides—that insertion of the words "for cause" placed these two men who were stenographers for committees and the five official reporters of debates who sit at that desk beyond the reach of politics, requiring them only to be honest and capable, with the expert ability to perform their duties.

Mr. BLACKBURN. I desire to say a word——

Mr. HORR. I yield to the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. CALKINS.]

Mr. CALKINS. What was the purpose of these words being put into the rule?

Mr. BLACKBURN. Let me say a word. I desire simply to say in reference to this rule that the gentleman from Pennsylvania is entirely correct in his statement.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Michigan yield?

Mr. HORR. Yes; I want to hear the gentleman from Kentucky.

Mr. BLACKBURN. I desire to say the gentleman from Pennsylvania is entirely correct. The purpose and understanding of the Committee on Rules at the time this rule was adopted, and the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RANDALL] was himself at the time the Speaker of this House, were expressly stated in the room of the Committee on Rules, when this matter was under consideration——

The CHAIRMAN. Debate is exhausted on the pending amendment.

Mr. CALKINS. I will move to strike out the last word, and yield to the gentleman from Kentucky.

Mr. BLACKBURN. It was then stated, if the res gestæ are to come in and constitute any part of the consideration here—it was then stated to the gentleman from Pennsylvania, who was at that time Speaker of this House, the rule being moved by the gentleman from Georgia, [Mr. STEPHENS,] who was then a member of the Committee on Rules, that this was intended to take away from the Speaker of the House the exercise of an arbitrary power, which the Speaker then and there declared, and now still declares, he never did exercise. Mr. STEPHENS was the mover of this rule, and stated it was for the purpose of stripping the Speaker of the House of any arbitrary power over the stenographers of the House. It was agreed to by the other members, Mr. RANDALL, Mr. STEPHENS, Mr. Garfield, Mr. FRYE, and myself, constituting that committee. This rule was agreed to on that statement made by the gentleman from Georgia, who moved, which made it imperative, as I understood and I doubt not the Committee on Rules understood, upon the Speaker to find cause, not to his satisfaction, I take it, but to the satisfaction of the House. [Cries of "No!" "No!" on the Republican side.]

Mr. CALKINS. Allow me for a moment. The whole matter comes at last to the construction of the words "for cause." There is a power lodged by that rule in somebody, and our friends on that side say it is lodged in the House, and gentlemen on this side seem to say it is lodged in the Speaker. Now, the whole subject is under consideration by the Judiciary Committee, and I suggest, Mr. Chairman, that it would be proper toward that committee to let it rest there without forcing this debate prematurely on it at this time.

Mr. KENNA. Very well; and let this provision go out at the same time.

Mr. BLACKBURN. I do not criticise in any unfriendly spirit the action of the Speaker of the House of Representatives. And I do not mean to be so understood.

Mr. CALKINS. I understand that now the difference is reduced to a small compass, and we need not get into any wrangle about it. The whole question is in reference to the power to judge of that "cause" for which removal is to take place, whether vested in the Speaker or in the House. That subject is under investigation by the Committee on the Judiciary. Why go into all this debate when we have referred it for report to the Committee on the Judiciary? There is no doubt about the fact this man performed this service. Now, let us pass this bill to pay him for it, and determine the other question when it comes up. Let us go on with the bill.

Mr. BLOUNT. I move to strike out the last word.

Mr. CALKINS. I have not yielded the floor.

Mr. HORR. I ask the gentleman from Indiana to yield to me.

Mr. CALKINS. Certainly.

Mr. HORR. I ask the gentleman from Kentucky, as he seems to be familiar with this subject, whether this clause in this appropriation bill is not simply to pay a man engaged by the man who was removed, to do his work on this committee? He was not appointed by any one of these men who have since been put in by the Speaker.

Mr. ROBESON. He was appointed by Mr. Devine to take his place before the Foreign Affairs Committee when he was sick or pretended to be sick.

Mr. SPRINGER. The gentleman is mistaken in that.

Mr. ROBESON. I know it is true, because he told me so himself.

Mr. RANDALL. I wish to say Mr. Devine lives within a few doors of where I reside, and that when the gentleman from New Jersey uses the language that Mr. Devine "pretended to be sick" he is not warranted in doing so, because I know Mr. Devine was actually sick.

Mr. CALKINS. Well, he was appointed simply to take the place of the regular stenographer, who was otherwise employed, and that is all there is of it. This is to provide for his pay.

Mr. RANDALL. Very well; but I do not want the gentleman from New Jersey to make such an insinuation against the character of Mr. Devine without a response to it. He is not a man to pretend sickness.

Mr. ROBESON. I saw him in the Capitol myself at the time he was said to be sick.

Mr. RANDALL. I did not hear the gentleman from New Jersey.

Mr. ROBESON. I say that I saw him myself in the Capitol on the day that he was said to be sick.

Mr. RANDALL. I know of my personal knowledge that he was under the care of a physician and threatened with a rush of blood to the head, and has since been prostrated by that disease.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair understands the pro forma amendment to be withdrawn.

Mr. BLOUNT. I renew the amendment. The gentleman from Michigan has stated that these reporters were removed for cause. The question is raised here as to who should judge of that cause, whether it be the Speaker of the House or the members of the House. With that issue I shall not take up the time of the committee. I conceive that if the power is with the Speaker to remove for cause it would be but a proper regard for the members of the House over whom he presides to state the cause when he finds occasion to remove a faithful and competent officer of the House.

Mr. ATHERTON. And to state it also to the party removed.

Mr. BLOUNT. I presume it would not be a removal for a cause which is to be secret in the breast of the Speaker or of the gentleman from Michigan, but one which we have a right to ask and a right to know; and when this House chooses to ask for the cause it cannot be regarded as impertinent or an unwarrantable interference with the functions of the Speaker.

The gentleman from Michigan has intimated that the cause of trouble on this side of the House was because these men were Democrats.

Mr. STEELE. I rise to a point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. STEELE. I make the point of order that the gentleman should confine himself to the substance of the pending proposition.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Georgia will proceed.

Mr. STEELE. I would like to have a ruling on the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is of opinion that the gentleman is proceeding in the line warranted by the previous debate.

Mr. BLOUNT. These reporters, who were here long before the Democratic party came into possession of the House, appointed by Republican Speakers and continued afterward, were removed for cause, which cause is unknown to the House. Now, who is to assign that cause or to determine its validity? Was the service improved by this change?

The substitute appointed for Mr. Hayes, one of the removed official stenographers, was sent before the Committee on Foreign Affairs to report for us what is known as the Shipherd investigation, and after two or three days it became known to the committee that we were being very inaccurately reported.

The fact was called to the attention of the members of the committee by the principal witness also, and it was known and acknowledged by every member of the committee that the report was absolutely inaccurate and unreliable, and the reporter himself came up and admitted his deficiency and asked to be excused from any further attempt to report the proceedings before the committee.

Mr. WALKER. Did he not state the cause why he asked to be excused?

Mr. BLOUNT. Did he not state the cause! Why, it was because he could not do it. He was, he said, entirely out of practice, and thought that he would come and practice for our committee for a few days and get his hand in!

Mr. WALKER. Did he not state the cause?

Mr. BLOUNT. He did. That was his own admission and the report shows it. The Speaker of the House was exceedingly unfortunate when he removed the old reporters who had been approved here both by Democrats and Republicans and admitted to be men of integrity, ability, and character, and appointed a man to fill their places who was utterly incompetent. The committee after having labored for several days on an important investigation, and after occupying their time with an immense mass of testimony, found that the whole work was entirely worthless and the new appointee asked to be relieved from the duty. The committee then had to call upon Mr. Hayes, the man who had been removed "for cause," to get a report of the proceedings. He made his report, and it was acknowledged to be correct.

Mr. WILSON Mr. Chairman, I desire to say a few words in addition to what has been said by my colleague on the Committee on Foreign Affairs, [Mr. BLOUNT,] though I do not fully agree with him.

Mr. HISCOCK. I insist that debate should be limited to the point before the committee. The motion is to strike out the clause, and I hope debate will be limited to the motion.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state that the pending motion is to strike out this clause.

Mr. WILSON. I was recognized, and hope the gentleman from New York [Mr. HISCOCK] will not disturb me, but permit me to proceed without further interruption.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will hear the gentleman from West Virginia.

Mr. WILSON. I desire to be heard for a few moments upon this question of construction—construction of the first section of the thirty-sixth rule of this House. That section is in the following language:

The appointment and removal, for cause, of the official reporters of the House, including stenographers of committees, and the manner of the execution of their duties, shall be vested in the Speaker.

Thus it will be seen, Mr. Chairman, that the House has vested in the Speaker the power to remove for cause. It is within his power and it his duty to fill a vacancy should one occur.

Mr. HORR. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question right there, as to what the question of the removal of these men has to do with this law?

Mr. WILSON. I will answer my friend, if he will be patient for a little while. The legal status of these reporters depends upon the construction of this rule and the law.

Mr. HORR. The question I wish to ask is this——

Mr. WILSON. I hope the gentleman will not consume my time. It is within the power of the Speaker and it is his duty under the rule to remove a reporter of this House or of one of its committees if he believes there is sufficient cause for it. Primarily he is the sole judge of the cause of removal, nor is he required to explain the cause at the time the removal is made.

Section 54 of the fifth chapter of the Revised Statutes is as follows:

No person shall be employed as a reporter for the House of Representatives without the approval of the Speaker.

Now, under the law no person shall be appointed without the approval of the Speaker and under the rule to which I have referred the appointing power is vested in the Speaker in case of removal to be exercised only for cause. The plain English of the statute and the rule considered together leaves no doubt that this removing and appointing power has been by the House vested in the Speaker.

Is it not absurd to suppose that when the Speaker is about to make a removal he must first submit the case to the House and ask the House to pass upon the "cause?"

Mr. SPRINGER. Let me ask the gentleman——

Mr. WILSON. I will make a fair statement if the gentleman will allow me to proceed. Now, the removing power is with the Speaker, and he is not required to explain to the House at the time of the removal the cause thereof. But after the Speaker has exercised this power and made the removal this House can, if it desires to do so, call upon him to state what the cause was. This information, I take it, can be called for for the information of the House by a simple resolution, and if it shall be thought proper to give the deposed stenographers an opportunity of refuting the alleged cause, the whole subject can properly be referred to the Judiciary Committee, or possibly to the Committee on Rules, or to a special committee, before whom both the Speaker and the deposed stenographer can be heard.

Mr. ATHERTON. Let me ask the gentleman from West Virginia a question. Where it is provided that a man is to be removed "for cause" does not that intimate that the cause shall be made known to him?

Mr. WILSON. Not necessarily at the time of removal. The President of the United States may remove any officer where that power is vested in him, and he is not required to give to the country or to the party removed the cause of the removal. If, however, he shall exercise his high power improperly and from corrupt motives this House has the power to impeach him and the Senate the power to try him on that impeachment. Heretofore the Speaker possessed the arbitrary power to appoint and remove whomsoever he pleased. The change in the rule by adding the words "for cause" was designed to take away from the Speaker this arbitrary power, the power to remove for personal or political reasons.

Let us look at the subject impartially, without prejudice for or against the parties concerned. I know Mr. Hayes and Mr. Devine. I regard them both as very competent and worthy men and believe them to be good stenographers. If I had had the appointing or removing power I should have retained them. The Speaker, for reasons satisfactory to himself, thought and acted otherwise, and we should acquiesce, at least until the matter shall be investigated by a committee.

Mr. RANDALL. Does not the word "cause," in its legal significance, carry with it a right to be heard?

Mr. WILSON. Of course it carries with it the right to be heard. When the House shall refer the matter to a committee and that committee shall come to investigate the question, then the Speaker may be called upon to assign the cause of removal, and the deposed officer may then be heard.

I am sustained in the position I have taken, Mr. Chairman, by the action of this House on this very subject. On March 29 of the present year the distinguished gentleman from Georgia, [Mr. STEPHENS,] upon a question of privilege, submitted the following correspondence and offered the following resolution:

SPEAKER'S ROOM, HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
Washington, March 23, 1882.

SIR: You are hereby notified that you have been this day removed for cause as a stenographic reporter of committees of the House of Representatives.

J. WARREN KEIFER,
Speaker House of Representatives.

HENRY G. HAYES, Esq.,
Stenographer, House of Representatives.

WASHINGTON, D. C., March 24, 1882.

SIR: I respectfully ask to be informed of the cause for which I am removed, by your notification of yesterday, from my official position as stenographic reporter of committees of the House of Representatives.

Your obedient servant,

HENRY G. HAYES.

Hon. J. WARREN KEIFER,
Speaker of the House of Representatives

SPEAKER'S ROOM, HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
Washington, March 24, 1882.

SIR: I am directed by the Speaker to acknowledge the receipt of your note of this date, and to advise you in reply that he does not think that any public or private purpose will be subserved by furnishing a detailed statement of the cause or causes which have led to your removal as stenographic reporter of committees of the House.

He is desirous, however, that you should not be led by the language of the letter of removal to infer that any criticism was intended to be made upon your private character.

Very truly, yours,

C. C. ROYCE, Private Secretary.

HENRY G. HAYES, ESQ., Washington, D. C.

WASHINGTON, D. C., March 28, 1882.

SIR: I have waited for the last five days in the hope that you would, on further consideration of the rules of the House, recall your letter of the 23d instant, notifying me that you had removed me from my office.

As you have not assigned any cause for your action, have refused to assign any, and have (so far as I am aware) none to assign, I beg, respectfully, to inform you that I do not recognize its legality.

Very respectfully,

HENRY G. HAYES.

Hon. J. WARREN KEIFER,
Speaker House of Representatives.

And whereas it is claimed on behalf of Mr. Hayes that the action of the Speaker in the premises does not legally constitute removal for cause: Therefore,

Resolved, That the Committee on the Judiciary be instructed to make full inquiry into the facts of the case and to report without delay, and at any time, what is the legal tenure of the official reporters, and whether Mr. Hayes has lawfully ceased to be an officer of the House; also to make such investigation in the matter as the committee may deem proper.

Now, Mr. Chairman, Mr. STEPHENS upon that occasion desired to be heard. The Speaker requested that he should be heard, and expressed his own desire to state the reasons which had led him to the removal of Mr. Hayes. The House had it then in its power to hear these reasons. The Speaker was ready and willing to communicate them. He expressed his desire to do so, but he was cut off by an objection. The matter was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, and I suppose that at an early day we will have a report from that committee, giving the grounds for the Speaker's action.

There seems to be an implied complaint against the Speaker here because he has not heretofore explained to the House the cause for this removal. But, Mr. Chairman, upon the only occasion when this subject was before the House, and the Speaker could properly assign the cause, he announced his readiness and his willingness to do so, and it was no fault of his that the House did not hear him. There has been no occasion since when it would have been proper for him to revive the subject before the House, nor will there be again until the report of the committee comes in. The question has gone to the committee. I have no doubt that both the Speaker and Mr. Hayes will be heard by it. If there was not sufficient "cause" the committee will ascertain and report it; if there was cause the committee will report that fact.

After all said and done, Mr. Chairman, as I before observed, the only question before us is the construction of the thirty-sixth rule. The Speaker is empowered to do a certain thing for "cause." He is to be the judge of that "cause," and is responsible to the House if he fails to properly exercise the power conferred upon him; it is the merest twaddle to suppose that he must first consult the House as to the propriety of his action. He is charged with a duty, and in performing that duty he is responsible. If properly done he is to be commended for it, and not otherwise.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the pro forma amendment. If there be no objection it will be considered as withdrawn.

Mr. ROBESON. I renew the pro forma amendment. I desire for the purpose of settling this question to read the law, not the rule. The law on this case, the statute law is:

No person shall be employed as a reporter of the House—

This House of Representatives—without the approval of the Speaker.

Now, that is the law. The rule undertakes to say this:

The appointment and removal for cause of the official reporters of the House, including stenograpers of committees and the manner of the execution of their duties, shall be vested in the Speaker.

If that rule changes the law, or undertakes to change the law, how does it change it? I say it has no power to change the law. But if it has power to change it, what Speaker is intended? The Speaker of the last House or of the House before? Is the office of stenographer of this House a life appointment?

Mr. SPRINGER. Under the statute it is.

Mr. ROBESON. What statute? The statute is to be found in the seventeenth volume of the Statutes at Large, page 47.

Mr. RANDALL. Will the gentleman from New Jersey allow me to state that the law he has read was passed to restrict the power of the contractor for the publishing of the Congressional Globe, so that he might not at his own will and caprice remove these gentlemen without the permission of the Speaker and the House; and it has no application whatever to the present system, under which we select our own reporters and do our own printing.

Mr. WILSON. With the permission of the gentleman from New Jersey, I would ask the gentleman from Pennsylvania this one question: Can the President of the United States, or can any other officer holding the appointing and removing power, be required at the time he deposes an officer to state the cause of his deposition or removal?

Mr. RANDALL. If the law says so, or any rule restraining him, yes.

Mr. ROBESON. I believe I have the floor. All that I say is that no matter what the law was passed for the law was passed, and is on the statute-book, and it binds us and controls our rules, if they are controlled by it. If it does not control them then will any man say that the rules of the last House and their execution by the Speaker of the last House binds this House? Do you mean to say that the Speaker of the last House could make an appointment that would last forever, unless you could find some cause for the removal of that appointee which will meet the approval of everybody?

Then another legal point: where the law, or where the rule says that a man may be removed for cause, and gives the power to a court or to any individual to remove for cause it gives the judgment of that cause to the person in whose hands is vested the power of removal. Nobody can dispute that.

Mr. SPRINGER. I dispute it.

Mr. REED. Nobody else will.

Mr. ROBESON. Now, to come back to the simple question here. We did not enter into an examination of this question; it is before the Committee on the Judiciary, and the Committee on Appropriations did not undertake to regulate it. But the committee found that this man had performed this service, that he had been employed by one reporter or the other, by Mr. Devine when he was sick, we will say; admit him to have been sick. We found that he had performed the service and we propose to appropriate the money to pay him.

Now, that has nothing to do with the question of the removal of the other reporter, or the installation of any new one. We have recommended this appropriation according to precedents set by Democratic Congresses here for the last ten years.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. BLACKBURN. I desire to ask the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. ROBESON] a question.

Mr. REED. If the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. BLACKBURN] will permit me, the time of the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. ROBESON] has expired.

If the House will do me the favor to listen for a few moments, I think I can explain this matter so that at least there need not be any confusion of thought about it. I had no purpose to participate in this debate, since the matter was under consideration by the committee of which I am the chairman. But it so happens that we have gone into this debate just far enough to give to the House and to the country an entirely wrong impression of this affair, unless the law be accurately stated.

Now, I do not care what the design and intention of the Committee on Rules was when they inserted the words "for cause." Those words, when they were adopted by the House, did not express the opinion of the Committee on Rules, but they expressed the opinion of the House, interpreted according to the principles of law. The words "for cause" have a distinct, positive, and technical meaning, which the House is conclusively presumed to have understood when it adopted those words.

The language employed is precise. It is not "for cause specified, to be placed upon the Journal." It is not for "specified cause." It is "for cause," solely and simply. Now, the law is accurately stated in the two hundred and fiftieth paragraph of Dillon on Municipal Corporations and in the cases cited in the notes.

It is there declared that the expression "for specified cause" requires a statement of the cause and notice to the party. But if it be "for cause" only and simply, as it is in our rules, then it is only a question for the conscience of the man vested with the power of removal. And there is no case to be found in the books which takes any other ground or can take any other ground.

And I beg leave to go further and explain to the House the sound sense of that rule. We cannot afford to spend our time trying the little misdemeanors of our officers. We must lodge in somebody executory power; we must have somebody who can take instant cognizance of the fault and can remove the man for cause.

We have chosen to lodge that power in this case in the Speaker. When we lodged it in him, without demanding from him the specification of the cause, we gave him full, complete, thorough power upon that subject. He has exercised that power; and the House having given him the power, he has exercised what the House has required him to exercise as its organ.

I am perfectly well aware that Mr. Blaine stated that he would construe that rule for his own personal convenience and in regard to his own personal ideas by stating the cause on the record. But that is only his individual statement of what he would do. It is in no sense the statement of the law. I believe this cannot be gainsaid.

Mr. CARLISLE. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. REED. Certainly.

Mr. CARLISLE. If the argument of the gentleman is correct, and if it is altogether unnecessary for the Speaker to state what is the cause of removal, will he explain to the House what is the meaning of the words "for cause" in the rule; what office do they perform?

Mr. REED. The meaning of the words "for cause" is to notify the Speaker that, although he is acting upon his own honor and upon his own conscience, nevertheless it will be his duty, judging for himself, to determine deliberately that there is cause for his action [Laughter.] He is the sole judge of the sufficiency of that cause.

Mr. ATHERTON. Would he not have to do that anyhow?

Mr. BLACKBURN. Waiving all questions as to whether the politics of the gentleman from Maine are admirable or not, I undertake to say there is not a member on this floor who knows him who does not know that he is a good lawyer; and from the stand-point of a lawyer, I ask him to answer me this one question: Does he not know, and is he not willing to admit, that when he tries a case at bar he has two methods of challenging jurors; he may challenge a juror peremptorily or he may challenge him "for cause," the identical words employed in this rule, and advisedly employed. If he challenges the juror "for cause," he must state the cause of that challenge to the court.

Mr. REED. All I have to say is that if the gentleman from Kentucky puts that question to me in sincerity, I cannot return the compliment about being a good lawyer.

Mr. BLACKBURN. I do put it in all sincerity; and I apologize to the House for having declared that the gentleman was a good lawyer.

Mr. REED. I sincerely think that my friend from Kentucky is, at the expense of his legal standing, undertaking to be bright. [Laughter.]

Mr. BLACKBURN. I ask him——

Mr. REED. I answer plainly, that of course the lawyer challenging a juror for cause must specify the cause, for it depends upon the decision of the judge whether the cause is a good one or not. [Laughter and applause.]

Mr. BLACKBURN. If your construction of the rule is correct, is there any court or any place on earth except this House where you may make a challenge "for cause," without stating the cause?

Mr. REED. The gentleman knows there is a total difference, a world-wide difference in the meaning of the expression in the two cases. In this case it is a legal term the interpretation of which has been settled by the courts time out of mind. I am not making statements on my own authority; I am making them because they are law and because the courts have repeatedly declared them to be law. When my friend compliments me for my knowledge of the law he only compliments me for my diligence in hunting up what the courts have determined upon this subject.

Mr. BLACKBURN. The Speaker of this House from your own State did not think it law.

Mr. REED. The Speaker from my State never said otherwise. If you will read the language with any sort of care you will see that my interpretation is correct. I know what I am talking about. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. Two amendments are pending. The question is on the amendment to the amendment.

Mr. HISCOCK. I move that the committee rise for the purpose of limiting debate on this subject.

The motion was not agreed to.

The question being taken on the amendment to the amendment, it was not agreed to.

Mr. WILLIAMS, of Wisconsin. Mr. Chairman, I think that in justice to several parties concerned I should say a word. I understand the provision in this bill is to pay the stenographer who did the work before the Committee on Foreign Affairs, Mr. Andem. I meant to say that he did his work exceedingly well; and I see no reason why he should not be paid.

Now a word in regard to Mr. Dawson. After the removal of one of the official stenographers Mr. Dawson came before the committee to report its proceedings. While it was finally discovered that there were serious inaccuracies in his notes, I do not think there was any such imperfection in his work as I have heard intimated here to-day. At least I do not see why either his work or his record should be attacked with feeling, as it seems to have been. When the imperfec-tions were pointed out and the importance stated of having the testimony taken verbatim in order to be reported to the House, Mr. Dawson with great candor stated to the committee that he had been embarrassed by the circumstances under which he appeared; that he knew he was met by opposition growing out of some feeling as to his appointment, in which I take no part and I do not care to discuss. He at once in a candid manner admitted that there were imperfections in his notes; that he had been out of practice and that he was willing to surrender the work if his services were not acceptable to the committee.

Mr. BLOUNT. Will my friend allow me to ask him one question?

Mr. WILLIAMS, of Wisconsin. Certainly.

Mr. BLOUNT. I ask my friend from Wisconsin whether he ever used this language in the committee-room:

It seems to be too bad to lose the entire session to-day. If we had a reasonably accurate reporter we might go on.

Mr. WILLIAMS, of Wisconsin. Certainly I used that language, because at that time the testimony was found to be defective. We tried to procure a substitute, but no available substitute was at hand. I did use that expression, not in condemnation of the action of Mr. Dawson, for my friend will remember I stated that Mr. Dawson had the sympathy of the committee, but because the committee had lost the day's session.

I think it unfair and unjust for severe criticisms to be renewed here to go to the country, when Mr. Dawson before the committee admitted his imperfections and candidly stated in a gentlemanly manner just what his embarrassments were. I therefore speak in justice to him and in justice to Mr. Andem, for the payment of whose services this bill provides.

Now, as to the cause for removal of the official reporter, it is an open secret, or I should rather say an open, conceded fact, that the Speaker has not only been ready but anxious to give to the House and the country the cause for removal. I do not argue the matter, nor do I profess to know the facts; I take it for granted that the Speaker is able, as I know he is willing and anxious, to state his own case. The matter has been referred to a committee for report, and we should wait until that report has been submitted.

Mr. WILSON. My recollection is, Mr. Chairman, that when the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. STEPHENS] offered his resolution on this subject, i. e., to inquire into the cause of Mr. Devine's removal, and which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, that the Speaker of the House then asked to be permitted to state to the House the cause for the removal which had been made, and that some gentleman on the other side of the House objected to it and prevented his making that statement.

Mr. ROBESON. I objected to it.

Mr. WILSON. The gentleman from New Jersey objected, and I believe several others objected. The Speaker then wished to state the cause he had for the removal, but the House refused to hear him.

Mr. WILLIAMS, of Wisconsin. Certainly the Speaker announced his readiness and desire to state the causes. Others around me heard it, and the record will show it; but he was prevented by objection. There need be no feeling about it. I did not rise to express any feeling, but to do justice, so far as the facts demand, to Mr. Andem, Mr. Dawson, and the Speaker of the House. I hope that report will come in; and if the Speaker is not vindicated, then let us condemn him and vindicate whoever deserves vindication; but do not drag him irregularly, pell-mell into a five-minute debate, where of course he cannot reply.

Mr. CARLISLE. Mr. Chairman, it has not been my purpose to take any part in this discussion, and in fact I have heard but little of it; but after the somewhat remarkable position taken by the gentleman from Maine [Mr. REED] in response to my question, I think I ought to say a few words at least.

If I understand the gentleman from Maine, he concedes that the words "for cause" were inserted in this rule for some purpose, but he says that they are addressed to the Speaker alone, and whenever he has sufficient cause in his judgment to remove a reporter of the House he may do so and keep the cause concealed in his own bosom.

If this be true, Mr. Chairman, I suggest to the chairman of the Judiciary Committee of this House whether it is not equivalent in every respect to an absolute arbitrary power on the part of the Speaker to remove without any cause whatever. For if he is under no obligation to state to the House the precise cause, or some cause, for the removal, the gentleman will see at once that he need in fact have no cause for the removal except his own will.

Now, sir, the Speaker of this House in a legal sense is just as much the servant of the House as any one of the reporters who sits at that desk, or one of the stenographers for committees. He is simply the organ of the House, and when he removes one of these reporters he does it as the organ or agent of the House of Representatives and by its authority.

This power to remove an officer is not conferred upon him individually, or as a mere perquisite or appendage to his office; but it is given to him as the organ and head of the House as an organized body; and when he removes a reporter he removes an officer of the House, and this body has a right to know the cause for which that removal is made.

The Sergeant-at-Arms or Doorkeeper of the House may remove one of his subordinates, and although there is no rule requiring him to state the cause, yet it is entirely clear that the House has the right at all times to disapprove of his action and reinstate that employé immediately. How much stronger is the case, then, when the Speaker, in the exercise, not of an individual power belonging to him personally, but in the exercise of a power conferred upon him as the representative of the House in that matter, how much stronger upon him is the obligation to report that action to the House, with the cause for its approval or disapproval?

I say, Mr. Chairman, that no lawyer can escape the proposition, if the gentleman from Maine is correct in holding that the Speaker may keep the cause concealed in his own breast that he has absolute, unlimited power to remove without cause, and the words "for cause" inserted in this rule mean nothing whatever.

There is one other question suggested by the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. ROBESON] about which there is more difficulty, and that is whether these reporters are continuing officers from Congress to Congress, or whether their terms expire with the expiration of the Congress for which they were appointed. I say there is some difficulty about that question; but we have officers here who continue to serve from Congress to Congress, and if the gentleman from New Jersey be correct in his intimation then there is not an official reporter of this House sitting at that desk, and all the reports of the House are purely of an unofficial character.

Mr. ROBESON. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. CARLISLE. Certainly.

Mr. ROBESON. When the Revised Statutes of the United States provide that "no person shall be employed as a reporter for the House of Representatives without the approval of the Speaker," does that mean the present Speaker or the past?

Mr. CARLISLE. Of course it means the Speaker then in the chair. But that clause to which the gentleman refers is a part of the old statute providing for the reporting of the debates of this House by contract ——

Mr. ROBESON. This is a section of the Revised Statutes re-enacted.

Mr. CARLISLE. If the gentleman will go to the original law he will find that it provided for the reporting of the debates of the House by contract, with the right in the contractor to select his own reporters; and the House of Representatives provided as a part of that contract that no man should be employed to sit at the desk as a reporter without the approval of the Speaker. The gentleman who is now reporting my remarks has been at that desk for twenty-two years without reappointment.

Mr. ROBESON. With the approval of the Speaker.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman's time has expired.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

The committee informally rose, and the Speaker resumed the Chair.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. SHOBER, its Acting Secretary, announced that the Senate had agreed to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendment of the House to the bill of the Senate (No. 1095) to provide for the erection of a public building at Poughkeepsie, New York.

The message further announced that the Senate had passed a concurrent resolution authorizing the printing for the use of the Navy Department of 1,000 copies of the report of the Surgeon-General of the Navy, and a joint resolution (S. No. 95) providing for additional copies of the Revised Statutes for the use of the Interior Department; in which the concurrence of the House of Representatives was requested.

SUNDRY CIVIL APPROPRIATION BILL.

The Committee of the Whole resumed its session.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair desires to state to the committee that in view of the objections made by the gentleman from New York that the debate should be confined under the rule to the pending proposition, and inasmuch as considerable time has been consumed already by unanimous consent, he now feels compelled to recognize the objection of the gentleman from New York to further debate.

The question is now upon the amendment to the amendment, which, not being withdrawn, the Chair submits to the vote of the committee.

The pro forma amendment was not agreed to.

Mr. MCCOID rose.

The CHAIRMAN. Debate upon the pending amendment is exhausted.

Mr. MCCOID. I move to strike out the last two words.

Mr. HISCOCK. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Iowa yield for that motion?

Mr. BLACKBURN. Does the gentleman from New York propose to adjourn?

Mr. HISCOCK. I do.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair must recognize the gentleman from Iowa, and after he has spoken will recognize the gentleman from New York to make the motion.

Mr. HISCOCK. But the moment the gentleman concludes his five minutes then the Chair must recognize some other gentleman to occupy the five minutes on the other side. I hope the gentleman from Iowa will give way for the motion.

I will say to the gentleman from Iowa, and to the other side of the House, that the reputation of the present Speaker of the House is not made to depend upon this clause or any action in reference to this matter.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair recognizes the force of what the gentleman says; but the gentleman from Iowa is recognized, and upon the conclusion of what he has to say the Chair will recognize the gentleman from New York to make the motion.

Mr. HISCOCK. I insist upon my motion as always in order.

The CHAIRMAN. Not when the gentleman from Iowa has been recognized. A gentleman cannot be taken off the floor for the motion that the committee rise.

Mr. McCOID. The gentleman himself is occupying more time than I would have occupied in the few remarks I desire to submit.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Iowa as entitled to the floor.

Mr. McCOID. Mr. Chairman, I have not taken up any of the time of the committee upon this bill; but I cannot allow the assertions made by the gentleman from New York or by the gentleman from Illinois to go without a protest with reference to the gentleman who has recently been appointed as a stenographer for the committees of this House. I do not think the gentleman from New York, with his usual fairness and disposition to do justice, knew the injury he was doing and the wrong he was committing by his declaration as to the incompetency of the gentleman whom the Speaker has seen proper to appoint.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I know this appointee. I have known him for many years. He has been engaged in this work all the years of his life. He was official reporter to the district court of the State of Iowa, and he has been a reporter for different papers and in different capacities ever since. He never worked for anybody—and he has worked for men who are good judges of what was required to constitute a skillful reporter—but he never worked for any person who made a complaint or questioned his competency before.

Let me say to the committee that he came into this corps as a reporter for committees, and no man, no matter what may be his experience or qualifications, can enter this new field and perform its duties to his own satisfaction until he has acquired a knowledge of what is required. I venture the assertion that no man could come into this corps and take a seat at that desk and follow the speeches in this House who would not make at the beginning of his services in that capacity inaccuracies, for it would be to him a new field in which he could not give satisfaction even to himself without some experience in it.

Mr. COX, of New York. Will the gentleman allow me to make a suggestion? I desire to say this, that if I have done any injustice to his constituent I will make the proper reparation; but I am told by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. REAGAN] that he failed before the Committee on Commerce, and we all know of his failure before the Committee on Foreign Affairs. What I have said therefore about him is a matter of public notoriety.

Mr. McCOID. He was not experienced and in practice in the peculiar work that he was called upon to do at first. If I am correctly informed, and I believe I am, Mr. White, a member of the corps here, had for months, when he began, assistance to do his work. I say every man on that corps when he went upon it required some assistance before he became familiar with the work.

Now, this man Dawson was immediately put upon the most difficult work in the House, to make a verbatim report before the Committee on Commerce of the testimony of a most rapid witness, of an erratic witness, of a witness difficult to follow; and there he made inaccuracies. Again, he had a right to review his report and to correct it before it went to the Printer. And yet he was left in ignorance of that for several weeks after the difficulty occurred. He was afterward informed of the rule that he had a right to review his manuscript and correct it before the testimony went into the permanent minutes. He did not do that. He came into this corps of reporters and he was put on that committee by the side of Mr. Hayes, who reported—not verbatim—he reported for the press.

Mr. BLOUNT. He reported verbatim.

Mr. McCOID. He was not required to do so.

Mr. BLOUNT. But he did so.

Mr. McCOID. He did not; but with his experience he might well do it. But the trial at the time was not a fair one. He says he knew how to do his work correctly and satisfactorily. He does it to-day in the Committee on the Judiciary, where the work is as difficult as before the other committee. He can do his work efficiently in that capacity. He really is competent, but himself ill, crowded conspicuously forward to the most difficult work, embarrassed by an atmosphere of opposition, deserted by assistants, perhaps even the object of conspiracy, the test was not a fair one. He will prove, I confidently assert, to be as rapid and correct a reporter as any in the House.

Messrs. Hayes and Devine, in their letter which is presented by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. RANDALL,] say that before their removal "the stenographic work done for committees was probably twice as much as the work since, yet it was all done by us alone."

It is a sufficient answer and commentary upon the weight that should be given to this and all their other statements, whether found in the Associated Press dispatches or elsewhere, to say that part of this very item in this bill is for work done before their removal, and no part of it is for work done by any substitute employed by Mr. Dawson.

The gentleman from Illinois has presented what purports to be a part of the record of the Committee on Foreign Affairs on the day when the attempt to crush Mr. Dawson culminated as between Mr. Hayes and Mr. Shipherd by the complaints of that witness of inaccuracies in the report of his evidence. That was not a record of the committee, but on the contrary was stricken from the records, as I am informed, by a unanimous vote. It is the report of what occurred by Mr. Hayes himself, Mr. Dawson's enemy, whose conferences with Mr. Shipherd preceded the denouement on that day. But I am glad the gentleman from Illinois gave it a place in the RECORD. It will show the modesty, candor, and true gentlemanly worth of character of Mr. Dawson, that modesty which ever accompanies true skill and worth; that candor and truth of statement which ever bespeaks conscious ability.

It displays to sympathizing and appreciative hearts a retiring disposition, an unassuming spirit which refused to assert its own worth and was ready to submit speedily to adverse criticism. And yet, sir, that noble spirit which on that day was almost crushed before cruel and unjust imputations as to his competency is the same heroic one which, forgetful of self and all else but country, could on the field of battle catch the falling flag amid the leaden storm and carry it into the jaws of death. What he did for others he could not do for himself. Sir, there are times when true worth and skill shrink from the stings of depreciation, and yet that very shrinking is the best evidence of their genuine merit, while the effrontery of assault is the best evidence of demerit. I read in that pretended record the simple proof of that genuine worth which will, when Mr. Dawson is known, win for him the confidence and the friendship of every member of this House.

Mr. SPRINGER addressed the committee. [See Appendix.]

Mr. HISCOCK. I move that the committee now rise for the purpose of limiting debate on this paragraph.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. KASSON reported that the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union had had under consideration the bill (H. R. No. 6716) making appropriations for sundry civil expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1883, and for other purposes, and had come to no resolution thereon.

Mr. HISCOCK. I move that the House now resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the sundry civil bill; and pending that motion I move that all debate on the proposition now under discussion and all amendments thereto in the committee be limited to five minutes. I will let the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. BRAGG] have that time.

Mr. SPRINGER. Say ten minutes.

Mr. H'SCOCK. No; I say five minutes. And I move further that all debate on the bill hereafter shall be confined to substantial amendments.

The SPEAKER. The Chair can submit the first of these propositions. The gentleman from New York moves that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, and pending that he moves that all debate on the pending paragraph and amendments thereto be limited to five minutes.

The question being taken on the motion to limit debate, it was agreed to.

Mr. HISCOCK. I now move that debate on this bill hereafter be confined to substantial amendments and not be allowed on pro forma amendments.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks that motion would not be in order.

Mr. HISCOCK. I ask unanimous consent.

Objection was made.

The SPEAKER. The question recurs on the motion that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

The motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, Mr. KASSON in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. By order of the House debate on the pending paragraph and all amendments thereto is to be closed in five minutes.

Mr. BRAGG rose.

Mr. BURROWS, of Michigan. Will the gentleman from Wisconsin yield to me for a moment that I may address a question to the gentleman from Iowa, [Mr. McCOID?] Is it not a fact that he himself and the other members of the Iowa delegation in this House, as well as the Senators from that State, urged on the Speaker of the House this appointment?

Mr. McCOID. That is true; Mr. Dawson was recommended by them and by all who were asked about it.

Mr. BRAGG. The gentleman from Maine, [Mr. REED,] the chairman of the Judiciary Committee, desired that this debate should not be concluded until the whole case was correctly stated, lest the people at large should be misinformed as to the correct status and position of the question pending before the committee. In the statement so made, going to the country from the chairman of the Judiciary Committee of this House, I submit that he stated the law, abstractly, perhaps correctly; but that he stated the law as applicable to the question under consideration incorrectly. And I challenge the law as given by him to the country.

The gentleman stated that in Dillon it would be found that where removals should be made for cause there was a distinction between a cause and a cause specified; which I may be willing to consent is the law; but that law is not applicable to this case. Where a statute or a rule exists, where unqualified or unlimited power is conferred on a person or a body to do a thing in his or its discretion, and there is an amendment to that statute or an amendment to that rule by the addition of other words limiting the power as it existed in the original law or rule, there the law is universally conceded to be that the statute so amended or the rule so amended must be subsequently construed so as to give force and effect to the limitation which has been put upon the statute or put upon the rule.

Mr. CALKINS. Will the gentleman allow me a moment——

Mr. BRAGG. Therefore, when you say the addition of the words "for cause" does not limit the discretion or power which existed prior to the addition of the words "for cause," you decide that the amendment to the rule is a mere nullity, and you give the same construction to it that was given to it prior to the addition of the limitation of the power.

Mr. REED. Will the gentleman yield to me a moment?

Mr. BRAGG. Yes, sir.

Mr. REED. I think there is a plain distinction between a removal at will and a removal for cause, even if one person is the sole judge both of the existence of the cause and of the nature of the cause; but the gentleman's interpretation would give this amendment the force not of the words "for cause," but of the words "for specified cause," which in law are totally different expressions.

Mr. ATHERTON. For cause means specified cause.

Mr. BRAGG. I challenge the gentleman's law in his last statement just as much as I did before. The uniform course of decisions in the courts will challenge his statement.

Mr. REED. No, they will not; every one of them is on my side.

Mr. BRAGG. There comes, first, the power vested in the Speaker without limitation; that power gives him the right to remove in his discretion.

Mr. CALKINS. Not in his discretion simply, but at will, arbitrarily.

Mr. BRAGG. What is a power to be exercised at discretion except an arbitrary power to do that which the party who is clothed with the power chooses to do?

Mr. CALKINS. Allow me a moment. An arbitrary power of removal is not a power at discretion at all. When you put in the words "for cause," may not that be construed to say that the Speaker shall remove for that cause, making it similar to a discretionary power?

Mr. BRAGG. The arbitrary power of removal vests in the party to which the power is given to remove when he chooses. The power to remove at discretion is a power to remove when he chooses to do so. Arbitrary power and discretionary power, when vested in a judicial or other tribunal, are synonymous in their effects.

Mr. REED. Not so.

Mr. HAZELTON. In the one case he might abuse his discretion.

Mr. BRAGG. So he might abuse his arbitrary power.

Mr. MILLER. In the one case he would be subject to review by the courts above.

Mr. BRAGG. I thank the distinguished gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MILLER] for speaking about the subject of review. I ask him if he does not know as a lawyer that where a party is given power to remove at discretion it is equivalent to a power to remove arbitrarily and is not subject to review.

Mr. MILLER. Our supreme court has decided that there is such a thing as legal discretion which is subject to review; that when the power is purely arbitrary the exercise of it is not subject to review. I will state to the gentleman that the law courts of my State have so decided.

Mr. BRAGG. Then I will say to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MILLER] that the addition of the words "for cause" meets even his idea of the law, restricting the Speaker to the exercise of the power in his discretion. And if the decisions of the law courts of Pennsylvania are applicable, the Speaker, being the organ of this House, then this House as an appellate tribunal has the right to review the exercise of that discretionary power.

Mr. MILLER. If it is a legal discretion, it is subject to review.

The CHAIRMAN. By order of the House the time for debate upon the pending paragraph and all amendments thereto has expired. The pro forma amendment will be regarded as withdrawn. The question recurs on the motion of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. TOWNSHEND] to strike out the pending paragraph.

The question was taken; and upon a division there were—ayes 12, noes 75.

So (no further count being called for) the motion to strike out was not agreed to.

Mr. BLACKBURN. In accordance with the precedent that has prevailed here for years, and under which this side of the House was the beneficiary when it was in power, I ask permission to offer an amendment, to come in after the paragraph last read.

The Clerk read as follows:

To enable the Clerk of the House to pay to the officers and employés of the House of Representatives borne on the annual rolls on the 1st day of July, 1882, one month's extra pay at the compensation then paid them by law, which sum shall be immediately available.

Mr. HAZELTON. Is that limited to those only who are borne on the annual roll?

Mr. HISCOCK. I make a point of order on that amendment; it is not right.

Mr. HAZELTON. It provides only for those on the annual roll.

Mr. BLACKBURN. What is the point of order of the gentleman from New York?

Mr. HISCOCK. My point of order is that this amendment would change existing law and custom.

Mr. BLACKBURN. What modification does the gentleman suggest?

Mr. HAZELTON. Make it read "borne on the rolls."

Mr. VALENTINE. So that the session employés may receive the same compensation.

Mr. BLACKBURN. I am simply endeavoring to do what was done last year, and done by a proposition offered from the minority side of the House. Will the gentleman refer to the law of last year?

The CHAIRMAN. The law is before the Chair, and he will direct the Clerk to read it.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. KEIFER. I wish to offer an amendment, which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

"To enable the Clerk of the House to pay to the officers and employés of the House of Representatives borne on the annual roll on the 15th day of June, 1880, one month's extra pay at the compensation then paid them by law, which sum shall be immediately available."

Mr. BLACKBURN. My amendment is a verbatim copy of that.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order being waived, the Chair will hear the gentleman upon his amendment.

Mr. BLACKBURN. I have just had the law read, and I know a point of order does not lie against the amendment. A joint resolution can be introduced which will cover the cases which the gentleman from New York [Mr. HISCOCK] now has in mind. I am simply trying to follow the precedent and the law in providing for these employés of the Government.

Mr. HISCOCK. I desire to inquire of the gentleman from Kentucky what the practice has been as to session employés?

Mr. BLACKBURN. I will answer the gentleman that the practice, as I believe, without a single break in the precedents, has been to include those session employés in a joint resolution, which I will cordially support. I have the law here if the gentleman wishes to see it.

I will add that I am simply endeavoring to do what the other side of the House had been in the habit of doing for us in making a provision covering the cases reached by this amendment a part of this appropriation bill.

Mr. HOLMAN. The merits of the question are not before the committee. The gentleman does not address himself to the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will ask the gentleman from Indiana whether he rose to make his point of order before——

Mr. HISCOCK. No point of order is before the House.

Mr. HOLMAN. The point of order was raised by the gentleman from New York——

Mr. HISCOCK. It is withdrawn.

Mr. HOLMAN. I have renewed it.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair asks the gentleman whether he renewed it immediately on its being withdrawn?

Mr. HOLMAN. Instantly, upon being notified that the point of order was withdrawn.

Mr. BLACKBURN. I want to be heard on the point of order. This question has been debated on its merits, according to the testimony of the gentleman from Indiana himself. If that is true, and no point of order was pending at the time of the discussion, it is too late for the gentleman to make the point of order.

Mr. HOLMAN. The gentleman cannot make any such point as that to obtain money improperly from the Treasury.

Mr. BLACKBURN. The gentleman will not intimate that I want to obtain money improperly from the Treasury.

Mr. HOLMAN. This is a proposition to add to the salaries at present allowed by law, and I object to it.

Mr. BLACKBURN. I undertake to say that the gentleman from Indiana, or any other man on this floor, will not stand in front of me and dare to intimate that I want to take money from the public Treasury improperly.

Mr. HOLMAN. I say the gentleman proposes to take money from the public Treasury beyond the requirements of law as now existing; and I regard that as an improper appropriation of the public money.

Mr. BLACKBURN. Then the member from Indiana states that which is not true, and does it in the face of the law.

Mr. HOLMAN. There is no law authorizing the appropriation.

Mr. BLACKBURN. I say there is.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentlemen are not in order, and will suspend their remarks while the Chair states the position of the question. When this amendment was first offered the gentleman from New York [Mr. HISCOCK] reserved a point of order. Pending that some debate went on upon the merits. The point of order was then withdrawn by the gentleman from New York. Now, the Chair must know from the gentleman from Indiana whether he was on his feet and renewed the point of order immediately upon its being withdrawn.

Mr. HOLMAN. I was on my feet; and when I heard the gentleman from New York withdraw the point of order I stated that the point was renewed.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair observed that the gentleman was on his feet, and now asks him this question: Did he renew the point immediately on its withdrawal by the gentleman from New York?

Mr. HOLMAN. Immediately; when I heard the gentleman from New York say that the point of order was withdrawn—I was on my feet at the time—I did not rise for the purpose——

The CHAIRMAN. Then the Chair must recognize the point of order as pending.

Mr. BLACKBURN. I ask that an answer be made to the question of the Chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Indiana, having thus affirmed his right, is now entitled to be heard on the point of order.

Mr. BLACKBURN. I desire to hear the member's answer. He has not stated that he rose and made the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair puts the question once more. The gentleman from Indiana is once more requested to state whether he renewed the point of order immediately upon its withdrawal?

Mr. HOLMAN. I did not rise for the purpose—I was already on my feet; but as soon as I heard the gentleman from New York state that the point of order was withdrawn, I at once renewed it.

The CHAIRMAN. According to custom the Chair is obliged to recognize the gentleman who makes that statement. The Chair will hear the gentleman from Indiana on the point of order.

Mr. HISCOCK. I hope I may be pardoned for suggesting at this late hour the Chair shall decide or the committee shall be allowed to insist the Chair shall decide the point of order as soon as he has determined it in his own mind without regard to whether gentlemen wish to discuss it or not.

The CHAIRMAN. It is right to hear the gentleman from Indiana who makes the point of order.

Mr. HOLMAN. My point of order is, there is no law authorizing this payment of public money. The fact that such an appropriation was made in the last session of the Congress or in the preceding session of Congress on an appropriation bill does not make it a law. In other words, Mr. Chairman, there is no law to pay the employés of the House who are drawing annual salaries one month's additional compensation. There is no law authorizing the insertion of such an appropriation here. The insertion of such a provision in other appropriation bills is nothing more and nothing less than the law of that bill, and terminates with that appropriation.

Mr. BLACKBURN. I have nothing to say except there is no point of order here. The appropriation bill is as much a law of this country as any other statute passed by Congress. That appropriation or statute has been read and that is the law. This is in direct conformity with it, and is a verbatim copy of it. But I do not propose to waste the time of the committee to discuss the point of order when there is no semblance of ground upon which to make it.

Mr. ATHERTON. The law of the land provides for the payment of annual salaries to these employés of the House. The practice has been from time to time, either by joint resolution or by amendment to an appropriation bill, to give them one month's extra pay. The very form of that statement indicates it is not a law except as it applies to that very resolution or that very bill. It is temporary, and does not extend from year to year, and therefore when the proposition is made to give to these employés one month's extra pay it is clearly beyond the law and obnoxious to the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. In deciding this point the Chair desires to state the only doubt in his mind arises from the fact it relates to an existing service which is constantly before the House, and in view of the numerous precedents which exist, and which he has not had time to examine to see whether the point of order is settled, but concerning as it does the entire body of the House, he feels it is a case where, without shirking proper responsibility, he ought to submit it to the judgment of the committee. He submits, therefore, whether the point of order raised by the gentleman from Indiana should be sustained.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 19, noes 110.

Mr. HOLMAN. No quorum.

The CHAIRMAN appointed Mr. HISCOCK and Mr. HOLMAN as tellers.

The committee divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 24, noes 128.

So the point of order was not sustained.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order being overruled, the amendment is before the committee.

Mr. DUNNELL. I would ask the gentleman from Kentucky to permit an amendment to his resolution.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman has the right to offer an amendment.

Mr. DUNNELL. I desire to offer this amendment: to add to the pending amendment the words "or session;" so as to read "annual or session;" and I think that will avoid the necessity for future action with reference to the session employés.

Mr. BLACKBURN. If the gentleman will insert the words "and session," so that it will read "annual and session," I have no objection to it.

Mr. DUNNELL. Then I will so modify it.

Mr. BLACKBURN. And I have no objection to accepting it in that form.

Mr. HOLMAN. I object——

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will submit the amendment to the amendment as modified to the committee.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. KLOTZ. I want to add an amendment to incorporate also the Capitol police.

Mr. McMILLIN. I rise to a point of order. That amendment is a change of existing law, and does not retrench expenditures.

Mr. KLOTZ. Will the gentleman allow me to state that the resolution as it is now covers the annual appointees and the session appointees. The Capitol police are kept here at this end of the building for six months of the year, and at the other end of the Capitol also, and they serve day and night, I am told; and certainly if anybody deserves this the Capitol police do.

Mr. HISCOCK. I am willing that it shall come in here in the form of an amendment if it has been customary. If heretofore it has been the custom to include the Capitol police in these usual provisions which are made for the employés, then I will consent that it shall be done; but until we know that to be the fact I shall feel compelled to object and make the point of order upon it myself.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair does not feel, in view of the action already taken by the committee, that he ought to decide this point of order any more than the other, and will submit it to the judgment of the committee.

The question was submitted, and the point of order was sustained.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order being sustained, the amendment is ruled out. The question recurs on the amendment as amended.

Mr. HOLMAN. I believe it is open to debate.

The CHAIRMAN. Debate has been closed upon the amendment.

Mr. HOLMAN. Not upon the amendment as modified?

The CHAIRMAN. Upon the amendment as amended.

Mr. HOLMAN. Then I offer a further amendment to increase the compensation to two months instead of one.

Mr. HISCOCK. I move that the committee do now rise, if the gentleman from Indiana will yield for that purpose.

Mr. HOLMAN. I will yield for that motion.

Mr. HISCOCK. Then I move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose, and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. KASSON reported that the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, having had under further consideration the bill (H. R. No. 6716) making appropriations for sundry civil expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1883, and for other purposes, had come to no conclusion thereon.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. HISCOCK. I move that the House do now adjourn.

I desire to state, however, to gentlemen who have matters which they desire to introduce for reference only, that I am willing to yield for the purpose of introducing them; but I am going to stand here and see that no other action shall be taken but simply allow the introduction of matters for reference.

Mr. ATHERTON. Regular order.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

Mr. ALDRICH, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found duly enrolled bills of the following titles; when the Speaker signed the same:

A bill (S. No. 1723) to increase the water supply of the city of Washington, and for other purposes; and

A bill (S. No. 1432) to abolish the military reservation of Fort Abercrombie in the State of Minnesota, and authorizing the Secretary of the Interior to have the lands embraced therein made subject to homestead entry and sell the same as other public lands.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, indefinite leave of absence was granted as follows:

To Mr. AIKEN, on account of sickness.

To Mr. FISHER, for three days, on account of important business.

WITHDRAWAL OF PAPERS.

By unanimous consent, leave to withdraw papers from the files of the House was granted to Mr. CHACE, in the case of George Somerville Norris.

LAWS OF THE TERRITORY OF UTAH.

The Speaker laid before the House a communication from the secretary of the Territory of Utah, transmitting duplicate copies of the laws passed at the twenty-fifth session of the Legislative Assembly of that Territory; which were referred to the Committee on Territories.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. DAVIS, of Illinois. I desire to present a report——

Mr. BRAGG. I call for the regular order.

The SPEAKER. The regular order is insisted on, which is the motion of the gentleman from New York, [Mr. HISCOCK,] that the House do now adjourn.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 44, noes not counted.

So the motion was agreed to; and accordingly (at five o'clock and twenty-nine minutes p. m.) the House adjourned.

PETITIONS, ETC.

The following memorial, petitions, and other papers were laid on the Clerk's desk, under the rule, and referred as follows:

By Mr. CANDLER: The petition of William M. Caldwell and others, protesting against special assessment on their property in the District of Columbia—to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

By Mr. CONVERSE: The petition of N. Camman Combes and others, citizens of New York, relating to the Harlem River improvement—to the Committee on Commerce.

By Mr. S. S. COX: The petition of Fred L. Talcott and others, citizens of New York, relating to the Harlem River improvement—to the Committee on Commerce.

By Mr. CRAPO: The petition of James H. Beal and 41 others, relating to the accumulation of silver in the United States Treasury—to the Committee on Coinage, Weights, and Measures.

By Mr. DEUSTER: The petition of George W. Thompson and others, citizens of New York, relating to the Harlem River improvement—to the Committee on Commerce.

By Mr. HISCOCK: The petition of John A. Henry and others, citizens of New York, relating to the Harlem River improvement—to the same committee.

By Mr. PHELPS: Memorial of the Chamber of Commerce of New Haven, Connecticut, for the passage of the French spoliation claims bill—to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

By Mr. RANDALL: Papers relating to the pension claim of Sarah Burns—to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

SENATE.

THURSDAY, July 13, 1882.

Prayer by Rev. T. S. WYNCOOP, of the city of Washington.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. MCPHERSON, its Clerk, announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the following enrolled bills; and they were thereupon signed by the President pro tempore:

A bill (S. No. 1723) to increase the water supply of the city of Washington, and for other purposes; and

A bill (S. No. 1432) to abolish the military reservation at Fort Abercrombie, in the State of Minnesota, and authorizing the Secretary of the Interior to have the lands embraced therein made subject to homestead entry and sale, the same as other public lands.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. ROLLINS, from the Committee on the District of Columbia, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 6626) to authorize the Washington City and Point Lookout Railroad Company to extend its railroad into and within the District of Columbia, reported adversely thereon; and the bill was postponed indefinitely.

Mr. ROLLINS. I am instructed by the Committee on the District of Columbia to ask that the bill (S. No. 1378) to permit the Washington and Point Lookout Railroad Company to extend its railroad into and within the District of Columbia, now upon the Calendar, be recommitted to that committee.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It will be so ordered, there being no objection.

Mr. MORRILL. I am directed by the Committee on Finance to report several bills back and ask to be discharged from their further consideration, and that they be indefinitely postponed, they all having been acted upon in other bills.

The bills were postponed indefinitely, as follows:

A bill (S. No. 378) to enable national banking associations to extend their corporate existence;

A bill (S. 973) to repeal so much of section 3385 of the Revised Statutes as imposes an import tax on tobacco;

A bill (S. No. 980) to provide a reserve fund for the redemption of United States notes, and for other purposes;

A bill (S. No. 1349) to extend the corporate existence of the national banking associations; and

A bill (S. No. 1605) to correct an error in the Revised Statutes of the United States.

Mr. ALDRICH, from the Committee on the District of Columbia, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 6406) to refund the assessments made under the administration of M. G. Emery while mayor of Washington, and for other purposes, reported adversely thereon; and the bill was postponed indefinitely.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 2063) to amend an act entitled "An act to provide for the settlement of all outstanding claims against the District of Columbia, and conferring jurisdiction on the Court of Claims to hear the same, and for other purposes," approved June 16, 1880, reported adversely thereon; and the bill was postponed indefinitely.

Mr. MAHONE. I am instructed by the Committee on Agriculture, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 896) for the establishment of a bureau of animal industry to prevent the exportation of diseased cattle and the spread of infectious or contagious diseases among domestic animals, to report it without amendment.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I hope that the Senate will take up that bill and pass it immediately. I introduced a bill, which is an exact copy of that, early in the session, and it has been reported unanimously, and is on the Calendar. I had that bill passed over without prejudice, intending to move to take it up some morning, but I waited for action on the House bill. I hope the Senate will take up the bill just reported and pass it, because it is of very great importance to the country. It is a small bill and it will not take five minutes to pass it. I am satisfied it will not be opposed by a single Senator. I ask that it be taken up and put on its passage, and then I shall move to postpone indefinitely the similar bill on the Calendar.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Kentucky asks that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill at this time. Is there objection?

Mr. PLATT. Let the bill be read for information.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is a very long bill.

Mr. WILLIAMS. It is not so long.

Mr. MORRILL. I object to anything except the regular business, and as soon as the routine morning business is over I shall ask to take up the tax bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Vermont objects to the present consideration of the bill.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I move then that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill. It is a bill in which I feel a very deep interest.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It requires unanimous consent to consider a bill on the day it is reported.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I hope the Senator from Vermont will withdraw the objection.

Mr. MORRILL. I only object to everything out of the regular order because I wish to take up the tax bill as soon as the morning business is over.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I will help to take up that bill as soon as the morning business is over. I assure the Senator it will not take three minutes to dispose of this bill.

Mr. MORRILL. If it takes no time I shall not object.

Mr. WILLIAMS. It will take but a little time. It is not a bill that meets my entire approbation, but I think under the circumstances if we cannot get the whole loaf we had best take half a loaf.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Vermont objects, and the bill will be placed on the Calendar.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I understand that the Senator from Vermont withdraws his objection.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If the Senator from Vermont withdraws the objection, the bill may be considered.

Mr. COKE. I object to the consideration of the bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill goes over.

BILL INTRODUCED.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin, asked and, by unanimous consent, obtained leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 2143) to amend the act entitled "An act for the relief of the Stockbridge and Munsee tribes of Indians, in the State of Wisconsin," approved February 6, 1871; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

THE ANDREW JACKSON PAPERS.

Mr. VOORHEES. I offer the following resolution, and ask for its present consideration:

Resolved, That the Committee on the Library of Congress be, and is hereby, instructed to inquire into the expediency of purchasing, editing, and publishing the unpublished manuscript papers of Andrew Jackson.

The Senate, by unanimous consent, proceeded to consider the resolution.

Mr. VOORHEES. I ask the leave of the Senate to submit a memorandum which I have in my hand on this subject; and in doing so I desire to state that it is a matter in which I have not been applied to by anybody having the slightest pecuniary interest in these papers. I hold in my hand, however, a statement of great interest touching the papers themselves; and I will take the liberty of reading it. It is quite brief, or I should not intrude it upon the Senate at this time.

In February, 1843, Hon. Amos Kendall, Postmaster-General under the administrations of Presidents Jackson and Van Buren, issued a prospectus of a life of the former in which it was stated as "undertaken with the approbation of General Jackson himself, who has kindly put into the author's hands his books and papers, public and private, and on obscure points favored him with his own recollections. With these materials, and with the contribution of facts by many of the general's associates in civil and military life, aided by his own knowledge of events, the author hopes to produce a work worthy of the confidence and patronage of the American people."

December 12 previously, General Jackson wrote to Mr. Kendall:

> Your nephew, Mr. McLaughlin, is now with me, and we begin to-day to examine my papers. Before he arrived I had begun, and when able had selected a good many that you may deem proper for the history of my life. All such shall be selected and sent you which you can determine whether proper to be referred to.

These papers filled two trunks. Mr. Kendall began the life and issued (Harper Brothers, of New York, publishers) six numbers out of the fifteen announced in the prospectus, when he became interested in Professor Morse's electro-telegraphic patent and suspended the publication. He died without completing it.

May 20, 1845, in the last letter written by General Jackson to Mr. Kendall, he said:

> On the subject of my papers you are to retain them as long as you think necessary to use them. Should you die they are to pass forthwith into Mr. Blair's hands. I have full and unlimited confidence in you both that my papers will be safe in your hands and that they will never be permitted to be used but for a proper purpose. * * * My papers after you are done with them are on your death to pass into the hands of Francis P. Blair.

Mr. Kendall retained the idea of finishing the biography to the last, and expressed his regret on his death-bed of his failure to do it. After his death the papers were demanded of his executor, (and son-in-law, the late Hon. William Stickney,) who could give no information in regard to them. They were not in his possession, nor could they be found. After many years they were discovered in an upper story of the old Globe newspaper office, in Washington, and placed in the custody of Hon. Montgomery Blair, the son of Hon. Francis P. Blair, (who in the mean time had deceased,) where they still remain.

It should be mentioned that in view of the probability of his father undertaking the life of General Jackson in case Mr. Kendall abandoned it, a short time before the general's death Mr. Montgomery Blair had visited the Hermitage and obtained many additional papers relating both to his military and civil career, which he took to Washington. These had been forgotten, but were found about the time of the discovery of the collection supplied to Mr. Kendall, at the late residence of Mr. F. P. Blair, in Maryland. They are contained in a large cedar chest and are more considerable in number than the entire Kendall collection. These also are in Mr. M. Blair's custody.

The entire collection embraces about all of General Jackson's papers extant, and in his possession during his lifetime. They are of varied and great interest, referring as they do to every notable event in his private life; history of the Natchez and Creek campaigns; the occupation of Pensacola; the defense of Mobile and New Orleans, together with his correspondence connected therewith, both during and subsequent to the Indian and British wars in the Southwest. Then there are preserved every important paper concerning his political administration. They are of the highest interest and value. These papers are undeniably the property of General Jackson's heirs. They were merely loaned to Mr. Kendall and afterward to Mr. Blair for the purpose of his biography. It is greatly to be regretted that the work was accomplished by neither. They were once lost for nearly a quarter of a century. They are exposed to the vicissitudes of fire, of decay, and of theft. They should be purchased by Congress and printed, thus securing them against accident.

The remaining family of General Jackson are extremely poor. His daughter, the widow of his adopted son, still lives, an aged and helpless invalid. She has two children. They would be content with any sum Congress may see fit to offer for the papers. The amount would go entirely to them, as those interested in their behalf will not ask nor accept any compensation for their services. The appointment of a competent person to edit the papers in the event of their purchase and printing is recommended.

My object in reading this paper was to apprise the Senate of the important original papers which have never been printed and which are now accessible and available, and to put this memorandum in such a shape as to make it easy to be considered by the committee. I ask for the adoption of the resolution.

The resolution was agreed to.

INTERNATIONAL FISHERY EXHIBITION.

Mr. WINDOM. If the morning business is through——

Mr. MORRILL. If the morning business is through I move to postpone——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Minnesota [Mr. WINDOM] has the floor.

Mr. WINDOM. I ask the consent of the Senate to take up the joint resolution (H. R. No. 237) concerning an international fishery exhibition to be held at London in May, 1883. It is very important that it should be passed at once if it is to be passed at all, so that the preparations can be made. It will not take three minutes, I think.

Mr. HARRIS. Let it be read for information.

The joint resolution was read; and, by unanimous consent, the Senate as in Committee of the Whole proceeded to consider it.

Mr. MORRILL. I approve of the measure, and I suppose, it having been read, it will take no further time to dispose of it. The only objection I see to it is that it is rather too large an exhibition of "and so forths."

Mr. WINDOM. That is only a sort of general way of expressing what it is proposed to do.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

Mr. ANTHONY. I should like to ask the Senator from Minnesota what is the need of the long preamble?

Mr. WINDOM. I do not know that it is very necessary, but this is a House bill, it is late in the session, and we thought the preamble could do no harm.

The preamble was agreed to.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. MORRILL. I now move the postponement of the present and all prior orders for the purpose of taking up the bill (H. R. No. 5538) to reduce internal-revenue taxation.

Mr. MORGAN. I object to that bill coming before the Senate without a vote.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The unfinished business is not in order until two o'clock. The regular order is the Calendar under the Anthony rule, and the Senator from Vermont moves to set it aside.

Mr. BUTLER. I trust that the motion of the Senator from Vermont will not be agreed to. There are some very important bills on the Calendar which might be disposed of under the five-minute rule. I feel it my duty to again call the attention of the Senate to a bill, which is No. 589 in the order of business on the Calendar, the bill (S. No. 1153) "providing for the organization of the district of Southeastern Alaska, and providing for a civil government therefor." In this connection I ask the Secretary to read a telegram received recently by the Senator from California, [Mr. MILLER.]

The Acting Secretary read as follows:

SAN FRANCISCO, July 10.

> We again beg your active aid for government for Alaska. Residents make strong appeal and desire attention now.
> W. T. COLEMAN AND OTHERS.

Hon. JOHN F. MILLER,
1218 Connecticut avenue, Washington.

Mr. BUTLER. I have again and again called the attention of the Senate to the importance of this question, and I ask that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the Calendar. This bill is order of business No. 589, and may be reached perhaps in the course of an hour, and can be disposed of before two o'clock.

Mr. MORRILL. I cannot withdraw the motion I have made. I think it is of more importance to reduce taxation than to establish a Territorial government in Alaska.

Mr. GROOME. I wish the Senate to understand that if the bills which it has been proposed to take up at this time are not taken up, I shall ask the Senate to consider the bill reported by me under instructions from the Committee on Pensions day before yesterday, which is intended to prevent the payment at the same time of pensions both under the general law and under special acts. The Commissioner of Pensions is threatened at this very time with a mandamus unless he pays both pensions, and in one case the Attorney-General of the United States has given a solemn opinion that both pensions must be paid.

Mr. MORRILL. Let me say to the Senator from Maryland that as I understand his bill will not occupy but a moment, and it seems to be imperatively necessary that it should pass. After the tax bill is taken up I will give way for the consideration of that bill.

Mr. MORGAN. I object to any arrangement of that kind.

Mr. GROOME. The Senator from Vermont is incorrect in the fact. The bill will take more than a moment of time, for I wish to submit some very brief remarks upon it, that the Senate may understand what they are voting upon.

Mr. MORRILL. I shall not give way, then.

Mr. GROOME. Then the Senate will understand that the situation is such that an officer of this Government is threatened with a mandamus because he construes the pension laws as they have been construed by the two Houses of Congress for the last fifteen or twenty years. It is a matter of untold millions of dollars that the opinion of the Attorney-General be not allowed to stand indefinitely as recognized law.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The motion is not subject to debate.

Mr. BUTLER. Then I give notice that after the bill the Senator calls attention to has been considered, I shall demand the regular order.

Mr. MORGAN. The motion is subject to debate, but not on the merits.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Certainly.

Mr. MORGAN. Mr. President——

Mr. VOORHEES. Will the Senator from Alabama allow me one moment?

Mr. MORGAN. Certainly.

Mr. VOORHEES. I am inclined to think that the measure mentioned by the Senator from Maryland ought to be considered in a way perhaps that it cannot be considered this morning. It ought not to be considered in haste. I have some knowledge of the subject and I think the bill will lead to a great deal of discussion if we go into it. It is a matter of some importance, but I do not think the Government will be bankrupt in twenty-four hours. That is my private opinion.

Mr. PLATT. If the Senator from Alabama will permit me, the bill which the Senator from Maryland desires to have taken up has been put upon the pension appropriation bill by the member of the Appropriations Committee who has it in charge. That bill I suppose will be reported to-day; and probably if the bill is to be passed at this session of Congress, that is the best way to pass it. I think that the matter may lie over until the pension appropriation bill comes up.

Mr. MORGAN. I hope that the Senator from Vermont will allow the Senate to proceed to the consideration of business under the Anthony rule, rather than to take up the measure which he proposes now to call up. I do not understand that there is the urgency for the passage of the bill he is presenting to the Senate that he seems to consider exists. At all events, if there is that urgency we have been very much misled by the conduct of that Senator and others in the Senate heretofore upon the same subject.

I had supposed that the tariff commission, which the Senator originated and has completed with great ability, would at least give some satisfaction to the country if it did not bring any relief, and that therefore we should not be put upon the tenter-hooks of anxiety any longer while that commission was in existence. But after creating it and rushing it before the world, the Senator comes in here now and urges that we shall suspend all other business for the purpose of giving immediate relief to the country in the reduction of some of the internal taxes and I believe also some of the tariff duties. It seems to me that the positions are not reconcilable at all. The country ought to accept from the Senator from Vermont at least the assurance that he has always given us, that his tariff commission would be quite sufficient to relieve all the necessities, all the dangers and difficulties and embarrassments that environ the country under the vexed question of taxation.

Now, the Senator abandoning his scheme, I suppose confessing judgment upon it publicly that it is a dead failure, comes in here and proposes that we shall have a modification of the tariff, and not only that we shall have it but that we shall have it very quickly; that we shall have something like morning's milk for breakfast for that purpose; that the moment the bill is reported it shall be taken up to the exclusion of all other business in the Senate, and proceeded upon with haste and with persistence until the suffering and bleeding country shall get relief at the hands of the Senator from Vermont and his committee. I think that he is on a very much better road to give the country relief than he has been for a long time. At the same time I do not think that the Senator ought to be pursuing that journey with so much avidity and so much eagerness as he appears to be this morning.

I feel some compassion for the commission that he has organized. I dislike to rise here immediately after confirming a commission of nine gentlemen to take the tariff into consideration, and give them a slap in the face by assuring them that we made a great mistake in supposing that they knew more about the tariff legislation of the country than we did; that we made a great mistake in supposing it was necessary to get their opinion upon any topic connected with the subject of the tariff and internal revenue; that they are not the sort of people we supposed they would be; that we have confirmed them under a sort of legislative duress, or a duress of courtesy, and we find out immediately after their confirmation that they are not likely to do the country any good; that there must be something done at once to relieve not only against the embarrassment that the country is under from the improper adjustment of our tax matters but also against the embarrassment we are likely to fall into if we allow the commission to take up the subject and go on with it. I do not wish to treat the commission in this way. One or two of them are men from my own section of the United States, and while I have not any very great faith in their ability to do more for the country in the way of devising a new scheme of taxation than all the Senate could do, I still have great respect for them personally, and having put them into the commission, having given them the authority which the Senator from Vermont insisted we should give them in broad and ample terms, I dislike to withdraw that authority so summarily from them, and to rush all other business out of the way, it makes no difference how important it may be, and to take up this little revenue bill that the honorable Senator is now prosecuting with so much eagerness.

It looks a little strange to find the Senator from Vermont in charge of a bill for the reduction of either internal taxes or customs duties. He seems to be commanding both wings of the army. He seems to take charge of both ends of the subject. He seems not to be content with his former grand rôle of raising the tariff, and having high protective duties upon everything that could be reached by a tax law, but now he takes the rôle of the reduction of duties, and it turns out that we are to have just what the Senator desires to place upon us, a high protective tariff at his will and pleasure; and instantly, when he desires to change it, we must lower it, and that immediately; we must lower it at the expense of all the other business of the country.

We have a very important Calendar here remaining. We have done a great deal of legislation during this session of Congress, some that I find we are compelled now to undo. The Committee on Pensions, through one of its able representatives, comes upon the floor of the Senate and admonishes us that we have legislated in such a way that it is likely the whole of the special pension appropriations made in Congress are to be doubled for the want of some few appropriate words which in the haste of legislation we have omitted to put into our pension bills. We have been all the time in a hurry during this session of Congress, it seems to me. The Pension Committee are coming here to get rid of a blunder which they have made in consequence it seems of being in too great a hurry in legislation and not being able in their haste to put words into the pension bills sufficient to restrain an Attorney-General who may be overtechnical from ruling that the Government actually intended to confer two pensions where it determined indeed to confer but one.

We ought to make haste a little slowly, particularly upon this great question of the tariff. It alarms me to see the great champion of high protective duties coming here into the Senate and becoming the advocate and the dashing, enterprising leader in a cavalry charge for the reduction of duties, as the honorable Senator from Vermont is doing this morning. I take alarm at it; I do not know what is going to happen when I find the honorable Senator from Vermont reversing his action entirely and demanding of the country an immediate and hasty revision of the tariff so as to reduce that which he himself put upon the law.

We must now have a reduction, it appears, of $8 a ton on Bessemer steel, and a large percentage upon sugar, and a large amount of internal taxes must be reduced. These are the very taxes which the honorable Senator from Vermont has so laboriously engaged the attention of the Senate for years and years past in building up and in confirming against the people in a way we were afraid we never should be able to get rid of.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator is discussing the tariff. That is discussing the merits.

Mr. MORGAN. No, I am discussing the propriety of taking up the bill in such a hurry. It is almost impossible to speak about the tariff without saying something of what it contains. I was trying to describe to the Senate the subject-matter that I was talking about, and to show that it is not necessary, to say the least of it, to get into a great flurry and haste this morning to have that subject considered.

Mr. MORRILL. Mr. President, I do not desire to occupy time in replying to the Senator from Alabama. If the Senator chooses to place himself in the attitude of opposing a reduction of taxation, he is the only party responsible for doing it. I prefer a vote rather than any discussion upon the measure until the measure is properly before us.

Mr. PENDLETON. Mr. President, there is no disposition to oppose any measure for the reduction of taxes, and the gentleman will find that those who sit on this side of the Chamber will stay with him as long as he desires it in order to accomplish that end. But he will find also when after seven months he now first brings in a bill for the reduction of taxes, and then limits it in such a way as to be a special act of favoritism to particular interests, and not for the relief of the people, that he will not be able to call it up and pass it without fair consideration and fair argument.

This bill, so far as this side of the Chamber is concerned, will be taken up with our consent, freely and readily, at the proper time; and when it is taken up we will go with the gentleman who is the manager of this bill, not only in reference to the particular subjects he has indicated but all the general range of taxation everywhere; we will go him better in endeavoring to relieve the people from the burdens under which they now labor. But it is not our desire—it is not mine at least—to take up this bill at this time. I have a bill here which I presented by order of the Committee on Foreign Relations two weeks ago and gave notice that I should ask for its early consideration.

Mr. MORRILL. What does the Senator mean by "going better?" I do not quite understand.

Mr. PENDLETON. I ought perhaps not to have used that phrase to so unsophisticated a gentleman as the Senator from Vermont, a technical phrase with which I am not very well acquainted myself, [laughter;] but I will make it clear to his comprehension by saying we will go further than he and his associates for the purpose of relieving the people from taxes.

I say I have a bill on the Calendar, which has been here two weeks, which involves the life and liberty and property of all the citizens of the United States who are living or trading east of the Mediterranean. It concerns the life, liberty, and property of our fellow-citizens who are now in jeopardy of their lives and suffering as to their liberty because we do not give them the proper relief. I have here on my table at this moment a letter from the Secretary of State calling attention in the most serious manner to the necessity of passing a bill of this kind. The bill cannot go into operation for six months after it is passed. It will be necessary to make arrangements for putting it into operation at that time, and I desire now to antagonize this motion of the Senator from Vermont in order that I may call up that bill, and I think I may say in all sincerity it will not take an hour to pass it through the Senate. I appeal to the Senate not to assent to the motion of the Senator from Vermont, but to consider this consular court bill.

Mr. BECK. Mr. President, I have, I fear, for the last two or three weeks given offense to Senators who were endeavoring to call up special matters by demanding the regular order, which means to proceed with the Calendar; and I have given notice more than once of late that I would continue to do so to the end of the session, or until the Calendar was at least once called and the cases or matters thereon considered.

Mr. President, the fact is that there are one hundred, perhaps one hundred and fifty, bills on the Calendar, many of them very important, reported by the regular committees of this body, and not a single bill on the Calendar has been called that was reported subsequent to the 19th day of April last, and this is now the 13th of July. All of these matters must be assumed to have merit, more or less, or they would not have received the favorable consideration of the committees of the Senate to whom they were referred. Some have been considered by the committees to which I belong, and I believe they ought to be favorably acted upon. Many of them are of great general interest; some of them are private bills; some partly public and partly private. We adopted a rule that until two o'clock each day we should regularly proceed with the call of the Calendar. That is all I ask shall be done now. When two o'clock comes, if the tax bill is brought up I shall not interpose any objection to its consideration. I will vote to give it preference over anything else; but I do oppose the interruption of the call of the Calendar until the bills that are reported shall at least have been called and it is seen whether any Senator has any objection to them. Then when the hour for calling up the unfinished business arrives, and the question is between the tax bill and any other bill, I shall be free to vote as I think the public interest requires, and I know of nothing more important than to consider the reduction of taxation. The present pressure to displace everything is neither proper nor necessary. We have all summer before us.

Again, let me say, the bill now reported by the Senator from Vermont passed the House of Representatives on the 27th of June. On the 28th it was referred to the Committee on Finance and was reported back by that committee to the Senate on the 6th day of July. I hold the original House bill with the Senate Finance Committee's amendments in my hand; it contains nothing in the way of relief from tariff taxation, nothing except relieving the bankers of the country from the taxes imposed upon their capital and deposits, and the repeal of the stamp tax on bank checks and patent medicines, and a little savor thrown in in the way of friction matches to attempt to give it some popularity. That was all that the House of Representatives offered and all that the Finance Committee after eight days of study could persuade themselves ought to be done—that was all they reported or recommended the Senate to do. In short, the Committee on Finance, after holding the little House bill a week, could see nothing that the country demanded any relief from except the taxes on banks and bankers, patent medicines, and matches, which nobody had asked relief concerning. That bill so reported remained on the Calendar until yesterday morning. It was out of the hands of the committee, beyond its control, never referred back to the committee by order of the Senate, and yesterday morning what does the RECORD say occurred?

Mr. MORRILL. I am directed by the Committee on Finance to ask that the bill (H. R. No. 5538) to reduce internal-revenue taxation be recommitted to the Committee on Finance.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It will be so ordered, there being no objection. The Chair hears none, and the bill is recommitted.

Mr. MORRILL. I am directed by the same committee to report the bill (H. R. No. 5538) to reduce internal-revenue taxation, with amendments as agreed upon by the committee. I ask to have the bill reprinted in order that the amendments may all appear together; and the original bill is out of print.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be reprinted with the amendments, and placed on the Calendar.

That happened yesterday morning. The bill was brought back in a minute after its recommittal; it was never even carried to the committee-room, reported back instantly, and we are called upon this morning as soon as it is printed and laid on our tables to pass upon it instantly, with amendments that the committee as a committee had no right to consider; because, I repeat, the bill was never recommitted until yesterday, and when recommitted it ought to have been sent back for revision at least. We did consider the amendments as a committee; I agree we did talk about them in our room; we discussed them; but the committee had no authority until the bill was formally recommitted yesterday to do anything with the bill because it was not before them, being on the Calendar. This morning, forsooth, the Calendar is to be set aside and all other public business is to be disregarded because it is now deemed important for the committee to obey orders; because the Republican caucus has ordered it, and said it is important to change the tariff duties on sugar and increase the tariff duties on cotton-ties and a few other things, the Finance Committee is overruled by the caucus. The committee of its own motion at first refused to allow any but verbal amendments to the House bill, confined it merely to the personal interests involved in the internal revenue; the title of the bill reported to-day is a bill "to reduce internal-revenue taxation," yet without having it in fact recommitted to the committee——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair would inform the Senator from Kentucky that debate on the merits of the bill is not in order.

Mr. BECK. I am not debating anything except the irregularity of the proceeding; but I will submit to the ruling of the Chair. I am arguing that although the committee did submit the amendments the committee had no more authority to do so before recommittal than any other nine gentlemen in the Senate, and their opinion is just worth as much as that of any other nine men equally well informed—no more, no less. Until the bill was recommitted by order of the Senate yesterday, and when it was so recommitted, after having first said that nothing could be done except to give the banks relief, with a little relief on the medicine and match tax, that bill being on the Calendar, after it was recommitted it was reported back at once without being even formally considered, and we are now asked to set aside the whole Calendar and consider it before one member in ten has seen it on his desk or knows what is in it. When two o'clock comes and you seek to postpone the Pembina bill, that will be a different question, but until two o'clock I think we should go on with the regular business. That is all I care to say. I will go as far as any man promptly to reduce taxes when the question is fairly presented.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. President, if this Congress shall adjourn, whether it be hot or cold, without a reduction of the taxes now imposed upon the people it will have been derelict in its highest duty. There is no sentiment in this country stronger now than that Congress has neglected its duty thus far in not repealing taxes that are obnoxious to the people and unnecessary for the public uses; and if we should still neglect that duty we should be properly held responsible by our constituents.

Now, sir, for one I am determined that this sin shall not lay at my door. The reduction of duty ought to be at least as large as is proposed by the highest proposition that has been made by either House, and perhaps ought to go further.

The Senate has not been in fault in this matter, nor can the Senator from Kentucky properly criticise the action of the Senate or of the Senate Committee on Finance of which he is a member. The House holds, whether rightly or wrongly, that the Senate cannot originate a bill reducing taxes, because, although it does fall within the express constitutional phrase "a revenue bill," yet it relates to taxes, and falls within the spirit of the constitutional inhibition against the Senate originating bills for raising revenue, and therefore the House asserts that they alone have the power to introduce these bills reducing taxation. They sent us in the last of June a bill to reduce internal taxation that gave us for the first time jurisdiction of the subject-matter.

Now what is proposed? The Senator from Kentucky says that in the first instance the Committee on Finance proposed only to confine legislation here in the Senate to the subject-matter of that bill. So we did, because at the time that action was taken it was confidently said and believed that another bill would be sent from the House to correct certain incongruities and irregularities and rates of duty in the tariff. But further he says, and so does the Senator from Alabama, that this matter was referred to a commission. So the general subject of the revision of the tariff was referred to a commission, but it was stated by my honorable friend from Vermont, [Mr. MORRILL,] by myself, and by others who were connected with the Finance Committee that it was expected that at the present session there would be important legislation in regard to the tariff. I voted for the tariff commission on the ground distinctly stated by me that we ought at this session to amend the tariff laws.

Now, Mr. President, the bill before you is a bill to reduce taxation, not internal taxation alone but external taxation as well. It is a bill that ought to pass. My colleague says that it does not go far enough, that he wants to take up some other bill because this does not go far enough. When it comes up in the Senate we can make the issue. Make your propositions and we will see what taxes you propose to reduce, and if we do not vote for them then for the first time accuse us of neglecting our duty.

Sir, there is no bill on your Calendar that compares in importance or in public interest with the one that is now proposed to be taken up; and if it is not taken up now I fear it will not be taken up this session. All your Calendar of bills contains nothing so important as this question of the reduction of taxes. If the House have not gone far enough in this way, then go further, "go better," to use a phrase that I at least understand when used by my colleague. If the Democratic party, which seems disposed to make this a party measure and to allege that the Republicans have not gone far enough in this bill, let them propose their amendments and test the question.

Mr. BUTLER. May I ask the Senator from Ohio what the tariff commission will have to consider if we go into the whole question of the tariff?

Mr. SHERMAN. The tariff commission will have the whole range of the tariff, ample room and verge enough; but there are certain incongruities of the tariff about which few differ that ought to be corrected without delay.

Mr. BUTLER. I understand the Senator from Ohio proposes that we shall go into a discussion of the whole question on this bill.

Mr. SHERMAN. No, sir; I only say that if my colleague thinks we have not put enough reduction of taxes in this bill he can move to reduce them further.

Mr. BUTLER. There is no limit to it.

Mr. SHERMAN. As a matter of course there can be no limit to the power of amendment. It is a question whether the Senate will take up questions other than those that merely relate to the reduction of taxes. In a tariff bill there are complex and multitudinous questions not only of revenue but of protection, the extent of protection, the amount of revenue that will be produced, the grades of duties, whether ad valorem or specific, whether compound or simple. A thousand questions in the change of a tariff come up that do not relate to the mere reduction of taxes. But in a bill to reduce taxes there are many subjects proper to be introduced, and when they are offered here, as I know they will be offered, by way of amendment, then will be the time to discuss them. The Senator from Kentucky has already given notice of amendments to this bill that will, if debated, occupy the attention of the Senate for a week. He proposes to reduce the tax on spirits, to reduce the tax on tobacco, to reduce taxes by a scale of 10 or 20 per cent. and even 50 per cent. He proposes a great multitude of reductions of taxes.

These are the questions we want to meet, and we are ready to meet them; and from this moment forward until the end of the session we will insist that this bill for the reduction of taxes shall be considered. We will not willingly go back to our constituents until we get the sense of the Senate upon how much they are willing to reduce taxes, and if the taxes we have selected are not the ones that ought to be reduced let others be proposed.

The Senator from Kentucky says we propose to repeal certain bank taxes. So we do. We relieve the corporations not from the tax on circulation, which is the severe one upon them, but the tax on deposits and the tax on bank checks, which is a tax, not upon banks, but upon the business of banking, upon the people who do business with banks. We propose to repeal the tax on matches, which he says nobody has asked for. Why, sir, the whole country asks for it. Every Irishman who smokes his pipe after his dinner, every householder and adult citizen in this broad land asks for this repeal.

The Senator, however, says he does not care about repealing this tax. If he does not want to repeal the match tax, then let him propose instead to repeal or reduce the whisky tax. We will be glad to debate with him on that question; let him propose to reduce the tobacco tax, and we will hear him on that question and see how far we can agree. I say now is the time——

Mr. BECK. If the Senator will allow me, I have proposed both, and I have no objection to going on with this bill and going quite as far as anybody in reducing taxes where it can properly be done; but I do not want to lose the morning hour when both can go on together.

Mr. SHERMAN. Let us take it up now and regulate the time and manner of disposing of the question. I think it ought to be taken up now. The Senator from Vermont has it in charge and he can give way from time to time to other bills; but now is the time to determine that this bill shall be acted on.

Mr. VAN WYCK. May I be allowed one word?

Mr. SHERMAN. No, sir; not until I answer the Senator from Kentucky. The Senator was very unjust to the Committee on Finance; and it seems to me he violated one of the rules of the Senate in regard to stating what occurred in the Committee on Finance.

The Senator says that the Senator from Vermont asked that the bill be recommitted and then immediately made the report of the Committee on Finance. That is true; but does not the Senator from Kentucky know that on that very morning the bill and all the amendments were fully considered before the Committee on Finance, and that the chairman of the committee was directed to do exactly what he did and what has been done a hundred times in the Senate? It was only as a matter of convenience to get the bill before the Senate compactly. That was done yesterday.

The bill was recommitted pro forma, just as had been done on the motion of my honorable friend from Delaware in regard to the bill for a tariff commission. The Senate committees all the time have a right to consider these questions under the rules of the Senate. The Committee on Finance are charged with all questions of taxes, all questions which relate to money affairs, the imposing of taxes, banks, &c. They have constant jurisdiction under the rules over them, and although they may report a bill it is the constant practice and it is the right practice still to consider the subject as under their jurisdiction, to report amendments to it just as the Committee on Appropriations do every day when they report a bill. Although it may be in the hands of the Printer, yet they continue to report amendments to the appropriation bills from time to time. That was done in this case. It is done by common consent. There was nothing irregular about it, and it was done to enable the Senate to have in one single bill all the propositions proposed by the Committee on Finance instead of having the amendments on separate sheets. There is nothing in that collateral matter——

Mr. BECK. The Senator will allow me to say that I was not complaining of anything except the demand to displace the Anthony rule the very first morning after the bill was recommitted and reported back. I said the committee had been considering it, but that they had no bill before them until it was recommitted yesterday, and it was reported back at once; and now it is proposed to cut away this morning hour, not waiting until two o'clock and giving the Senate a chance to look at the bill. It seems to me undue haste.

Mr. SHERMAN. At this period of the session we must waive the Anthony rule on all questions of grave importance, like a bill to reduce taxes, like an appropriation bill. There is no doubt about that.

Mr. HALE. Let me ask the Senator a question right in the line of what he is saying. How long is it since the Senate has given any attention to the Anthony rule? If this bill is not taken up some other bill will be taken up that will displace the Anthony rule. We are unable to go at the Calendar and have not gone to it for a long time.

Mr. BUTLER. The appropriation bills have interfered with it.

Mr. GARLAND. Mr. President, the question before the Senate, if I understand it, is whether we shall proceed to the consideration of the bill in charge of the Senator from Vermont from the Finance Committee, entitled "A bill to reduce taxation," as his amendment proposes to call it. I desire to give the Senate reasons why the bill should not be taken up, and why, in my judgment, we cannot consistently take it up for consideration at this time or in fact at this session.

I announced in a speech that I had the honor to make to this body in January last that I thought we should then proceed to reduce the taxes in many particulars. That did not receive any particular response from any quarter, certainly not from the House of Representatives, until this little bill was sent here on the 27th day of June; and whence comes or how comes all this new zeal and ardor for the reduction of taxation in certain quarters I am not able to comprehend: but, like all new converts, the gentlemen are certainly very energetic and very zealous. I think the energy and the zeal are improperly bestowed at this time. I think they are inconsistently manifested at this time.

On the 15th of last May, under the direction and almost the absolute control of the Senator from Vermont, a law was passed providing for the appointment of a commission to investigate the question of a tariff. Section 3 of that act, which I hold in my hand, delegates every possible subject arising under this bill, or any other bill that may be framed on the subject, to the tariff commission which was appointed and confirmed by the Senate under that act.

Now, there is something strange in this proceeding. I believe the very day after the commission assembled at Washington City, and the president of that commission, Mr. Hayes, made his congratulatory speech to his associates, the House of Representatives passed this bill. I do not know whether it was passed post hoc or propter hoc or not, but there is a singular coincidence about it, that as soon as the commission is organized at the Ebbitt House and its president makes his speech, the House of Representatives, the originating power under this Constitution as to revenue bills, passes this bill and sends it to us. There was something of a practical joke in it that I admire; and yet that was outstripped when we recur to the fact that the House of Representatives on the 24th of June passed a resolution asking the concurrence of this House that Congress should adjourn finally on the 10th of July, and three days after the passage of that resolution, the 27th of June, they passed this bill and sent it to us for consideration.

That was carrying the doctrine of practical jokes to its extreme verge. Here comes a bill to elicit a debate that will be almost endless, to elicit an investigation that will be almost without termination, with the thermometer ranging at 94 degrees and still rising, and to begin with the literature amounts now to this that I hold in my hand. [Exhibiting a bundle containing the bill and proposed amendments.] Here is the bill first that the Senator from Kentucky alluded to, that the Senator from Vermont reported back and then had recommitted, and yesterday reported this one back. [Exhibiting.] And here are the amendments upon our tables [exhibiting] seeking "to go it better," in the language of the Senator from Ohio, which I do not precisely comprehend myself, but as explained by the Senator from Vermont we all now understand it.

Mr. President, if the time allowed, if the proceedings of this Senate and House of Representatives were consistent upon this subject, there is none that I would more gladly go into than this. But I wish to state to the Senate that if we go into this subject we are necessarily compelled to recall the tariff commission, to abrogate the law that brought it into existence, because we are taking the subject into our own hands; and if anything is passed on this subject in which these amendments or the original bill figure I shall move as a proviso to the bill, before it goes out of the Senate, that the act of the 15th of May creating the tariff commission be repealed. I shall move at the proper time, if the Senate take up this bill, that it be postponed until the second Monday of December next, so that the tariff commission may make a report upon the subject, for they are required under the fourth section of the act to make their report not later than the first Monday of December next.

It is a mistake when the Senator from Ohio or the Senator from Vermont says that any one on this side is opposed to the reduction of taxation. But we have committed this matter to a tariff commission with full power to look into this and all kindred subjects. We have confirmed the nominations of the members of that commission. We want the information they can give us upon this and all kindred subjects before we legislate. We do not wish to thrust this bill now in the face of other bills that appear upon the Calendar, invoking and begging the attention of the Senate, some of them as important as the bill indicated by the Senator from South Carolina in reference to the territory of Alaska. That subject was brought to the attention of the Senate and its Committee on Territories three different times by the head of the Treasury Department, and by the President of the United States in a message twice. Three months ago, now lacking a few days, the Senator from South Carolina reported the bill, and telegrams have been sent to the Senator from California and other Senators stating that absolute disorganization, absolute lawlessness, prevailed in that country, and the Senator from South Carolina has repeatedly, time and again, begged the consideration of the question. Then there is the bill in reference to the Presidential succession, that the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR] reported some time since, which he has begged the Senate to take up and consider, and there can be no more important question than that. Then there is the bill advocated by the Senator from Maryland, [Mr. GROOME,] to prevent the payment of double pensions, reported before this bill was reported by the Senator from Vermont. All these are important questions, questions of the very first and last importance to the country; and now we are asked, in less than twenty-four hours after this bill was recommitted to the Committee on Finance and reported back, to go into the consideration of it in the face of all this important business, and when, too, we have a tariff commission at work. We are asked now to stultify ourselves and recall the commission virtually and take the subject into our own hands. While there is a cry for the reduction of taxes, as the Senator from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN] has said, yet the country knows we have created a commission: the country knows that the commission has gone to work, that it has started on its errand, and the country is willing to await its report, and then to have action on that report by the two Houses of Congress.

Where does all this information we have come from? What inspiration brings it? Have we received a letter from Moses or any of the other prophets? Where does the Senator from Vermont get all this information in reference to sugar and the reduction that he proposes upon Bessemer steel? We created a commission to get all that information for us. If it is before us I have not had the pleasure of looking upon it. If we now go into the matter and take it out of the hands of the commission, so be it, and we will test who is in earnest in reference to the reduction of taxes.

Mr. WINDOM. Mr. President, I do not intend to discuss the merits of this bill. They are not in order on this motion, and if they were the profound astonishment I feel at the position of the Democratic party this morning would prevent me from entering upon that discussion. I had supposed hitherto that our friends on the other side of the Chamber lay awake nights on account of their great anxiety to reduce taxes. My friend from Kentucky, [Mr. BECK,] who has devoted hour after hour in denouncing the enormities of the tariff on Bessemer steel, appears this morning in a new rôle. I had supposed that he at least would seize the first opportunity to relieve the people of a burden which has caused him such intense anxiety and intolerable anguish of spirit. I imagined that he and all his Democratic associates would welcome the long-coveted opportunity to reduce taxation. My astonishment therefore is profound and irrepressible when I find that almost unanimously thus far our friends on the other side seem determined to resist action upon this bill. All conceivable excuses are made for delay. The Senator from Kentucky, who is now on his feet——

Mr. BECK. In forty minutes I will vote to take it up.

Mr. WINDOM. I was going to refer to that. The Senator from Kentucky has again at this moment repeated his burning, overwhelming, yearning anxiety—I wish I could find some stronger word to describe it—to get only forty minutes for the Calendar. I have not heard him say anything about the Calendar before for a month, but now when there are but forty minutes left of the morning hour he still begs for those forty minutes. When he made his speech a little while ago there were about sixty minutes that could be devoted to that subject, and he occupied some ten or fifteen of them in a speech against the taking up of this bill. Such intense concern about the Calendar is very remarkable.

Then comes the Senator from Arkansas, [Mr. GARLAND,] who makes all sorts of excuses for not taking up this bill to reduce taxes. One is, that "the thermometer is at ninety-four and still rising." Let me say to my friend from Arkansas that if the Democratic party stand here and resist the reduction of taxation, they will find the thermometer a good deal higher than ninety-four when they reach home.

Again, he pleads that the people of Alaska need some legislation, and that must be attended to. The Calendar, Alaska, the hot weather, anything rather than take up this bill which proposes to reduce by forty or fifty million dollars taxes that these same gentlemen have been complaining of for years.

It is utterly impossible for my honorable friend from Vermont to satisfy our friends on the other side. I remember very distinctly when he and I were colleagues in the House of Representatives many years ago, when the war was raging, and it was necessary to raise money by heavy taxation, he brought in a bill imposing a large portion of the taxes that we now seek to repeal because they are no longer needed, and the Democratic party then almost unanimously opposed it, fought in every conceivable way to prevent the levying of those taxes that were necessary then to sustain the war; and now, when the war is over, when our Treasury is plethoric, and there is no reason why taxes should not be reduced, when the people are everywhere demanding it, when we propose to open up this whole subject to the gentlemen on the other side to offer any amendments they please, the Democratic party again says, "No, we must legislate for Alaska, we must attend to the Calendar, the weather is too hot, or for some other reason we cannot possibly take up this bill."

Mr. BUTLER. I would ask the Senator if we have any more information on the subject now than we had when we first began to discuss the question of raising a tariff commission to take the whole matter into consideration, and why is it, at this eleventh hour of the session, that it is found to be so urgent?

Mr. WINDOM. There are some questions in connection with the tariff and internal revenue that are so plain, so apparent to everybody, that we need no tariff commission to inform us concerning them, and there are other complicated questions that do need the careful examination of such a commission.

Mr. BUTLER. I understood the Senator to say that the whole question was to be gone into.

Mr. WINDOM. I said that this bill opened up to the gentlemen on the other side who were opposed, some of them at least, to the tariff commission the whole question of the reduction of the tariff and internal-revenue taxation.

Mr. BUTLER. I want to say to the Senator that I was not opposed to the tariff commission, but on the contrary I voted for it, and I voted for it with the distinct understanding or assurance given again and again by the Senator from Vermont and other Senators on the Republican side that they did not have time to consider the important question; and it was said explicitly, certainly impliedly, that no legislation should be had involving the consideration of the tariff at this session, upon the ground——

Mr. WINDOM. I heard no such thing.

Mr. BUTLER. It was stated repeatedly.

Mr. WINDOM. I voted for the tariff commission myself distinctly on this ground: that there were many complicated questions connected with the tariff which needed more careful revision, study, and investigation than could be given in the two Houses of Congress, and expressly reserved to myself the right to vote for any plain proposition for the reduction of taxes upon certain articles. I should not have voted for the tariff commission myself if I had believed that we thereby put it out of our power to make such reduction as we might deem necessary and proper at this session. I regard the tariff commission simply as an aid, an adjunct, to legislation; and when plain propositions which I believe everybody in the country admits to be correct are presented here for action I am not willing to wait until the tariff commission reports, and I sincerely hope that the professed desire of our friends on the other side so often expressed for a reduction of taxes may not be thwarted by their votes against taking up the bill.

Mr. BAYARD. Mr. President, I am a member of the committee which has been charged with the consideration of these questions, and I do not propose to speak of what goes on in the committee-room, but I merely say, in the presence of the chairman of that committee and the other members of it, that I do not presume any member will venture to say that there has been the slightest suggestion of delay, the least disposition to stave off the consideration of the Senate the question of taxation in any form. No one will rise here and say it, no one can rise here and say it. There is one thing in which I agree with the honorable Senator from Ohio and with the honorable Senator from Minnesota, and that is the gravity and importance of this question. It always was a grave question; it never was as grave and important as it is to-day. There never was an hour in the history of this country when the exercise of the great and sovereign power of taxation all over the United States was so important to be fixed upon a just basis as it is to-day; never was the amount of property in this country so great as it is to-day; never were the interests to be affected by the arrangements of taxation so important as they are to-day; never were we brought so face to face with the terrible problem of the adjustments of the relation of capital and labor as you are brought to-day. And well may the Senator from Ohio say it is important for the Senate properly to consider this subject. But, sir, I do submit that in speaking of this side and in addressing themselves to this side of the Chamber the Senator from Ohio and the Senator from Minnesota have exhibited rather more the astuteness and skill of veteran politicians than they have of statesmen disposed to deal with this question as it ought to be dealt with, the astuteness of skillful and dexterous politicians rather more than anything else.

Mr. President, I hold that the Senate by its majority has a right, and it is its duty, to control the consideration and order of its business. I have never stood in the way of that. It can to-day vote to take up any measure it sees fit and pass upon it as the majority shall see fit; and therefore it is only the duty of the minority or the duty of any member of the body to lay before the Senate the various questions presenting themselves for consideration, in order that the majority may select under their discretion and their own sense of responsibility which question they will proceed to consider. That is all there is in this case.

The Senator from Ohio says that hot or cold we cannot adjourn without a reduction of taxation. Well, Mr. President, coming from that Senator, so distinguished a member of this body, there is at least a coolness in his statement that is delightful in this July weather. Who has had this question under control? For eight months we have been in session. The House of Representatives at the end of eight months and in advance of this measure sent us a resolution for adjournment sine die on a day already past. It was on your table, read, and referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and with it comes a poor little beggarly bill called "A bill to reduce internal-revenue taxation;" nothing about the tariff, nothing about the taxes that really oppress the people of this country, nothing about the indirect taxes that are infinitely more oppressive than those which go straightforwardly and openly into the Treasury. They send here a bill to take the tax off matches, to take the tax off patent medicines, to take the tax off bank deposits; as to the latter of which the Senate passed a bill one year ago, introduced here by a Democratic Senator, myself, at the instance of the Finance Committee. There would have been no tax on deposits for a year past if the voice of the Senate unanimously expressed had been heeded.

Mr. COKE. I would suggest to the Senator from Delaware that this bill proposes also to raise the tax on cotton-ties.

Mr. BAYARD. That was not the action of the House. The House did not touch the tariff question.

Mr. COKE. It is in the present bill as reported.

Mr. BAYARD. The House sent to us a bill professing to reduce internal-revenue taxes, and this Senate and the honorable Senator from Ohio, [Mr. SHERMAN,] almost the most experienced member of this body, especially upon the subject of taxes and taxation, had none of this light; he felt apparently none of this terrible duty now imposed upon him of reduction, in which I shall join him heart and hand, until the House had acted, and until that mysterious body unknown to American Constitution and laws, but so potential a factor in American legislation, the caucus of the majority, had decided that the House was wrong, that the Republican House speaking for that party and the governing power of the people under the Constitution in the way of originating bills relative to taxation was wrong, and that taxes really must be reduced by attacking the tariff; and so we come to this measure. I am forbidden by the rules to touch the merits of this question, nor do I mean to do so, on this motion; but when a man tells me that the bill as brought first to the Senate was a bill to reduce taxation, he really appeals to my risibility. It will appear absurd before the people of this country to talk about the bill just reported by the Senator from Ohio and the Senator from Vermont as being a reduction of taxation. It takes off by the ounce and puts on by the ton. That is called a reduction of taxation!

But there is one measure that should have preceded this. We are apparently embarking upon an investigation of the tariff question. We cannot touch it without going through it. We have the highest authority of the Republican members in this body that the tariff is a system. To be a proper system, it should be wise, judicious, capable; and it is not to be attacked or treated piecemeal. You are not to pull feathers out; you must treat it as a whole; and these were the doctrines and such were the declarations under which the tariff-commission bill was recommended and under which it passed this Senate and passed the other House.

Well, now I say that preceding all this it would have been better, out of the decorum due to the nine respectable gentlemen who have been selected for the purpose of considering the tariff question, to repeal the act under which they were ordered to convene. This is simply a snub to the tariff commission in advance. It is simply a vote of want of confidence in that commission in advance. I have no objection to considering it. I am willing to take it up and do my best with the Senators on the other side and on this to treat this question fairly, wisely, and justly, and to approach that which I am satisfied is to be a marked day in American history, the settlement of the great question whether you can use the taxing power of this Government in favor of special classes and for special legislation, or whether your sole power begins and ends with laying taxes for the purpose of affording the necessary means to support the Government.

Mr. President, I am perfectly willing to begin at two o'clock, or now, at twenty-five minutes of two, to take up this tariff question as it has been presented by the authority of the majority of the Committee on Finance. That majority of the committee is understood. The bill they have brought in is not the view, is not the opinion of the minority of that committee. We propose to go much further in reduction. We propose to make reductions real and actual in the way of taxation, and to lift off burdens, and not simply to grant favors. That is the intention; and the sooner that commences the better for my satisfaction.

I agree it is not a pleasant season of the year to work; I agree it s not particularly favorable for wise action to begin the work on the iverge of a political canvass for the purpose of gaining some small party or temporary advantage. We are told frankly that some of these changes in the tariff laws are to be temporary. That is not the way to deal with a tariff; that is not the way to deal with a tax. As great a vice as the law can contain as to taxes is the vice of instability. It is the dread of the manufacturer, of the merchant, and of the true statesman. It is only a resort which cannot be justified, and would not be asked for except for certain party ends.

Therefore it is, sir, that I am perfectly indifferent as to which measure the majority shall see fit to address itself to. I will vote to take up the tax bill, but here in the presence of the committee, and in reply to what has fallen from the Senator from Minnesota and the Senator from Ohio, I simply state that there has not been one-half minute's delay in the consideration of this measure by any member of the Committee on Finance.

Mr. VAN WYCK. Mr. President——

Mr. BECK. Will the Senator from Nebraska allow me to say a word in reply to the Senator from Minnesota? He seemed to think I was endeavoring to avoid this question, while the reverse was the fact.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Nebraska yield?

Mr. VAN WYCK. I understand the gentleman desires to make an explanation as to some suggestion made by the Senator from Minnesota.

Mr. BECK. I do not desire to take the floor from the Senator from Nebraska; I ask his consent to say a few words.

Mr. VAN WYCK. Not to take the floor from me?

Mr. BECK. No; but just to say a few words.

Mr. VAN WYCK. Very well.

Mr. BECK. The Senator from Minnesota either misunderstood my position or sought to make an impression on the country that all my anxiety to reduce taxation was now proved to be a false pretense, because I did not at once, the next morning after a report was made by the Committee on Finance, and before Senators had even had time to read what was done, agree in hot haste to set aside the Calendar, to set aside everything. You cannot wait until two o'clock, you must displace the regular business, and because I would not agree to this he would represent that I, and the common run of the members of the Democratic party were avoiding a reduction of taxation. Why, sir, just the reverse is true. As the Senator from Delaware said, every amendment that proposed a genuine reduction of taxation came from him or myself or some Democratic member of that committee, and was uniformly voted down by the Republican majority of the committee; and the little bill that they laid before us, the little bill that came from the House was so disreputably small in its proportions, was so evidently in the interest of a few classes and not in the interest of the great mass of the people, that after the House sent it to us, although they had agreed to adjourn on the 10th and pass the bill after they had fixed the day of adjournment, after holding it eight months, the Committee on Finance refused to consider anything but the little privileged items that the House sent to us. The bill became so ridiculous when the country understood it that the Republican party did not dare to go before the country with such a miserable bill and such a pretense of relief. So they met in caucus and ordered other things to be added. The Senator thinks I cannot sleep on account of thinking of taxation. I will say to him that I was sleeping soundly the night he was sitting in caucus ordering the derelict Finance Committee to do better than they had done, and to bring in something lest the country should say that the party was disgraced.

Now, I am prepared to go for an honest reduction, and prepared to vote to take up this bill when two o'clock comes, or I am prepared to vote now, since we have talked the time away, to take up the bill for a reduction of internal-revenue taxes and the tariff taxes, and to do what little I can to give honest relief to the people.

Mr. VAN WYCK. Mr. President, I certainly am opposed, for other reasons than those given by the gentlemen on the other side, to the consideration of this measure at this particular time. I am with my friend from Vermont in favor of this bill, but if it is to be taken up now I do not wish it to stand in the way of all other legislation except as the gentleman who has charge of the bill proposes to allow the consideration of other matters.

Mr. SHERMAN. The Senator is mistaken about that. The bill can only be taken up at any time before two o'clock by a majority of the Senate on motion. If it is taken up now and is left as the unfinished business to-day, it will not come up until two o'clock to-morrow. That I understand will be the rule; the Senate can order otherwise, of course.

Mr. VAN WYCK. Precisely; but if it once comes up, then I presume it stays here, and that is just the reason why I object. There are other measures as important really.

Mr. RANSOM. Do I understand the Senator from Ohio to say that it is his purpose to take this bill up only occasionally in the morning hour, and not press it to a vote?

Mr. SHERMAN. Oh, no. I say that if this bill is taken up now and is left as the unfinished business to-day, it does not come up again until two o'clock to-morrow, unless the Senate by a majority vote should before two o'clock to-morrow take it up at the close of the regular morning business. That is the rule of the Senate.

Mr. VAN WYCK. Then it is in order every day at two o'clock, as I understand?

Mr. SHERMAN. Until set aside by a majority of the Senate.

Mr. VAN WYCK. The Senator from Ohio says there are amendments here sufficient to occupy the attention of the Senate a week.

Mr. BUTLER. Two weeks, I can say.

Mr. VAN WYCK. There are some small measures that can be disposed of; and if this bill is to occupy that length of time, why not let these other measures that are important in their way be got out of the road so that there shall be nothing then to antagonize this bill?

With all due deference to my learned friend, it seems very much as if this bill was to be forced now to be taken up and then to be forced through to a final vote by driving other measures out of the way, or in order to enable other measures to be considered in this body.

I am opposed, I will say to my friend, to taking up this bill to-day and in the morning hour, and I do not want to be considered by that vote as antagonizing the merits of the bill—by no means. My friend from Maryland [Mr. GROOME] has suggested a bill and asks the consent of the gentleman in charge of this measure that he may have it considered—an important measure, a measure coming from the Committee on Pensions, preventing the payment of double pensions.

Gentlemen will excuse me for explaining why I am not prepared to vote in favor of taking up the tax bill at this time. It is not known and never has been known in this Government that one man should receive two pensions, and the act of Congress which gave the special pension expressly declared that it was to be in lieu of any pension the man was then receiving. In spite of that, the party has gone to the Attorney-General and obtained an opinion that notwithstanding this declaration of Congress in the act granting the special pension, still this pensioner is also entitled to the pension which he had been receiving, although Congress has emphatically said he should not. The reason that strikes me is this: the Secretary of the Interior has received a letter substantially of instruction from the Attorney-General, and he feels bound to act upon it, and I understand has ordered the Commissioner of Pensions to so act, and if he does that to-day or to-morrow it takes between $6,000 and $8,000 out of the Treasury. Of course $6,000 or $8,000 is a small matter in this Congress, but it is in violation of the law, and it is no better certainly than any other robbery of the Treasury. That is one measure which should be acted upon immediately.

I am rejoiced that some of my friends have assumed the position they have this day, and that they are getting substantially on the good old Republican platform again. I am rejoiced that the Senator from Vermont [Mr. MORRILL] and the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. WINDOM] are now giving in their adhesion to that plank of the Republican platform which declares a tariff for revenue with incidental protection. I rejoice even if it is at the last hour that my friends can gather together upon that platform which gave peace and comfort to the Republican party in 1876 and 1880, and enabled us to obtain a triumph at the ballot-box.

There is no force in the argument, because it was suggested a long time ago, I would say to my distinguished friend from Ohio, that it would not be safe for us to leave these Halls without relieving the people from some of the burdens that rested upon them. It is rather late in the day, it is true, but "better late than never." Certainly the argument would come with more force if we had commenced this six months ago, as we had the same facts in relation to Bessemer steel and sugar six months ago as we have to-day, and yet no effort was made, although the Senator from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN] did urge that duties should be reduced on the articles above named. This he urged when the tariff commission was under consideration, but the special advocates of that measure were not then inclined to any proposition for immediate action looking to any such reduction.

Mr. SHERMAN. We could not originate such a bill in the Senate.

Mr. VAN WYCK. The House is part of this brotherhood.

Mr. SHERMAN. But we could not originate the bill in the Senate.

Mr. VAN WYCK. Precisely. I am willing to take my share of responsibility. We are doing it late. I am willing to stay here and do it. It is well we have accomplished this much, even if we have started late, and I suggest to my friends now not to stop other legislation that is necessary, because it is perfectly evident why this reduction of the tariff is proposed. The late decision of the Supreme Court shows the fact that this body some time previously had made a mistake in regard to knit goods. That decision has lately been made, and by that decision it is claimed that an injustice is done to the manufacturers of knit goods, and the moment that was discovered there was force in the argument. True there were but few engaged in the manufacture of knit goods, but $90,000,000 was invested in the manufacture, and therefore Congress must correct its mistake; and if that mistake had not been discovered, if the decision of the Supreme Court had not been made, we should probably not have been considering the question of any reduction of the tariff at this late day of the session, and in order to obtain this correction of the tariff law it became necessary to make some concession to the people to relieve them of some of the burdens, because otherwise if Congress closed its session the only thing done on the subject of the tariff would be the appointment of the tariff commission and the fact that we had corrected a mistake in regard to knit goods by raising the tariff thereon. It would be necessary then to tell the people that this Congress had not time to legislate on a matter which directly affected millions of the people.

I merely desired to say this to satisfy my friend who has charge of this bill that I am with him upon his measure, with him to its fullest extent, but I have begged him that he would not introduce his measure to-day to thrust it across legislation on a few subjects which should at this time receive the attention of this body, some of them even this very day.

Mr. BUTLER. I shall not detain the Senate. I simply desire to make a response to the Senator from Minnesota. He says he is very much surprised at the attitude of the Democrats upon this question of considering this bill. I am very much surprised that the Senator should have expressed that surprise. He has perhaps forgotten the vote upon the proposition to organize the tariff commission. I was one of the unfortunates who voted for that commission, and I voted for it upon the positive and solemn assurance that the tariff commission was to take into consideration the very questions now being considered in this bill.

Mr. ALDRICH. Will the Senator from South Carolina allow me to read a short extract from a speech of the Senator from Delaware, [Mr. BAYARD,] who had charge of the tariff-commission bill, right on the point he is now discussing?

Mr. BUTLER. I will after a moment. I simply want to give the vote. The affirmative vote upon that measure in the Senate was composed of the following Senators: Messrs.—

Aldrich,	Davis, of W. Va.,	Johnston,	Platt,
Allison,	Dawes,	Jones of Nevada,	Plumb,
Anthony,	Frye,	Lapham,	Rollins,
Bayard,	Gorman,	McMillan,	Saunders,
Blair,	Groome,	McPherson,	Sawyer,
Brown,	Hampton,	Mahone,	Sewell,
Butler,	Harrison,	Miller of Cal.,	Teller,
Camden,	Hawley,	Miller of N. Y.,	Voorhees.
Cameron of Pa.,	Hill of Colorado,	Mitchell,
Conger,	Hoar,	Morrill,

Of that number eleven are Democrats, the rest Republicans. The Senators on this side of the Chamber were pressing "in season and out of season" for the consideration of this question, insisting that it was the duty of Congress to take into consideration the revision of the tariff, and I submit that it does not come with good grace from the Senator from Minnesota in view of that vote to say what he has said here to-day, when he is urging us to carry out the decree of a Republican caucus which proposes what? Alarmed at the attitude of the country, alarmed at the position in which his party had been placed by moving the adoption of this commission, and before the commission is actually organized a bill comes in from the House proposing to tinker with and tamper with the tariff, which was said at the time should be considered only by the tariff commission.

Now, the Senator from Arkansas desires to know where this additional information comes from. I can tell the Senator. It comes from the lash of the Republican caucus. That is the inspiration. At the eleventh hour, on the eve of adjournment, when the proper time for adjournment has come, the Republican caucus gets together and insists that something must be done or they cannot go into the next canvass with safety. What is that something? To abolish the bank-check tax, to abolish the tax on national banks, to abolish the tax on matches, to abolish the tax, I believe, on patent medicines, proprietary medicines; and the Senator says that upon that enormous bill for the reduction of taxes which is so greatly to relieve the country, we can now proceed to consider the whole tariff question at this late hour of the session. I say to the Senator that, while I was one of those Democrats silly enough to vote for the commission bill—I confess it, and hope the Lord will forgive me for it, because I believe now it was a sham, a pretense, for the purposes of delay as was urged at the time by those who opposed the measure——

Mr. WINDOM. Does the Senator consider the effort to get this bill up, which may cover the whole ground, an evidence of delay?

Mr. BUTLER. Ah! Mr. President, the Senator from Minnesota has no more idea of granting real relief under this bill than the man in the moon, and he knows it, and so do the majority of the Senate who have had control of this subject——

Mr. WINDOM. I do not know any such thing. I know the contrary.

Mr. BUTLER. The majority have not the slightest idea of granting real relief to this country in the reduction of taxation; and yet we are taunted on this side of the Chamber because at the eleventh hour we do not lay aside more important business to take up and permit the majority to pass a bill which shall be a sop to Cerberus, a tub to the whale, and nothing else. I say to the Senator from Minnesota and to the Senator from Vermont and the Senator from Ohio that unless I am very much mistaken we will make those Senators sick before this discussion is through, as to the reduction of taxation.

Mr. HAWLEY. I am ready to be made sick. If it be really necessary to undertake now at this time of the session a thorough discussion of the whole tariff question from beginning to end, I shall not run away from it a foot. There is not the slighest concealment or necessity for explanation or embarrassment on the part of the Republicans. I do not believe that the whole tariff can be wisely considered and well revised without a good report from a commission.

It will be a convenience and a help and a benefit to us. It is not essential; we can do without it; but it was the general judgment of the Republican party and of many Democrats that it would be wise to appoint a commission. I for one—and I know I speak for many others, for I have heard them say so within this half hour—did not mean by voting for the tariff commission that we were to surrender our judgments in the mean time and to absolutely refuse to make any reduction in the tariff whatever.

I have also known that about which there has been no concealment either, that the great majority of the Republicans in Congress believe there ought to be a serious reduction in taxation before we adjourn. The surplus is monstrous; it is enormous; it is dangerous, $150,000,000, and I do not know but that it will be more next year. It has already led us into unwisdom in the shape of an excessive and monstrous river and harbor bill and into other expenses that, I think, can scarcely be justified by the strictest economy. Many of us have been urging during this whole session that we ought to reduce taxation; that we ought not to go home without some reduction of taxation; and here is a bill that proposes to take off forty millions, more or less, from the taxes. Objection is not made to any one of the items; there is no denial that there ought to be reduction; nor is there a single man who objects to any one of the items, but the trouble seems to be on the Democratic side that they want to make this reduction in the way to suit them, and, as near as I can find out, the way to suit them was to go home without making it at all, and leave them to say in the fall campaign that they had been trying for a year to make us come to a reduction.

I see nothing extraordinary in the proposition to take this bill up now. Great emphasis is placed on the word "now," as if there was something peculiarly sacred about this very identical moment. This is just the time to take it up. Should we have undertaken a reduction of twenty-five or fifty or seventy-five million dollars early in the session, when no human being could tell how large the river and harbor bill was going to be or a dozen other bills? It was not certain up to the last moment where the river and harbor bill would stop. If Divine Providence had not brought us to a vote on that subject, the bill would have got to thirty or forty or fifty millions by this time. No man could tell what the appropriations for this year would be. We had no right to begin to reduce taxes until the end of the session.

I am happy to say that that caucus the other evening was one of the most charming and agreeable and harmonious caucuses I ever saw. I heard no note of discord. It was a charming conference and its members were entirely unanimous. Our purpose is to get about $40,000,000 off the taxes and go home and use this opposition of the Democrats against them in the fall campaign, and we will do it.

Mr. ALDRICH. I was very greatly surprised to hear the Senator from South Carolina say that he voted for the tariff-commission bill with the understanding that the whole question of the tariff was relegated to that commission, and that Congress was precluded by that action from reducing taxes of any kind.

The criticism was made upon the Democratic side of the Chamber and often reiterated that the whole purpose and object of the commission bill was to postpone action upon the tariff, and to prevent Congress from taking up and considering existing abuses, which were very graphically described by the gentlemen on the other side. This allegation and criticism were most emphatically denied by the friends of the bill who spoke on the subject.

Mr. BUTLER rose.

Mr. SAULSBURY. May I remind——

Mr. ALDRICH. I hope gentlemen will allow me to go a little further. Then I shall be very glad to answer any questions.

Mr. BUTLER. I was going to ask the Senator what that commission was——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will stop the entire debate. The hour of two o'clock has arrived, and the Chair lays before the Senate the unfinished business.

Mr. ANTHONY. I hope my colleague will be allowed to finish what he was saying.

Mr. ALLISON. I hope the Senator from Rhode Island will not be struck at.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection?

Mr. MORRILL. I move that the present and all prior orders be laid aside for the purpose of taking up the tax bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Had not the Senator better move to postpone to a day certain? The Senator from Vermont moves to postpone until what day?

Mr. MORRILL. I will move to postpone the unfinished business. I should like to have the Senator from Rhode Island finish his remarks if there is no objection.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair, of course, has no objection; but if the Senator from Rhode Island continues others will wish to speak.

Mr. MORRILL. I move, then, to postpone the present and all prior orders for one week from to-day.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is moved——

Mr. VAN WYCK. I trust the Senator from Rhode Island will be allowed to proceed, with the understanding that then the matter shall cease for the day.

Mr. ALDRICH. I presume I can proceed on the motion now made.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the Senator from Rhode Island proceeding with his remarks?

Mr. SAULSBURY. With the understanding that other gentlemen are to follow.

Mr. ALDRICH. I can speak on this motion.

Mr. SHERMAN. The general custom has always been to allow a gentleman having the floor when the morning hour expires to finish his remarks.

Mr. BECK. Everybody wants to go on.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Vermont want the vote taken now on his motion?

Mr. MORRILL. Yes, sir.

Mr. VOORHEES. Discussion on the motion of the Senator from Vermont may extend indefinitely. I shall listen with pleasure to the Senator from Rhode Island, and I shall listen also to others.

Mr. SAUNDERS. I hope the motion to postpone the unfinished business will not carry. We already have a regular order for to-day that has been kept before the Senate for a number of days, and it affects a very large number of people.

Mr. ALDRICH. If discussion is to go on I hope I shall be allowed to hold the floor.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Rhode Island has the floor to finish his remarks, no objection being made.

Mr. ALDRICH. To show what the position was of the friends of the measure in the Senate, as manifested by the declaration of the gentleman who had the bill in charge, I ask permission to read from the remarks made by the Senator from Delaware, [Mr. BAYARD.]

Mr. VOORHEES. The Senator from Delaware will have the right to reply.

Mr. ALDRICH. That Senator said:

> And if to-morrow morning a bill comes from the House practically reforming the tariff I shall vote for it most heartily; but I do not hold that this bill in any way, expressly or impliedly, prevents me from voting upon any measure that shall come here that will enable me to rectify the tariff.

That was said in answer to a question of the Senator from Iowa [Mr. ALLISON] as to the probability of legislation at this present session of Congress. At other times in the discussion the Senator from Delaware took the same position, namely, that the bill did not and was not intended to preclude Congress from acting on tariff legislation, and that he was ready at any time to proceed with the work of correcting the tariff whenever a bill should be sent here from the House of Representatives for that purpose.

Mr. BUTLER. As he is now.

Mr. BAYARD. Will the Senator permit me a word?

Mr. ALDRICH. Certainly.

Mr. BAYARD. He is perfectly correct, and there is nothing whatever in what I have said to-day inconsistent with what I said before.

Mr. ALDRICH. I have not intimated or implied a change of views on the part of the Senator. The Senator from South Carolina, however, said he voted for that bill with the understanding that it did preclude other action, and other Democratic Senators, notably the Senator from Arkansas, [Mr. GARLAND,] have declared that the bill was passed with the distinct understanding that it would prevent any subsequent tariff legislation on the part of this Congress. I merely desired to show that this was not the position taken by the friends of the bill, that they distinctly disclaimed any such purpose.

Mr. BAYARD. I never conceived for one moment that the Congress of the United States had a right to denude themselves for one instant of the power of legislation over that subject.

Mr. ALDRICH. The Senator from Delaware is simply reiterating the position which he then occupied and the position which was occupied by all the Senators, so far as I know, on this side of the Chamber who voted for the bill.

Mr. BAYARD. I never heard one on that side say so.

Mr. ALDRICH. If you did not, I will read a portion of the speech of the Senator from Ohio, [Mr. SHERMAN.] He said:

> Some of the difficulties stated ought not to continue during the present session. The sugar duty ought at once to be regulated by law; Congress will be derelict in its duty unless it does so. The incongruities in respect to steel and iron and wool ought to be corrected. The whole of this essential and urgent legislation might be grouped in a bill of a single printed page.

Mr. BECK. Will the Senator from Rhode Island read it from somebody else other than the Senator from Ohio, because he was pretty hard on the tariff-commission bill, about as hard as I was for a while.

Mr. ALDRICH. I have read from one leading Democrat and one leading Republican who were understood to be the friends, representatives, and advocates of the bill on this floor.

Mr. BUTLER. Will the Senator now refer to some extracts from the speeches of the Senator from Vermont?

Mr. MORRILL. You will find nothing in any speech I have made contradicting the position taken by those gentlemen.

Mr. ALDRICH. The record of the debate is open to the Senator from South Carolina. The views expressed by the Senators I have quoted were concurred in by other supporters of the bill, and so far as I know the contrary opinion found no expression from any friend of the measure.

Mr. JONAS. Will the Senator from Rhode Island read the remarks of the Senator from Iowa [Mr. ALLISON] on that occasion, and see what he said on the subject?

Mr. ALDRICH. I have finished, but I shall be very glad to listen to anything the Senator from Louisiana may read from the Senator from Iowa. I am sure it will be interesting reading.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Vermont to postpone until a week from to-day the consideration of the unfinished business, which is the bill (S. No. 2114) establishing the Territory of Pembina and providing a temporary government therefor.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I believe that motion is debatable. I simply want to express my surprise at the change which has come over the spirit of the dream of gentlemen on the other side on this question. I remember distinctly that the Senator from Iowa [Mr. ALLISON] on the day that the tariff-commission bill was passed declared in the presence of his colleagues on the other side of the Chamber that that postponed the consideration of the tariff question for two years. I have not the language precisely before me.

Mr. ALLISON. Will the Senator allow me?

Mr. SAULSBURY. Certainly.

Mr. ALLISON. I was laboring under that delusion until informed by the Senator's colleague that no such purpose was intended by the friends of the bill, and of course I fell in at once with the idea of the Senator from Delaware, his colleague.

Mr. SAULSBURY. There is no mistaking the fact and there is no misleading the country on this question. The Democratic members of the Senate who resisted the commission bill placed their opposition distinctly on the ground that it was a measure intended on the part of some of the advocates of it to postpone the consideration of the tariff question and the reduction of taxation under it, and at the conclusion of that debate all they had said was verified by the open and manly declaration of the Senator from Iowa, who proclaimed in the presence of his colleagues in this Chamber and in the hearing of his fellow-members of the Republican party that that was the effect—to postpone the consideration of the tariff question and the relief of the country from taxation for two years.

Now, however, our Republican friends, seeing the blunder they have made, finding that they are face to face with a campaign that may determine the complexion of the other House of Congress and affect to some extent the complexion of this body in the next Congress, becoming alarmed at the folly which they committed when they pleaded with their colleagues in the other House to send a bill here not for the relief of the people from taxation but for the purpose of relieving corporations, not for the purpose of giving relief to the tax-payers of the country but for the purpose of increasing the revenues of the manufacturing interest of the country and of the banking capital of the country—having become alarmed at the temerity of the other House, they come in now at the dictation of a Republican caucus, in order to save themselves from the defeat which they saw was inevitable, and propose—not with sincerity, not because they desire to reduce taxes but for the purpose of saving themselves from overwhelming defeat—that this bill shall be taken up. They contradict their own position of only a few weeks ago in reference to this whole question, and now seek to throw the responsibility of any delay in the adjustment of the tariff revenues upon this side of the Chamber simply because we tell them to wait until two o'clock in order that some measures on the Calendar may be passed in the mean time.

Mr. WINDOM. It is after two o'clock now.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I know it is, but the remarks of the Senator from Minnesota and some of his associates on that side of the Chamber have justly provoked criticism. While they speak of certain ideas in which we are enlisted their own record stares them in the face and shows that it was their purpose, object, and intent, by the appointment of a commission to revise the tariff, to evade the duty which had devolved on them as the majority party of Congress; and now, having become alarmed, they come in and seek to atone for their own past dereliction. That is the whole case. There is no disguising the fact; the country will understand it. We have some little sense in the Senate of the United States, but our constituents have got as much sense as we have, Senators. They have merely selected us out of the great body of the people to come here to represent them, but they understand these questions just as well as we do. There are men in every one of our States that comprehend the tariff question just as fully as any of us. They understand the motives that prompt the Republican majority of this Senate at this late day to come in here now and attempt to hoodwink them by proposing a revision of the tariff.

We will join you, however, Senators; we will go as far as any of you will go for a reduction of taxation and the relief of the people. I am glad your proposition has come here.

I said in the speech I made on the tariff-commission bill that the highest duty devolving on Congress at the present session was to reduce taxation, and that we ought to stay here until we had done it, and if we had not sense enough to do it we ought to resign and let men come here who would do it. That is my sentiment yet, and I am willing to stay here during the hot months of August and September, if necessary, to relieve the people of this country of the onerous taxation which your party has placed upon them, and which up to the present hour it has persistently refused to relieve them from. I will join you and so will the great body of the Democrats on this side of the Chamber join in a reduction of taxation, but we want to make that reduction so as to give relief to the people, and not be in the interest alone of national banking and other banking institutions and corporations. We will go as far as the farthest toward the relief that the people demand, and we are only glad that you have waked up, not through any conviction of your judgment but by an appeal to your fears as politicians, to do your duty.

Mr. WINDOM. I want to withdraw the expression of astonishment which I made a few moments ago in reply to the Senator from South Carolina. I think that I had no reason to be surprised at the position of our friends on the other side of the Chamber. The question was sprung somewhat suddenly; and, without much reflection upon the past, and having only in mind the speeches that I had heard made in this Chamber, I did at the time feel some astonishment that the Democratic party had placed itself this morning in antagonism to this measure; but when I reflected that the Democratic party for six years had control of the House of Representatives, and that during two years of that time they had control both of the House and of the Senate, and that the net result of all their efforts and enthusiasm in behalf of the repeal of taxation was the reduction of the duty on quinine, I confess I ought not to have felt surprised at their position this morning.

Mr. FARLEY. Mr. President, I have nothing to say in reference to the proposition now before the Senate, but it seems to me, from the direction which this debate has taken, that this bill had better be postponed, as in my opinion it is evidently intended for a political debate and not to accomplish the objects that are ostensibly set forth in the bill. Here we have one party arraigning the other party, and it is simply transferring to the people of the several Congressional districts that are now attempted to be controlled by what is supposed to be legislation; and to transfer the matter there at once would save those of us who live at a distance from the capital a good deal of annoyance and a good deal of hot weather.

The Senator from Minnesota this morning said in answer to the Senator from Arkansas that he would find the thermometer going up above 94°. I want to say to that Senator that I think if this debate is continued here, when he gets before his constituents in the coming election he will find that the Republican thermometer will go down to zero instead of going up high.

This is evidently intended as a political discussion and not for the purpose of accomplishing the object purporting to be accomplished in this bill. The honorable Senator from Connecticut spoke of the harmony that existed in the Republican caucus the other night, and what a happy family they were; that it was intended to go before the people and to destroy the Democratic party. The honorable Senator from Minnesota just now spoke of the course of the Democratic party heretofore. He did not seem to remember that with a President opposed to any policy in regard to tariff reduction that a Democratic Congress might have proposed, action would have been useless. It looks to me as if this whole debate, this whole movement with this little bill sent here from the House torn all to pieces by our committee, have a political design. I am afraid that the chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means of the House will not know this bill when it goes back there. The tariff on some articles is proposed to be increased by the Committee on Finance of the Senate. The original bill was simply a small thing sent here to see how the Senate would take it.

I am not opposed to legislating on the tariff question now, but if the Senators on the other side of the Chamber think that they are going to make any political capital out of this thing, all right; we will endeavor to stand the test, although some of us are not accustomed to remaining in Washington the year round.

Mr. SAUNDERS. I hope this motion will not prevail. We had before us a bill, already made the special order for this time, to organize a territorial government for the people of Pembina, who are demanding it, I was going to say almost unanimously. We have not had a single letter or a single petition from any party whatever, any class of people there, who have not asked for the organization of this territory. The main reason, I may say in a few words, why it has not been attended to earlier is that we expected at the start to put before the Senate the bill for the admission of Dakota as a State, and in doing so the bill provided that this same territory should have an organization separate and apart from that. In other words, if that bill had become a law it would have carried with it all that we propose by this bill. Finding that it was getting late in the session, and that there were some difficulties in the way of the passage of that bill, I concluded with others that we had better let it rest for the present, and take up the bill, to which there seemed to be no objection at the time, to organize the Territory of Pembina.

Now, let me just say in a few words to the Senators on this side that this new territory is larger than all the New England States together; it is as large as Indiana and Ohio both together, and so far located from the capital of the present Territory that it requires, as I stated a few days ago, from six to eight or ten hundred miles for many of the people to reach it. There are no railroads running north and south there. They are lucky to have any railroads at all in a new country like that. The only railroads that are built are from the east to the west, and people are settled all over this large extensive country; and, as I say, without distinction of party, they are asking us to organize them into a territory as we can do in an hour's time if Senators will only allow us to take a vote. I am willing to say that if I could have fifteen minutes to lay some facts before the Senate on this subject, to show where this territory is, the size of it in comparison with other States and Territories, the number of people there and their facilities for doing business and their want of facilities, I should be willing to drop the subject myself and take the vote at any time the Senate might designate.

Indeed I will go further than that. If the bill is taken up now and no time allowed for debate, I should be willing to take the vote at this instant, because I believe that every Senator's mind is made up on the question whether these people ought to have a territorial organization or not. I would not want to lose two hours with it. Some Senators say it will take two days. If it takes two hours, it is more than it ought to take, because there should be but one question in this matter, and that is that the request of the people there for a territorial organization should be granted and granted now at this session. On that account I do hope the Senate will not change the order, but will take up the Pembina bill and at least let us have a vote upon it.

Mr. VEST. A single word, because I do not propose to enter into this debate at this time. I want to call the attention of the Senator from Minnesota to the taunt which he made in reference to the Democratic party having done nothing with the tariff during the time it was in power in both Houses of Congress and to the reply that is made to it by a member of his own party. The taunt of the Senator has not even the merit of originality, because in the discussion upon the tariff commission the Senator from Iowa [Mr. ALLISON] used this language:

> I consider that nothing is impossible with this Congress; but we have sat here since 1875, six years of that time with a Democratic majority in the House of Representatives, and these complaints have been made over and over again in both Houses of Congress by Democratic speeches which would fill volumes, and yet that majority stood there for six years and never touched this tariff, which stands to-day practically as it stood at the close of the war in 1865.

To which the Senator from Nebraska, [Mr. VAN WYCK,] a member in good standing, I believe, of the Republican party on this floor, answered as follows:

> I should like to ask the Senator right there this question: If the Democratic party failed to do their duty for six years on this question, I ask him whether he thinks it is any better for us, the Republican party, to adopt a commission whose only object is to do the very things which my friend suggests that the Democrats did for six sessions of Congress, and postpone reform till the next Congress?

To which there was no reply and has been no reply up to this very minute.

Mr. ALDRICH. Will the Senator from Missouri allow me to interrupt him for a moment?

Mr. VEST. Certainly.

Mr. ALDRICH. I call the Senator's attention to a remark which the Senator from Iowa [Mr. ALLISON] made prior to that time. On page 30 of the same RECORD he said:

> It seems to be taken for granted, at least in all the debates as far as I have listened to them, that when this commission shall be appointed all legislation on the subject of the tariff will stop until their report comes in.
> Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin, Mr. BAYARD, and others. Oh, no.

It was denied at the time, and denied by the Senator in charge of the bill for the friends of the measure, and by the Senator from Wisconsin and others.

Mr. VEST. Yes; but not denied by any Republicans so far as I see.

Mr. WINDOM. Will the Senator from Missouri yield to me a single moment at that point?

Mr. VEST. Certainly.

Mr. WINDOM. I trust the Senator did not believe that I imagined I was stating an original proposition when I made that remark. The fact is the whole country has been talking about it for several years. I supposed everybody knew it, and I simply referred to the fact.

Mr. VEST. I have no doubt that Republican Senators and Republican Members have rung the changes upon that over and over again. It is very difficult to find any salient point on which to make a single vote which they have not used for party purposes. Yet every intelligent man in the country knows that while we boasted a majority in both Houses of Congress the executive power was against us, and any bill passed against his party legislation would have been vetoed immediately.

Mr. BUTLER. I should like to state one other fact for the information of the Senator from Missouri. He has perhaps forgotten what was known as the Wood bill for the revision of the tariff which was defeated by Republican votes.

Mr. HALE. No, the Republicans never had power to defeat any bill in that Congress. They were always in a minority.

Mr. BUTLER. They had power to do a great many things, as a minority always have, and they did that.

Mr. VEST. As I say, every intelligent man in the country knows that while we boasted a majority in both Houses of Congress it was impossible for us to overcome the executive veto, as was demonstrated by the legislation had in the last Congress in regard to the Army bill and other questions, upon which it is not necessary to go into detail. But I call the attention of the Senator from Rhode Island, as he has called mine, to page 30 of the RECORD, to the position of the Republican party on the 28th of March, nearly the last day of March, in the present year. The Senator from West Virginia [Mr. DAVIS] said:

> I would ask my friend if this commission bill should pass both Houses is there anything in the way of going on and perfecting either the customs duties or the internal revenue?

What said the Senator from Iowa, [Mr. ALLISON?] The Senator from Iowa replied:

> I do not so understand. I understand of course that we can, if we choose, go on and legislate on the tariff or on the internal revenue, but it is an open secret that the Committee on Ways and Means of the House, which must originate all tariff measures, have not considered the question of the tariff practically thus far in this session; and if this bill is voted up or voted down every Senator here must know that it is a practical impossibility to consider the tariff question at this session of Congress; and if it is a practical impossibility during the remainder of this session, it is equally impracticable to consider it during the next session, which lasts only three months, when we are pressed night and day for the consideration of appropriation bills. Therefore we may just as well understand here and now that this proposition is a proposition to postpone until the next Congress the consideration of the tariff question, and I shall vote for it with that understanding.

With that declaration not a single Republican Senator rose to his feet and said "nay" to it.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Whose speech was that?

Mr. VEST. That was the speech of the Senator from Iowa, [Mr. ALLISON,] a member of the Committee on Finance; and my distinguished friend from Ohio, [Mr. SHERMAN,] whose soul has been palpitating and burning with the necessity for some relief for the overburdened people of the country, sat here and listened to it and voted for that commission.

Mr. SHERMAN. I am not sure that I listened to it. I certainly never heard it before. But at any rate, I had already put myself on record. I think it is not necessary to go into the record. I could read from statements made by several Senators in that debate, among others the distinguished chairman of the committee, that this was not to preclude expected action of the House and Senate upon various items of the tariff. Certainly we were not called upon to interrupt the Senator from Iowa when he stated his own opinion. If I had heard him probably I should not have said anything.

Mr. VEST. It would have been no interruption, for this was a running debate, and went on for several pages of the RECORD afterward.

Mr. SHERMAN. It seems the Senator from Delaware, the Senator from Wisconsin, and others did interrupt.

Mr. VEST. But not a single Republican Senator.

Mr. SHERMAN. Yes; the Senator from Wisconsin is the best kind of a Republican.

Mr. VEST. The RECORD shows a single solitary thing in the nature of a protest, and that a very feeble protest, which came from the Senator from Nebraska, [Mr. VAN WYCK.]

Mr. ALDRICH. I beg the Senator's pardon. If he will look on page 30 he will see that the Senator from Wisconsin, [Mr. CAMERON,] the Senator from Delaware, [Mr. BAYARD,] and others interrupted, and said "Oh, no."

Mr. VEST. Yes, "Oh, no;" which was very limited.

Mr. ALDRICH. It was in answer to the very statement which the Senator from Iowa made.

Mr. VEST. It was not made in connection with the statement I read.

Mr. ALDRICH. I refer to the RECORD of March 29, the thirtieth page.

Mr. VEST. The Senator from Nebraska introduced a very feeble protest, in which he said that he had hoped there would be some change in regard to the tariff; but he said, after listening to the argument and to the statement of the Senator from Iowa, he had come to the conclusion that there would be no change in the tariff, and he took the tariff commission as the dernier, the last resort, and then the vote was taken upon that debate and with these declarations, and the Republican party stood upon that until to-day, until this very hour.

The question is, what has brought this change over the spirit of their dreams. The House of Representatives, which has always heretofore had the origination of these bills, passed a resolution to adjourn on the 10th of July and sent it to the Senate. The Republican caucus meets, and all at once we hear in eloquent tones from every portion of that side of the Chamber that the country is burdened with indebtedness, is groaning and laboring under its enormous taxation. For seven long months the majority have sat here, the country agonizing and bleeding at every pore under this terrible calamity, and not one word has been heard in favor of relief.

The whole of it amounts simply to this, in plain English: the press of the country, the people of the country, in plain vernacular have told the Republican party, "You must not leave the capital without giving us relief from taxation;" and now, at the close of the session, they seek to put us in the position of resisting this bill in order that they may go into the canvass and say, "We attempted to relieve the people, and the Democratic party would not permit us to do it." I say to gentlemen very respectfully, I am prepared to stay here until fall, to stay here until after the election has determined the issues between us; and when they vote for a decrease of taxation we will vote for a larger one, and we will see how soon the newly-found zeal of the Republicans on this floor will last in a contest of that sort.

Mr. HALE. Mr. President, I sympathize fully with the distress of the Senator from Missouri, the Senator from Delaware, the Senator from Kentucky, and others.

Mr. SAULSBURY. We enjoy it finely.

Mr. HALE. They are in trouble, undoubtedly. They do not like the attitude in which this matter is presented. My friend from Kentucky would have liked very much better that there should have been a bill presented from this side of the House to which he could have moved an amendment reducing the tax upon Bessemer steel, and other Senators upon that side would have much preferred the paternity of the reduction of the duties upon sugar.

Will not my friends upon the other side ever learn any wisdom? For years they have been talking about reducing taxes and cutting down the duties that are imposed upon sugar, Bessemer steel, and other things; and now a bill is proposed in good faith reducing those taxes. Why did not some of the gentlemen upon the other side at once rise and welcome this reduction, and picture the position of the Republican party having been driven to produce this bill, and seek to put it upon its passage, and not spend the hours of a precious day here at the last of the session in resisting the motion of the Senator from Vermont, which is to take up this bill to reduce taxes? Here we have spent already nearly three hours because of the resistance on the part of Senators of the Democratic party to the motion of the Senator from Vermont to go on with this bill.

Mr. FARLEY. It is the Senators from Nebraska who are resisting now. The resistance is from Republican Senators.

Mr. HALE. There may be here and there a Republican who has some special bill in charge that he wants to get up, but the opposition from the other side has not come in that way. One pretext after another, as the Senator from Minnesota has arrayed them, has been urged why we should not bring this bill up at all. The Senators know that the bill is coming up; that it is to be discussed; that we are engaged in an effort to reduce taxes at least $40,000,000; and I ask again, when will they ever learn wisdom? Instead of opposing a thing of that kind why not welcome it and help it along?

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, I am much more anxious to vote than I am to make a speech on the subject. It has been eight months since there was a proposition in the Senate looking to a reduction of taxation.

Mr. ALLISON. It has been six years.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I am speaking of this session of Congress. In the beginning of the session, after the President had told the Congress of the United States that the condition of the Treasury was such as to justify the country in expecting a reduction in taxation, one had a right to expect it to be done at this session. But a bill was brought in here which we upon our side asserted in the very beginning was to postpone a settlement of the whole question for one or two years. That bill was resisted, with but one or two exceptions, by the whole Democratic party on this floor; but the Republican party triumphed; they carried that proposition; they appointed their commission. We do not know what the result will be. This whole tariff, which we denounce as an abomination, as an outrage, was the work of the Republican party; it was put upon the people by them. We were urgent to reduce taxation. They were postponing our proposition; and now, after eight months have been wasted, at the very heel of the session, when the dog-days are approaching, when every man in both Houses of Congress has been hoping to get to a cool retreat during the months of August and September, here comes up a proposition for an entire revision of our revenue laws, both external and internal. As one who has urged such measures upon Congress from the very beginning, I accept the gauntlet which has been thrown down. I will walk into the ring and meet the gentlemen, and will stay during the whole dog-days and until the November elections if necessary.

I am ready to vote at once to take up the little revenue bill and go into this discussion. We cannot get a worse tariff than we have. While it subjects us to a great deal of personal inconvenience, to be consistent, to be right, to be true to my own convictions, I will vote, gentlemen, to take up your proposition at once. I am glad that you have offered it, even at this late hour, for I know what has brought it here. I know what has done it. You placed yourselves upon record as in favor of high protection, as in favor of protection for protection's sake. Even, as asserted by some of the leaders, if there was no public debt, if there was no revenue, if there was no pension list to pay, still you are for protection.

Your party is upon record upon that idea, and you have heard the distant rumbling of the popular thunder as it is rolled from the plains over Kansas, Nebraska, Iowa, Illinois, and Indiana until its tones are heard in the capital of the country, and you are determined before the session adjourns to make some atonement for your past conduct. I accept your proposition gladly. Let me say to my Republican friends that you do our side great injustice when you intimate for a moment that we are not willing to take it up. We enter the arena with you and we will make you sick of it before you are done. If you will go as far as we will in reducing taxation upon the people we shall have done a great public benefit during this session of Congress, and it will be memorable always hereafter.

Mr. BECK. I wish to suggest to my colleague before he sits down to ask some Senator on the other side who offered the resolution in the Republican caucus of the House last March against the reduction of the tax on whisky and tobacco.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Yes; before Congress met and after it met, as late as last March, some of the most eminent of the Republican leaders had made speeches and many of their journals had published able articles in favor of abolishing the entire internal-revenue system of the country. When Congress met all said that there was necessity for some reduction of the tariff; that it needed revision. When the proposition for a commission was sent to us it had been announced that Congress would enter upon a reduction of internal-revenue taxes. The chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means of the House, the leader and chief of high protection, had declared that he was in favor of a bill to abolish the entire system of internal revenue; but the Republican caucus sat upon it, resolved that they would not touch the question of internal revenue during this session of Congress, and that eminent and conscientious gentleman felt that his allegiance to his party was more strong and more binding upon him than to his country, his party feeling was stronger than his patriotism, and upon the floor of the House, in a public speech, he declared that he yielded to his party rather than to the necessities of the country.

Mr. ALLISON. Mr. President——

Mr. MORRILL. Will the Senator from Iowa allow me to read what I stated myself?

Mr. ALLISON. Certainly.

Mr. MORRILL. On the 29th day of March I rose and made this statement:

> Mr. President, the amendment proposed by the Senator from Iowa, [Mr. ALLISON,] I think, would be very well, for the reason that it conforms to the House bill, and that is an indication to us that the House of Representatives proposes to act upon the internal-revenue question at this session. I hope also that they will act upon some suggestions made by the Senator from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN] the other day in relation to the sugar duties and other questions in the tariff.

Mr. ALLISON. The debate which the Senator from Missouri was kind enough to read occurred on the 28th day of March, when I expressed the opinion that the passage of the tariff commission bill would result in a postponement of the tariff question for this session of Congress and for the next. The response of the Senator from Delaware and others to me at that time was that no such purpose was intended, and that no such effect would be produced, in which opinion I practically acquiesced, thus far, that specific questions relating to the tariff might be taken up and specific questions relating to the internal revenue might be taken up at this session.

Will Senators on the other side of the Chamber pretend now that when they voted for the Senate tariff-commission bill, which did include the question of internal revenue, they voted for it with the expectation that no question of internal revenue or the tariff would be considered until the commission made its report? When I offered a proposition excluding from the jurisdiction of the commission questions of internal revenue, a majority of this body voted me down, and they voted me down upon two grounds: first, that there was no intention to refrain from Congressional interference with either the tariff or the internal revenue by the appointment of the commission; and, secondly, that the two were so corelated that one could not be considered without the other.

On that day I stated that in my judgment there would be no revision of the tariff at this session. Why did I make that statement? I made it because that was on the 28th day of March, and the House Committee of Ways and Means at that time had already reported or were ready to report that very bill for a tariff commission, and it was perfectly plain and palpable that if we had a tariff commission to consider those questions we were not likely to undertake a general revision of the tariff at this session. So I say now.

But there was another thing equally plain, and that was that we were not likely to undertake a revision of the tariff beginning after the 29th day of March. Up to that hour, in the House of Representatives, so far as I know, there had been no proposition to take up the tariff question; and I submit to Senators who are familiar with the methods of legislation that if the tariff question is to be considered it must be taken up early in the session and practically pushed with vigor to the end.

I do not understand that the purpose of this bill is to do anything more than to make a few changes in the existing tariff, to reduce the duties 25 per cent. on sugar, which were placed on the tariff in 1875 for a specific purpose, which specific purpose no longer exists, namely, the establishment of the sinking fund——

Mr. BAYARD. Will the Senator say that the tax upon sugar was increased specifically for that purpose and that other taxes were not increased at the same time for the same purpose?

Mr. ALLISON. I do not say that.

Mr. BAYARD. No, I should think not.

Mr. ALLISON. I say that the 25 per cent. additional tariff was put upon sugar for the purpose of replenishing a diminishing sinking fund as suggested by the Secretary of the Treasury. It is true that other taxes were reimposed about the same time, which had been taken off in 1872. The Committee on Finance has not chosen to go much further than to take the tax off sugar, which is a necessary article of consumption going into every household in the land.

I have no disguise on the tariff question. I have nothing to retract from what I said on the 28th day of March. I do hold that the appointment of the tariff commission was a practical prolongation of a revision of the tariff beyond not only this session of Congress but beyond the next session of Congress. Therefore I have not changed my mind generally in reference to that matter. But when the Senator from Delaware and other Senators, notably the chairman of the committee, said in open debate that it was not expected that the appointment of the commission would preclude action upon the internal revenue or upon the tariff, I had a right to rely upon their judgment and statement with reference to that question.

I confess that until it was made, I did suppose that the appointment of a tariff commission would have the effect of practically postponing the consideration of the tariff; but as I said in that debate, and I repeat here, although the tariff commission is in existence today, I do not need their opinion or their judgment with reference to the reduction of tariff duties upon sugar. I do not need their opinion or their judgment with reference to the reduction of duties upon Bessemer steel. I do not need their judgment upon other questions that may be debated and discussed before this tariff question is completed. I have a judgment of my own with reference to those questions and am ready to vote on them whenever they are presented.

I am glad, for one, that both sides of the Chamber, as I understand my friend from Kentucky, [Mr. WILLIAMS,] are willing to march up to the work here and grapple with this question so as to reduce the burdens of taxation which are now upon the people, producing a surplus of more than $120,000,000 per annum. That is all there is in this question, and why is it that we are to stand here debating whether we shall take up the bill when in fact every member on both sides of the Chamber, so far as Senators have spoken, with the exception of the Senator from Arkansas, has proclaimed himself in favor of taking up and disposing of this bill, and the Senator from Delaware goes so far as to say that he is in favor of every reduction in this bill!

Mr. BAYARD. No——

Mr. ALLISON. Every reduction of taxation mentioned in the bill; I so understood the Senator.

Mr. BAYARD. I did not refer to the merits of the bill at all. I said they were sham reductions.

Mr. ALLISON. So I understand the Senator to think; but he stated that he was in favor of the reductions with reference to internal taxation, and called attention to the fact that upon his own motion the Senate by a unanimous vote reduced these taxes a year ago. So we did. Upon a report from the Committee on Finance upon bills introduced by the Senator from Kentucky, the bank taxes which now astonish gentlemen so much and which are regarded as so important to retain, were removed by a unanimous vote of the Senate, so far as the record is concerned, and without a yea-and-nay vote, upon a report of the Committee on Finance made by the Senator from Delaware.

If we are all agreed in the main features of this bill, why not let us take it up, and unless it is embarrassed by political questions and by attempts to secure a political advantage, this bill can be passed before the sun goes down to-day and before we adjourn.

Mr. MORGAN. I should like to ask the Senator from Iowa a question before he takes his seat.

Mr. MORRILL. I hope the Senate will consent to take up the bill, and then let the debate go on.

Mr. MORGAN. I merely want to ask the Senator from Iowa a question for information.

Mr. MORRILL. I shall detain the Senate but a few minutes myself in the discussion of the bill, but I think it is better the debate should be had on the bill after it has been taken up. I therefore appeal to all Senators to allow the bill to be taken up first.

Mr. MORGAN. The Senator from Iowa said he did not want the assistance of the tariff commission to understand the necessity or method of reducing the tax on sugar or on Bessemer steel; that he felt he was entirely able to grapple with that subject without the aid of the commission. I desire to ask the Senator, for information, if he feels able also to grapple with the subject of reducing the tariff on machinery. I desire to offer an amendment of that kind, and I hope the Senator from Iowa is sufficiently informed upon that proposition to enable all of us to understand fully the advantages of it.

Mr. ALLISON. I shall be able to grapple with it after I hear the Senator from Alabama, if not before.

Mr. MORGAN. I profess to have no such information on the subject as to enable me to instruct the Senate about it, but I was in hopes the Senator from Iowa would enlighten us to that extent, and assist me in that enterprise.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. HOAR in the chair.) The question is, Will the Senate postpone the pending order for one week?

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. MORRILL. I move that the Senate now proceed to the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 5538) to reduce internal-revenue taxation.

The motion was agreed to.

PRESIDENTIAL APPROVALS.

A message from the President of the United States, by Mr. O. L. PRUDEN, one of his secretaries, announced that the President had on the 12th instant approved and signed the following acts and joint resolution:

An act (S. No. 1549) for the relief of William J. Pollock;

An act (S. No. 1960) authorizing the New Orleans and Northwestern Railroad Company to construct bridges over the channels of Pearl River and Lake Pontchartrain; and

A joint resolution (S. R. No. 91) authorizing the payment temporarily of certain employés of the War Department.

HEAVY ORDNANCE INVESTIGATION.

Mr. MORGAN. I offer a resolution which I ask may be read at the desk, with a view of having it printed and taken up for consideration to-morrow.

The resolution was read, and ordered to lie on the table, as follows:

Resolved, That a select committee of five Senators to consist of the chairmen of the Committees on Military Affairs and on Naval Affairs and three other Senators to be appointed by the President pro tempore of the Senate from said committees be raised with instructions to take into consideration the subject of heavy ordnance and projectiles for the armament of the Navy and the sea-coast defenses, and said select committee shall have leave to sit during the recess of the Senate and to send for persons and papers, and shall report the results of their investigations to the Senate at its next session with any recommendation said committee may deem it proper to make on the subjects committed to them.

DOUBLE PENSIONS.

Mr. VAN WYCK. I ask the Senator from Vermont to yield to me one moment, that I may ask for the consideration of the joint resolution I reported in connection with the bill of the Senator from Maryland, [Mr. GROOME.] The bill and the joint resolution were both reported from the Committee on Pensions. It becomes necessary now that that joint resolution should be passed, because there evidently will be delay in passing the bill. The joint resolution directs the Secretary of the Interior to delay action upon the opinion of the Attorney-General until there can be action by Congress on the bill.

Mr. MORRILL. I think that will take no time, and I do not object to its consideration unless it shall be discussed.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The joint resolution will be read for information.

The Acting Secretary read the joint resolution (S. R. No. 94) directing the Secretary of the Interior to withhold action in payment of double pension to General Ward B. Burnett.

Mr. VAN WYCK. That is merely until the action of Congress can be had upon the bill reported by the Senator from Maryland.
